A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

10 - 45:2

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

Bachofen

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

VOLUME I

Introduction and General Rules (can. 1-86)

SECOND EDITION

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68 GREAT RUSSELL ST. LONDON, W. C.
1918

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cum Permissu Superiorum

NIHIL OBSTAT
Sti. Ludovici, die 31 Maii, 1918
F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum.

IMPRIMATUR
Sti. Ludovici, die 1 Junii, 1918
✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici.

Copyright, 1918
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
.B12
1
587677

Gift of the Queen's Book Shop 1250 St

TO

THE BELOVED HIERARCH OF OUR DIOCESE

THE RT. REV. MAURICE FRANCIS BURKE, D.D.

BISHOP OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.

THIS VOLUME IS RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

FOREWORD

Aug. 7th, 1917, the S. Congregation on Seminaries and Studies issued a decree which imposes on teachers of Canon Law the task of explaining the new Code, not only synthetically, but also analytically, by closely following the order and text of the Code itself. The decree also calls for a historical survey, whenever necessary and opportune, of the respective canons. This precisely has been the guiding line along which the writer taught Canon Law at the Benedictine University in Rome for nine years (1906–1915), until the European conflict closed our international College. Most of that time, therefore, fell within the period of the present codification.

We do not intend to make an apology for the commentary now offered to the clergy and all interested in the study of ecclesiastic law. The commentary shall be as brief as the matter permits and shall not be encumbered with moralizing reflections. The reader should remember that the commentary is intended for countries where the English language prevails, and hence for such countries as do not reflect all the customs and laws in vogue and practice elsewhere. Wherefore certain parts of the Code (e. g., cathedral chapters, jus patronatus, benefices) will not be treated in extenso. We shall endeavor to render the text in a verbal, or at least substantially faithful, transcription, no official English text having reached us. For the rest, the old saw, "Bis dat qui cito dat," has quickened this edition.

THE AUTHOR.

Conception, Mo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

FOREWORD i

PART I. INTRODUCTION 1

CH. I. NAME AND DEFINITION OF LAW IN GENERAL AND CANON LAW IN PARTICULAR 1

CH. II. THE SCIENCE OF CANON LAW AND ITS IMPORTANCE 6

CH. III. THE SOURCES OF CANON LAW 9

SECT. 1. The "Fontes Essendi" 10

SECT. 2. The "Fontes Cognoscendi" 12

ART. 1. Holy Writ 12

ART. 2. Decrees of the Roman Pontiffs 13

ART. 3. The Canons of Councils 16

ART. 4. The Unwritten Law 17

CH. IV. HISTORY OF THE SOURCES AND LITERATURE OF CANON LAW 18

SECT. 1. First Period (to about 1150) 20

ART. 1. Occidental Collections 21

ART. 2. Spurious Collections of the Ninth Century . 23

The Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals 24

ART. 3. Collections of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries 27

SECT. 2. Second Period (to the Council of Trent) . . 30

ART. 1. The Decretum Magistri Gratiani 30

ART. 2. Decretales Gregorii IX (1234) 36

ART. 3. Decretales Bonifacii VIII (1298) 38

ART. 4. Clementinae (1317) 40

ART. 5. Extravagantes 42

ART. 6. The "Corpus Juris Canonici" 43

SECT. 3. Sources of the Last Period 46

Study of Canon Law 49

SECT. 4. The Glossators 52

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

PAGE

Sect. 5. Post-Tridentine Literature 56
1. Historico-Critical Writings 57
2. Commentaries 57
3. Manuals 58

Ch. V. Old and New Law 60

CONSTITUTION "PROVIDENTISSIMA" OF BENEDICT XV, PROMULGATING THE NEW CODE . . 64

PROFESSION OF FAITH PRESCRIBED BY THE NEW CODE 69

PART II. COMMENTARY 72

Book I. General Rules 72

Title I. On Ecclesiastical Laws 80
Definition and Nature 80
Legislators of the Church 82
Obligation of Laws 83
Interpretation of Laws 93
Cessation of Laws 102

Title II. On Custom 106
Abolition of Customs 113

Title III. On the Reckoning of Time 115

Title IV. On Rescripts 124
Date and Requisites 127
The Clause "Motu Proprio" 133
Mistakes in Rescripts 135
Preference, Interpretation, and Presentation 136
The Office of Executor 141
Recall and Cessation of Rescripts 148

Title V. On Privileges 152
Historical Note 152
Division of Privileges 153
Acquisition of Privileges 154
Faculties 159
Interpretation of Privileges 162
Loss of Privileges 164

Title VI. On Dispensations 173

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

PART I
INTRODUCTION

CHAPTER I

NAME AND DEFINITION OF LAW IN GENERAL AND CANON LAW IN PARTICULAR

The Latin word jus (from jurare, to swear, or jussum, command) has a double meaning or sense: a) subjectively, it signifies right, or "the moral power to have, to do, or to require something from another (facultas moralis inviolabilis aliquid habendi, agendi, exigendi), as we say to give to every one his due (suum cuique); b) in the objective sense, jus denotes norm or law either in the singular or plural (complex of laws), for instance, the law of celibacy, civil law, canon law. This latter meaning is attached to the "eternal law," since "the very idea of government of things in God the Ruler of the universe has the nature of a law,"[1] and every law, divine or human, is but an irradiance from the eternal law, as all human laws bear the character of laws only in as far as they approach, more or less, this prototype.

Canon Law (jus canonicum, derived from the Greek κάνων, i. e. norm or rule), as a technical term occurs since the twelfth century,[2] this nomenclature being exclusively reserved for the laws of the Church, whilst lex (νόμος) was applied to civil laws. Consequently the interpreters of ecclesiastical law were called canonistae, those of civil law, legistae.

[1] S. Theol., I-II, q. 91, a. 1 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

DEFINITION.—Canon Law may therefore be defined as "the complex of rules which direct the exterior order of the Church to its proper end."

EXPLANATION.—a) In this definition the laws of the entire Church only are, per se, considered, viz. those laws which touch upon the whole body as such and emanate from the supreme authority (jus commune). Hence laws made for a particular portion of the Church or its members are outside our subject except in so far as they form part and parcel of the body of common law. However, since these particular or special rules need the explicit or implicit consent of the supreme lawgiver, and rest on the interpretation of law in general, it is evident that even these particular laws must, to some extent at least, be taken into consideration.

b) The purpose of Canon Law, as of all law properly so called, is the establishment and maintenance of exterior order. The Church forms an organized body which has its special and proper functions. In a certain sense, she is a body politic with a working to the outside. Hence her laws, either in regard to the hierarchic ramifications, or in relation of member to member, are concerned not directly with internal acts ("de internis non judicat praetor"), but with the public or exterior order of the Church at large (finis proximus juris canonici).

c) However, the end of the Church being mainly

2 Summa Stephani Tornacensis, apud Schulte, Gesch. d. Quellen u. Lit. d. can. Rechts, 1875, I, 29.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spiritual, i. e., of the supernatural order, it is plain that Canon Law must partake of that order, and hence tend, a potiori, to a supernatural end. Yet, it is perfectly true what has been said above (b), that ecclesiastical laws are principally intended to maintain the public order, since the Church is not merely a supernatural and an invisible organization, but a visible body consisting of men, not of angels.

Besides the time-honored nomenclature "Canon Law," i. e., the law made up chiefly of canons, there are other names: a) jus ecclesiasticum, inasmuch as it embraces the whole range of Church legislation contained in the canons of councils as well as in the decrees and decretals of the popes and in unwritten laws, i. e., legitimate customs; b) jus pontificium (a term used v. g. by Giraldi), in as far as the supreme and chief source of Church legislation is the Sovereign Pontiff; c) jus sacrum, in as far as its main author is Jesus Christ and it treats of sacred persons and things.

Division of Canon Law.—a) By reason of its origin, Canon Law is either divine or human. Divine is that part of it which owes its origin to Christ or the Apostles, in as far as the latter enacted laws by divine inspiration, (which is not, however, to be identified with Scripture inspiration) or promulgated them as divine norms, v. g., the hierarchy, the matter and form of the sacraments (James 5, 14), the privilegium Paulinum. Human is that portion of the Canon Law which has merely human authority for its existence; thus the Apostolic decrees (Acts XV) are of human authority though established by Apostles; purely human laws, too, are those passed by councils, popes, and bishops, unless, indeed, they are implicitly contained in revelation, or are merely

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

declarations, specifications, or modifications of divine or natural law. In the latter case they belong to the class of divine laws.

b) By reason of its obligatory force, either personally or territorially, Canon Law is: α) either general, when it binds all members of the Church, or special, when it binds only some members or a class of members, e. g., the clergy, regulars; β) either universal, when it is incumbent on the entire Church as far as it is spread, or particular, when it affects only a certain portion of the Church, as a province or diocese. Under this heading belongs the difference between the law prevailing in the Oriental[3] and that binding the Occidental Church. γ) By reason of its promulgation we speak of written or unwritten law, or custom (consuetudo).

d) By reason of time, Canon Law is distributed into various epochs: α) jus antiquum, or old law, from the beginning of the Church up to Gratian's Decretum (about 1150); β) jus novum, or new law, up to the Tridentine Council (1545–63); γ) jus novissimum, or modern law, up to our time. It remains to be seen whether the New Code will constitute a new epoch.

e) By reason of its matter, Canon, like civil law, may be classified into public and private law. Public law is concerned with the Church as a society, its government and external relations; private law with the rights of the members and their mutual relations.[4]

This latter distinction is rejected by most of the German canonists, v. g., Philips, v. Scherer, Sägmüller, but defended by Roman authors. If we subsume under public law the constitutional law proper, together with that

[3] Concerning the laws binding this Church see the Collectanea Prop. Fid., 1907, II, n. 1578; can. I of the Codex Iuris Can.

[4] Schenkl, Institutiones Iuris Eccl., 1853, I, § 38, p. 60.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

governing the Church's external relations, we believe there is nothing unwarranted in this division. Private law would then embrace chiefly the administrative portion of the laws. Whether we substitute the terms "external" and "internal" is of little importance.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE SCIENCE OF CANON LAW AND ITS IMPORTANCE

Abstracting for a moment from the historical resources, which partly date back to the founder of the Church and partly owe their origin to the natural development of the living organism, Canon Law as a distinct science owes its existence and splendor chiefly to the Benedictine monk, Gratian, in the middle of the twelfth century, when canonists — and also legists — commenced to cultivate ecclesiastical law systematically.

If science means "a demonstrative syllogism" or conclusions drawn from premises, it is evident that single laws form the stock and store out of which deductions are made, and which, in their turn, may become new laws and new bases for mental operations (e. g., exemption). Science demands a knowledge not only of the several existing laws, but of their systematic and pragmatic putting together. Canonical science must be analytical as well as synthetic, and should be based upon critical and historical researches. And in this latter regard some progress, mainly due to the two brothers Ballerini and to German scholars, has been made.

Preëminently, however, law is practical, and hence the canonist should not only know the law, but also be able to apply it to concrete cases, such as occur daily. This is the function of what is called jurisprudence (juris- prudentia sacra), or "the habit (habitus) of knowing, interpreting and applying the laws." [1]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

As to the necessity or importance of this systematic-practical science, it is not too much to say that the "watchmen on Sion's tower," i. e. the prelates, are obliged to possess a more elaborate and extensive knowledge of ecclesiastical laws than is required of the lower clergy. For the prelates should be especially well versed as to the rights of the Church in regard to civil power, and should know the laws regulating their own attitude towards the clergy and the laity. This observation holds good also in regard to the officials of episcopal courts.

The priests, too, are bound in conscience to obtain a sufficient knowledge of Canon Law to enable them to discharge their duties as pastors of souls and to defend the rights of the Church and their own position. It is a sad saw, often repeated, "What's the use of Canon Law, the prelate is Canon Law." This saying is not only offensive to the prelates, who are thus represented as arbitrary law-makers and expounders, but betrays a lack of reverence for a noble, time-honored science, and degrades those who utter that unpriestly sentiment to the level of cowards or sluggards. Let them rather hear Gratian: "Ignorantia mater cunctorum errorum maxime in sacerdotibus Dei vitanda est. Sciant ergo sacerdotes scripturas sacras et canones;" and again: "Nulli sacerdotum liceat canones ignorare." [2]

In order to make canonical science solid, extensive, and systematic, the canonist, and especially the professor of Canon Law, should be conversant not only with dogmatic and moral theology, but also with Church history and civil law. History will render the study of Canon Law

1 Schenkl, op. cit., 41.

2 C. 4, Dist. 38.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more agreeable, give the student living pictures of the past, and help him to understand many laws otherwise barely intelligible. Civil Law, more particularly the old Corpus Juris Civilis, will furnish the key to a great many terms, v. g., in civil and criminal procedure, and show the connection existing between civil and religious law. Besides, the priest being a citizen of the State, and, we may justly say, a citizen of higher standing than most others, it appears but just that, even in this respect, his "lips shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth." [3] Therefore, in this country, for instance, the Constitution should not be a sealed book to priests, nor should they be strangers to the laws governing marriage, contracts, last will, and labor.

[3] Mal. II, 7.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER III

THE SOURCES OF CANON LAW

The term source or fountain of Canon Law (fons juris canonici) may be taken in a twofold sense: a) as the formal cause of the existence of a law, and in this sense we speak of the fontes essendi of Canon Law or lawgivers; b) as the material channel through which laws are handed down and made known, and in this sense the sources are styled fontes cognoscendi, or depositaries, like sources of history.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 1

THE "FONTES ESSENDI"

Taking for granted that the Church is a complete and autonomous society (societas perfecta), she must evidently possess legislative power, i. e., the faculty of enacting laws. For "a law is nothing else than an ordinance of reason for the common good, made by him who has care of the community, and promulgated."[1] Therefore, every law must proceed from the legitimate power residing in that community for which the law is given. Now, the Church Catholic being founded by our Lord and perpetuated by the Apostles and their lawful successors, among whom the Roman Pontiff holds not only an honorary but also a jurisdictional supremacy, the following must be acknowledged as ecclesiastical lawgivers:

1. Christ our Lord, the original source of divine laws laid down chiefly in the Constitution of the Church, and next to Him the Apostles as lawgivers either of divine or human laws, viz.: as inspired or merely human instruments.

2. The Roman Pontiff, either alone or in unison with a general council, as endowed with the supreme and ordinary power of enacting laws for the universal church;

3. The Bishops for their respective districts, inasmuch as they are empowered to enact laws subordinate to common law;

1 S. Theol., I-II, q. 90, a. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

4. Customs, too, must be considered as a source of law, universal as well as particular.

Whether the natural law can be called a source of Canon Law depends on the formal declaration of the supreme authority; for the natural law as such — its extent is very uncertain — cannot be called a homogeneous source of Canon Law except it has been declared such by the highest authority.[2] Besides its range being very uncertain, the so-called natural law is often nothing but a subjective sentiment, or, at most, a dictate of reason.

2 Cfr. J. Laurentius, S.J., Institutiones Juris Eccl., 1903, p. 9; Schenkl, l. c., 37, justly remarks that the natural law should be cautiously used in Canon Law.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 2

THE "FONTES COGNOSCENDI"

These sources, as we have said, are depositaries in which we find collected the laws enacted in the course of centuries. They may also be considered as the channels through which the river and rivulets of legal enactment flow and are preserved. They do not constitute the law as such, but rather point out where it may be found. Among these sources are Holy Scripture and the decrees of popes and councils; also, in a measure, custom, inasmuch, namely, as it proves the existence and continuity of laws unwritten and perhaps forgotten.

ARTICLE 1

HOLY WRIT

1. When we speak of Holy Writ as a source of Canon Law, it is evident that we refer primarily to the writings of the New Testament. There we meet with a nucleus of constitutional laws which were later developed; there, also, are to be found moral precepts which form the connecting link between the Old and New Dispensations.

2. As to the Old Testament, a distinction must be made between moral, ceremonial, and judiciary laws. The strictly moral laws contained chiefly in the decalogue were received bodily into the New Law. Not so the ceremonial laws, which, being ordained for the external worship of God, were modified and even abrogated by the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Church, inasmuch as they were laws of the old Code and to some extent detrimental to the spirit of the universal Church,[1] and consequently have no binding force as laws of the Old Testament (v. g., tithes).

The judicial laws of the Old Testament, i. e., those which govern man's relations to other men, were enacted according to the needs of the old theocratic State and have lost their binding force by the coming of Christ. Yet as far as they suit the conditions of the New Testament, they may, not as O. T. laws, but as rules for the N. T., be used even in the Church, because they rest on the dictates of reason[2] (v. g., prohibited degrees of marriage).

ARTICLE 2

DECREES OF THE ROMAN PONTIFFS

The decrees of the Roman Pontiffs have always enjoyed great authority in the Church, from the time of Clement I (+ 100?) to our own day.[3] Their subject-matter was partly dogmatic, partly disciplinary; it is the latter class that especially concerns Canon Law.

1. It was customary for the Pope, soon after having taken possession of St. Peter's Chair, and on other occasions, to gather a synod in Rome and to send the acts of that synod, together with a profession of faith, to the patriarchs and other prominent bishops. These documents often contained matter concerning not only the faith but also the discipline of the universal Church, and were called constituta (scil. in synodo). Besides, the Popes were often called upon to issue what are called privilegia, either for monasteries or for person-

1 Cfr. S. Th., I–II, q. 103.
2 Ib., qq. 104 ff.
3 Cfr. Coustant, O.S.B., Epistolae Rom. Pontificum, Paris, 1721, a work still useful and highly appreciated.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ages placed in high station. These sometimes bore the character of regular documents (diplomata), then again they were but personal letters, though written in a more solemn style, and having a silk thread (litterae gratiae) or a hemp thread (litterae justitiae) attached to them (eleventh century). Later on, especially under Martin V (1417–31), the custom prevailed in the Roman Curia of distinguishing two principal kinds of papal documents, i. e., bullae and brevia, which distinction is still preserved. At the time of Innocent VIII (1484–92) another sort of papal letters was introduced, not sealed but only signed by the Pope; their name is "Motu Proprio" (scil. scriptae litterae). This, in short, is the origin of papal documents.[4]

2. As to the form and juridical value of the various kinds of papal documents, the following distinctions may serve as a guide:

a) Bullae, Brevia, Rescripta, and between the two last-named the so-called "Motu Proprio."

a) Bullae, or Bulls, thus called from the seal of lead appended to, or impressed upon, the paper or parchment,[5] and bearing on one side the images of SS. Peter and Paul and on the other the name of the reigning Pontiff, are solemn documents. If the matter or object to be expedited "in forma Bullae" is a very important one, such as the confirmation of a bishop, the erection or division of a diocese, or a solemn act of the R. Pontiff, the leaden seal hanging on a silken cord is appended. If, however, the Bull contains matter of less importance, v. g., 4 Cf. Bresslau, Handbuch der Urkundenlehre, 1889, Vol. I (only one vol. published), p. 67 ff.; also Mabillon, De Re Diplomatica, Paris, 1681.

5 The original meaning of bulla is gem (precious ornament), then seal, from which it is transferred to the document provided with a seal, cf. Thesaurus Linguae Lat., 1906, II, p. 2241 f., Du Cange, Glossarium, II, p. 1339.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dispositions regarding minor benefices or matrimonial dispensations, the document has a seal of red wax with the images of SS. Peter and Paul, and around them the name of the reigning Pontiff.[6] The opening words are: "[Benedictus XV] Episcopus Servus Servorum Dei."[7] A special kind of Bull are the "Bullae dimidiatae," which are issued between the election and coronation of a Pope, and bear only the image of the two Apostles, whilst the reverse side of the seal is blank.[8]

β) Brevia, or Briefs, which have grown out of the letters closed with wax, are issued in the Secretaria Brevium, and generally concern minor affairs (negotia non gravia), although, at times, in order to save expenses, Briefs are issued regarding matters which would really require a Bull, v. g., the erection of Abbatiae Nullius. They begin with the name of the Pontiff, thus: "Benedictus Papa XV," and end with the words: "Sub annulo piscatoris."

"Motu Proprio's" and Rescripts have no special form.

We may add that the Bullae are now no longer written in Gothic but in the usual Latin letters, on parchment.[9]

b) Concerning their juridical value, it must be noticed that papal documents are variously styled: α) Constitutions, named after the ancient imperial constitutions, are Apostolic letters referring to important matters which concern the universal, or at least the entire Western Church. They may also be called, not improperly, En-

6 Acta Leonis XIII, 1881, t. I, p. 184 f.

7 This title dates back to the pontificate of St. Gregory the Great (590–604), and is of monastic origin, the monks calling themselves "servants of God," and this Pope, to reprove the arrogance of the Byzantine patriarch, styled himself "Servant of the servants of God."

8 Cf. Cironii Observationes, ed. Riegger, 1761, p. 5.

9 Thus ordained by Leo XIII, Dec. 29, 1878; cfr. Archiv für kath. Kirchenrecht, Vol. 41, p. 399; Aichner, Compendium Juris Ecclesiastici, § 10.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

cyclical letters, though these generally refer to the persons addressed (viz.: the hierarchy) and contain less juridical matter (v. g., "Rerum novarum," of Leo XIII, 1891).

β) Decrees; or decretals, to which belong those letters issued "Motu proprio" and "ad instantiam" (rescripts), broadly speaking, touch upon particular affairs and contain favors and privileges or answers to questions proposed by private individuals. It must, however, be added that "Motu proprio" does not exclude insistence or a request from interested parties.

ARTICLE 3

THE CANONS OF COUNCILS

Councils, as history testifies, were generally called at times when a crisis threatened the Church at large, or at least a considerable portion thereof. Although the first four general councils were convoked by the emperors, the "Bishop of old Rome" was represented by legates, and the decrees adopted were acknowledged by the universal Church. St. Gregory the Great speaks of those four councils as of four gospels.[10] Besides these imposing assemblies there were held provincial councils, v. g., at Antioch, Ancyra, Sardis, which also enjoyed great authority. Still a distinction was always made between universal and particular synods; the canons of the former were received by all, whilst those of the latter had only local force, except when they were inserted in an authentic collection of Canon Laws. No authentic collection of conciliary decrees as such exists. Of general Councils, two were held at Nicaea in Bythinia (325, 787), 10 Registrum Greg., P. I, 24, ed. Ewald-Hartmann (M. G.), 1891, I, 36 (this is a model epistola synodica).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

four at Constantinople (381, 553, 680, and 869), one at Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451), four at the Lateran (1123, 1139, 1179, 1215), two at Lyons (1245, 1274), one at Vienne (1311–13), one at Constance (1414–18), one at Basel-Ferrara-Florence (1431–45), one at Trent (1545–63), and one at the Vatican.

ARTICLE 4

THE UNWRITTEN LAW

A certain amount of traditional law is in vogue everywhere. It is the living spirit of the people's judgment, or "common sense." The Church, too, has her traditions, which testify to the observance of discipline, although there may be no corresponding law. Thus the celebration of the Sunday instead of the Jewish Sabbath [11] is called a divine tradition. Human traditions are, e. g., that which causes Easter to be celebrated on a certain day and the existence of minor orders.

Besides, there are writings of ecclesiastical authors which prove the existence of certain customs in ancient times. These, however, if not embodied in an authentic collection, have merely historical value.

Leaving traditions aside as being now defined and to a great extent determined, Canon Law is more especially interested in custom, which shall be treated in the Commentary proper.

[11] C. 5, Dist. 11.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

HISTORY OF THE SOURCES AND LITERATURE OF CANON LAW

The chief authorities to be consulted are:

BALLERINI, Peter and Jerome, in their ed. of the Opera Leonis M., t. 3 (Migne, Pat. Lat., t. 56);

P. COUSTANT, O.S.B., Epistolae Rom. Pontificum, Parisiis, 1721, Praef.;

F. LAURIN, Introductio in Corpus Juris Can., Friburgi, 1889;

F. MAASSEN, Geschichte der Quellen u. der Literatur des Canonischen Rechts, Gratz, 1870 (Vol. 1, the only one published);

J. F. SCHULTE, Geschichte der Quellen u. Literatur des Canonischen Rechts von Gratian bis auf die Gegenwart, 1875, 3 vols.;

AUG. THEINER, Disquisitiones Criticae, 1836.

The critical and historical method of treating the sources of Canon Law began with Humanism, or, more properly, with Nicholas of Cusa (Cusanus, + 1464). That the Pseudo-Isidorian Collection should be first attacked was natural. But this was but a beginning. Much remained to be done in regard to papal letters and conciliary decrees. A great deal had been achieved by the Spaniard Antonius Augustinus, in the sixteenth century, but his work was left incomplete. More elaborate were the critical labors of the brothers Peter and Jerome Ballerini, who deserve a distinguished place in canonistic literature. The names of Maassen and Schulte also are favorably known in this line of studies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

We can give only a brief historical sketch of the collections made according to the various epochs which Canon Law traversed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 1

FIRST PERIOD (TO ABOUT 1150)

Some disciplinary regulations are to be found in the so-called "Constitutiones Apostolorum," a fifth-century collection, made up of the "Doctrina XII Apostolorum," "Didascalia Apostolorum," and "Canones Ecclesiastici Apostolorum," to which were added the "Canones Hippolyti."[1] This collection, made by an anonymous writer imbued with heretical tendencies, contains some traditional customs concerning episcopal elections, ordination and qualities of aspirants to the priesthood, minor orders, etc. But it cannot properly be termed a source of Canon Law.

A collection of conciliar canons must have existed at the time of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Most probably this collection contained the enactments of "Seven Councils," viz.: those of Nice, Ancyra, Neo-Cæsarea, Gangræ, Antioch, Laodicæa, and Constantinople. To these were added later the canons of the councils of Ephesus, Chalcedon and Sardis (343), and the combined collection was eventually called Collectio Decem Conciliorum.[2] To this were prefixed the "Canones Apostolorum," 85 in number, which were received by the Trullan Synod held in the year 691–692 and are still 1 Cfr. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones, 1906; O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, 1903, Vol. 2, pp. 69, 255 ff.; Bardenhewer-Shahan, Patrology, 1908, pp. 349 ff.

2 Maassen, op. cit., pp. 126 ff.; P. Coustant, op. cit., pp. LVIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

acknowledged in the Eastern Church as "Codex Ecclesiae Orientalis." [3]

Whilst these collections were chronological, the later ones were systematic, beginning with one by an unknown author and another by Joannes Scholasticus (c. 550), distributed into 50 titles.

Another species of systematic collections were those styled "Nomocanones," containing, as the name implies, both civil (νόμος) and ecclesiastical (κάνων) laws. Several such collections were made in the sixth and seventh centuries and one of them was revised by Photius (c. 883).[4] This caesaro-papistic collection was based on the still acknowledged principle of the Oriental Church that "in illis quae canones non determinarunt, debemus sequi leges civiles." [5]

ARTICLE 1

OCCIDENTAL COLLECTIONS

The Greek collections mentioned above found their way into the Latin Church as early as the close of the fifth century, when a translation of the Greek canons was made and spread in Italy and Spain. In this latter country the spread of the Latin translation of the Eastern Councils was due especially to Isidore of Seville, and hence it goes by the name of Isidoriana, whilst the Latin translation used in Italy was called "Prisca." [6]

In the latter country, most probably in Rome, a 3 Milasch-Pessič, Kirchenrecht der abendländischen Kirche, 1905, pp. 81 ff.

4 V. Scherer, l. c., I, 197.

5 Cfr. Syntagma Atheniense, I, 68 (Milasch, l. c., p. 50).

6 It was thus called from the preface of the Dionysian version, "priscae translationis." Cfr. Voelli et Justelli Bibliotheca Juris Can., Paris, 1661, t. I, p. 101; Maassen, l. c., pp. 87 ff; Ballerini (Migne, 56, col. 83 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Scythian monk, Dionysius Exiguus (Denys the Little, + before 555), made a translation of the Greek canons, 213 in number, to which he added fifty "Canones Apostolorum" and 138 canons of African councils. This collection was increased by the "Decretales SS. Pontificum" issued from the time of Siricius (384–94) to the pontificate of Anastasius (+ 498), 197 in number. A copy of this double collection of conciliar canons and papal decrees, with some additional decretals, was donated by Pope Hadrian I to Charlemagne in 774, and subsequently called Dionysio-Hadriana. It enjoyed great authority in Italy, Gaul, Africa, Spain, and England.[7]

In Africa a collection of the decrees of councils held from 397 onward was made at an early date and condensed into the "Breviatio Canonum" of Fulgentius Furandus towards the middle of the sixth century. A systematic handbook destined for school use was the work entitled "Concordia Canonum" of Cresconius, published in the year 690.[8]

Of Gallic origin are the so-called "Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua" of the sixth century.[9] Another collection of French descent is that named from its editor Paschase Quesnel, Quesnelliana, and the one published by d'Achery, O.S.B. (+ 1685), called Dacheriana.[10] The latter author also edited a collection of penitential canons which goes by the same name, but was originally called "Collectio Canonum."

Spain had the Isidoriana, which through the magic name of St. Isidore (+ 636) gained great authority, and 7 Maassen, l. c., pp. 444 ff.; pp. 965 ff.; Migne, l. c., 195 f.

8 Mabillon, Iter Italicum, 1724, II; ed. Th. Sickel, 1889.

9 Migne, 56, 282; 273 f.; Maassen, l. c., 79 f.; 806 ff.

10 Ballerini, l. c. (Migne, 53, 106 f.); Maassen, l. c., 382 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was twice revised between 589 A. D. and the close of the seventh century; and a collection made by, or published under the name of, Martin of Braga, and circulated as "Capitula Martini." [11]

Besides these collections of Canon Law proper, the Penitential Books, published especially in Ireland, England and France, enjoyed great esteem.[12]

For the jus liturgicum the Sacramentaria [13] and Ordines Romani [14] are of great importance. For the chancery of the Roman Curia, its style and methods of expedition, the " Liber Diurnus " is invaluable.

ARTICLE 2

SPURIOUS COLLECTIONS OF THE NINTH CENTURY

The ninth century was rife with fabrications, not only in hagiography, but also in Canon Law. To this category belongs a collection named Continuatio ad Capitularia Regum Francorum, which the Levite Benedict of Mayence professes to have taken from the archives of that Church and compiled at the request of Bishop Hatto (825–47). It contains genuine canons and decrees side by side with spurious ones manufactured by Benedict.[15] Not much different in character and style are the Capitula Angilramni. Both this and the former collections originated in northeastern France.[16]

11 Migne, 141 f.; 309; Maassen, 436 f.; 536 ff.; 848 ff.

12 Migne, 53, 218; Maassen, 802 ff.; 677 ff.

13 Cfr. Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, 1851; Schmitz, Die Bussbücher, 1883.

14 Probst, Die ältesten röm. Sacramentarien, 1892.

15 Cfr. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Leges, II, 2, 39–158.

16 Cfr. Hinschius, Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramni, 1863, Praef., CXCIII ff.; CCXXX, p. 757.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals

This collection has, since the fifteenth century, claimed the attention of critics. That it contained considerable fraudulent matter was perceived by the famous humanist, Cardinal Nicholas of Cusa,[17] and has since been acknowledged by most "Romanists," although some later writers, like Torres, Malvasia, and Cardinal d'Aguirre, defended its genuineness.

1. Contents. The collection consists of a preface and three parts. The Præfatio contains the foreword of pseudo-Isidore (Mercator or Peccator), a spurious letter of Aurelius of Carthage to Pope Damasus with the latter's equally spurious reply, and the "Ordo de Celebrando Concilio."

Part I contains 50 Canones Apostolorum and decretals of Popes from Clement I to Melchiades (+ 314) — the latter, with the exception of the Clementine letters, all manufactured by "Mercator."[18]

Part II is made up of (a) De Primitiva Ecclesia, (b) Exemplar Constituti Constantini, and (c) Canons of Councils from the Nicene to the second of Spain, partly in the form of the Hispana, partly in that of the Quesnelliana.[19]

Part III exhibits some excerpts from Pope Silvester and a number of genuine decretals from Mark (+ 336) to Gregory II (715–31) in the form of the Hispana.[20] The number of apocryphal decretals is about 46 and that of the chapters which the author himself compiled about 104.[21]

17 Concordantia Catholica, III, 2; Ballerini (Migne, 56, 210).

18 Hinschius, l. c., p. LXX.

19 Hinschius, l. c., pp. LXXXIII ff.

20 Hinschius, LXXXIX.

21 Cfr. Coustant, l. c., CXXVI; Hinschius, CVIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Author and Time of Composition. It is commonly held that the birth-place of these pseudo-decretals must be sought, not in Rome (as Eichhorn and Theiner claimed), but in the western part of France. The exact place still forms a matter of controversy. While some (v. g. Hinschius [22] and von Scherer [23]) regard the diocese of Rheims as the home of the fraudulent compiler, others (especially Fournier [24]) assign him to the province of Tours and in particular to Le Mans.

As to the time of compilation there is no great divergency of opinion, for it is generally set between 847 and 853.[25]

3. Purpose of the Compiler. It is scarcely credible that the author had for his sole purpose the aggrandizement and defense of the Apostolic See,[26] or that of the bishops of Gaul or any particular part of it.[27] He says in the preface that he desired to gather the scattered canons into one volume. However, this was not his only purpose, otherwise his fabrications would have been superfluous. There can be no doubt that the compiler had still another end in view. This was, as Fournier [28] and others set forth, a twofold one: (a) to protect the authority of the bishops and clergy against encroachments of the potentates and lay-power at large, and (b) to secure the authority of the Roman Pontiff over particular synods, and to defend the hierarchy in all its degrees. Concerning the first point the emphasis laid on immunity is most notable. As to the other point it may be noticed

22 Pseudo-Decretals, Pref., CCXI.

23 Handbuch des Kirchenrechts, 1887, I, 222 f.

24 Les Fausses Décrétals, in Revue d'Histoire Éccl., 1906, 784.

25 Hinschius, l. c., p. CCI.

26 Ballerini (Migne, 53, 246).

27 Hinschius, l. c., CCXIII f.

28 Revue. d'Hist. Éccl., 1906, p. 548.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the Apostolic See was not in need of apocryphal documents to assert its rights.[29]

4. Influence of the Collection. It has frequently been said that Pseudo-Isidore ushered in an entirely new discipline. If this were true, only a solemn anathema on that fraudulent writer could repair the damage done to Canon Law. However, we must beware of both extremes — overrating the influence exercised by this collection as well as minimizing it unduly. A little distinction may be helpful in determining its true influence.

The material sway it exerted we see in the greater dependence of bishops and provinces on the Holy See — more centralisation — and in the outspoken tendency of the compiler to accentuate what we comprise by the term "immunity," and by extending the matrimonial degrees, which was then unheard of.

The formal influence consisted in the precision and divulgation of laws which, though already existing, were not yet accurately determined, v. g., concerning the confirmation and deposition of bishops, appeals, immunity. It cannot be denied that this fraud rendered a bad service to Canon Law, bringing it into discredit and evil repute for a time.[30]

In Germany two collections were widely known and made use of, to which may be added a third. They are:

a) Regino of Prüm's "De Synodalibus Causis et Disciplinis Ecclesiasticis," which was made between 906 and 915, in which latter year Abbot Regino died.[31]

29 Ballerini (Migne, 56, 246).

30 Von Scherer, l. c., I, 227; Coustant, l. c., Praef., CXXVII. An excellent monograph in English, by a Protestant lawyer, is now available in The False Decretals, by E. H. Davenport, Oxford, 1916.

31 Cfr. Ballerini (Migne, 56, 319); Regino's collection was published in Migne, 132, 17 f. and by Wasserschleben, 1840.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) More renowned is the "Decretum Burchardi." Burchard was Bishop of Worms, and composed his collection for practical purposes, especially for the visitation of his diocese. It consists of twenty books, the nineteenth of which is called "Corrector sive Medicus" and treats of penitential discipline. Burchard's chief sources were the "Collectio Anselmo Dicata," whose arrangement he adopted, and Regino's collection. Besides, he quoted many false decretals (about 173 in number), and invented new ones (about 59). He also changed or mutilated the inscriptions of titles and chapters.[82] But despite all these shortcomings the work found a ready reception, not only in Germany, but also in Italy, where Gratian introduced it into his Decretum[83] as "Brocardicae."

c) Belonging to the "Gregorian" group is the "Capitulare" or "Breviarium Hattonis," composed about 1080.[84]

ARTICLE 3

COLLECTIONS OF THE TENTH AND ELEVENTH CENTURIES

The Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals were followed by other collections, more or less spurious, not only in France, but in Italy and Germany as well. The age was prolific in forgeries.

1. In Italy there was one published which is not as yet printed, although it would, according to our view, based upon inspection of the original MSS.,[85] deserve

82 Cfr. Fournier, Études Critiques.

83 See Friedberg, Decretum Magistri Gratiani, Leipsic, 1879, pp. XLV ff.

84 Edited by Mai, Nova Bibliotheca Patrum, VII, P. III, 1–76; v. Scherer, l. c., I, 240.

85 Contained in the Cod. Paris. 15392, Cod. Mutinens.; besides in the Palat. Vat. 580 and 581, which

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more attention. This, the "Collectio Anselmo Dicata," was made towards the end of the ninth century.

The investiture controversy brought forth some collections which are all imbued with the spirit of Gregory VII and therefore called "Collectiones Gregorianae." To this group belong:

a) The Collectio Anselmi Lucani (Anselm of Lucca, + 1086);

b) The "Collectio Canonum Cardinalis Deusdedit," dedicated to Pope Victor III (1086–87);[36]

c) The "Decretales Bonizonis," composed soon after 1089;

d) The "Polycarpus" of Cardinal Gregory, issued soon after the death of Pope Calixt II (+ 1124).

The Vatican Library furthermore contains some interesting MSS. pertaining to collections of that period, which await publication.[37]

3. In France some notable special treatises were published, e. g., Hincmar of Rheims' "De Divortio Lothari Regis,"[38] and Jonas of Orleans' (+ 843) "De Laicali et Institutione Regali."[39] Collections proper are:

a) The "Canones Domni Abbonis" of Fleury (+ 1004), dedicated to King Hugh and his son Robert, a collection of genuine canons and papal decretals, also containing Capitularia Regum Francorum and Novellae.[40]

b) A "Compilatio Juris Canonici" of about the are written in the Carolingian minuscules. This Anselm, to whom it is dedicated, was Archbishop of Milan, 883–97; cfr. Ballerini (Migne, 56, 315 ff.), Coustant, l. c., Praef., CXXVI; Fournier, Études Critiques sur le Décret de Burchard de Worms, 1910, p. 10.

36 Published by Martinucci, 1869, and by Wolf von Glanvell, 1905.

37 Cod. 1339 in 5 books; Cod. 1346 in 7 books, more or less dependent on Pseudo-Isidore.

38 Migne, Pat. Lat., 125, 623 ff.

39 Migne, l. c., 106, 121 ff.

40 Ballerini (Migne, 56, 320, 139, 473 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

same date, treating of the reception of heretics and some of the sources of Canon Law.[41]

c) The "Decretum Ivonis Carnotensis" (+ 1117), which consists of seventeen books, and the same author's "Panormia" in eight parts. The former is a rich collection not only of canonical matter but also of theological lore, e. g., on baptism, confirmation and the Holy Eucharist. The "Panormia" was said to be the compilation made from Ivo's Decretum by the Catalonian Hugo, but it is probably Ivo's work.[42]

d) A "Collectio Trium Partium," divided into 29 titles, was made from Ivo's work soon after his death.[43] Then there is the work of Alger of Liège "De misericordia et justitia," c. 1121, consisting of three parts.[44]

In Spain a collection of 15 books appeared shortly after the Pontificate of Urban II (1088–1109).[45]

41 V. Scherer, I, 238.
42 Theiner, l. c., pp. 162 f.; Migne, 56, 104.
43 Theiner, l. c., pp. 154 ff.
44 Migne, 180, 857 ff.; v. Scherer I, 242.
45 Ballerini (Migne, 56, 352 f.).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 2

SECOND PERIOD (TO THE COUNCIL OF TRENT)

This epoch is distinguished by two prominent characteristics. Canon Law becomes independent of theology as such and is cultivated as a science proper. The "Magister" ushers in that period, so glorious for canonical lore and resplendent with names immortal. The appearance of standard or authentic collections sheds lustre on Canon Law, which now grows into Pontifical Law and irradiates immediately from St. Peter's Chair. These authentic collections are now, first of all, to be considered. It is necessary, however, to premise a few words on the famous Decretum Gratiani.

ARTICLE 1

THE DECRETUM MAGISTRI GRATIANI

1. AUTHOR AND NAME.—As the glossators testify, the author of the famous Decree is Gratian, who lived and taught as a member of the monastery of SS. Felix and Nabor at Bologna. It is most probable that this monastery then belonged to the Camaldulese. Of Gratian's career we know nothing, except that he died before A. D. 1160.[1]

There is historical evidence that the "Magister," as he was called, had entitled his work "Concordia Discordan-

1 Cfr. Maurus Sarti, O. Cam., De Claris Archigymnasii Bononiensis Professoribus, 1769–72; Schulte, Quellen, 1875, Vol. I, pp. 46 f.; Laurin, l. c., p. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

tium Canonum." [2] His purpose, according to his disciple, the famous Magister Rolandus (later Alexander III),[3] was to make apparently contradictory canons agree and to remove latent divergencies. However, already towards the end of the twelfth century, the collection was commonly called Decretum Magistri Gratiani, although it was also cited by the names "Codex," "Corpus," or "Liber Decretorum," or simply, "Corpus Juris Canonici." [4]

2. DIVISION.—The threefold general division was made by Gratian himself,— De Personis, De Causis, De Sacramentis.[5]

Part I consists of 101 distinctions, divided into canons, — but not by Gratian. It contains a treatise on the principles of Canon Law and a long treatise "De Electione et Ordinatione Clericorum."

Part II was divided by Gratian himself into 36 Causae, and each causa into Quæstiones, which, in their turn, were subdivided into Canones. The first ten Causae might be inscribed "De Judiciis"; Causae 11–20, "De Bonis Ecclesiasticis et Regularibus." Causae 21–26 treat of benefices and privileges, Causae 27–36, of marriage.

Causa 33, Quaestio III, contains the "Tractatus de Poenitentia," which Gratian inserted here, but did not himself divide into seven Distinctiones, as we now have it.

Part III was inscribed, "Liber de Sacramentis," for which title Paucapalea substituted "De Consecratione." It is divided into five distinctions.[6]

3. MODE OF ALLEGING.—A canonist will never quote,

2 Friedberg, Decretum Magistri Gratiani, 1879, Prol., X.

3 Summa Magistri Rolandi, ed. Thaner, 1874, p. 4.

4 Laurin, Introductio, p. 25.

5 Cfr. Schulte, Quellen, I, 50 ff.

6 Ibid., I, 50 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

e. g., "in Decreto Gratiani," but follow the usual mode of citing the decree:

Part I: c. i, D. i, which would read: Canon first, Distinction first. Sometimes we find the initial words only quoted, e. g., "Si quis apostolicae," LXXIX, which is Can. 1, Dist. 79. Of course, in that case the index must be consulted, which now takes the place of memory, on which the law-students of former times had to rely.

Part II has the distinctive sign C (Causae, written with a capital C), taking the middle between canons and questions, thus: c. 29, C. 17, q. 4, or again with the initial words of the canon: "Si quis suadente diabolo," which is the canon quoted in number and abbreviated letters. De Poenitentia: c. i, Dist. 5 de Poenit. which reads: canon 1, Distinction 5, with the characteristic sign, "De Poenit." We must draw attention to the fact that two of the Causae exhibit a transposition of questions; in Causa 2, quaestio 5 is placed immediately after 3; and in Causa 16, quaestio 5 directly follows 3.[7]

Part III: c. 16, Dist. 5 de consecr(atione), which signifies canon 16, Distinction 5 de consecratione; or again with the beginning words: "Quadragesima summae" de consecr.

Note that older canonists simply quote "in Decretis" with the initial words of the canons, and if the text does not fully cover the proof, they say "arg" (argumentum).[8]

4. Rubricae, Dicta Gratiani, Paleae.—To show the author's method it suffices to point out the brief summaries which precede almost every canon or authority alleged by the "Magister." These summaries are placed at the head in red (ruber) ink and hence called rubricae.[9]

7 Laurin, l. c., p. 7 (thus also in Friedberg's edition).

8 Id., pp. 9 f.

9 Cfr. Schulte, l. c., I, 54.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Furthermore, the Master employed at times some longer expositions, which were either to prove his view on certain canons or a deduction from the authorities alleged. These elucidations were styled paragraphi or dicta Gratiani. They are to be found either before or after a distinctio or causa or quaestio, and savor of the scholastic disputation.[10] They were intended to remove contradictions between different canons by pointing out that one canon formed the rule, whereas the other was an exception, or that one contained a precept, whereas the other was only a counsel; one emanated from a higher, the other from some inferior authority; one was given for the universal Church, whereas the other referred to a particular province, etc.[11]

The Decretum, as now published, contains many additions which are not the work of Gratian. It is certain that the Master's disciple, Paucapalea, added some decretals, wherefore all the additions were called paleae.[12] Their number is not quite certain, perhaps they form 166 out of the 3848 chapters of which the Decretum consists.[13]

5. Sources and Authority.—(1) The sources are either directly or indirectly taken from their collections and collectors. The direct sources are 17 apostolic canons, apocryphal as well as genuine decretals from Pseudo-Isidore, the writings of the Fathers, four chapters from St. Benedict's Rule, and Roman, Visigothic and Frankish civil laws.

Indirect sources were those of the collections: Anselmo dicata, Regino, Burchard, Luccani, Deusdedit, Polycarp, 10 Ib., 55 ff. A famous "dictum Gratiani" is that ad c. 16, C. 25, q. 1, on the nature of privileges.

11 Schulte, l. c., I, 60; v. Scherer, l. c., I, 243.

12 Another explanation, viz. that of "straw" (palea), is given by Huguccio, ad c. 51, C. 27, q. 2.

13 Friedberg, l. c., Proleg., p. XIV; Schulte, l. c., I, 56 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ivo, Algerius.[14] But the lack of critical genius of his age is also noticeable in Gratians' work.

(2) The reception given to the Decretum is almost incredible in our critical time. It was called "opus aureum" or "divinum decretorum opus."[15] There seems to be a reason for the applause with which the Magister's work was hailed: on account of the rich materials he had gathered and the scientific method he had adopted, especially in his "dicta" and general arrangement, the Decree soon made other collections superfluous and was generally used in schools and courts.[16]

In spite of all this veneration, however, the Decretum Gratiani has never been considered or declared an authentic collection. It was made by private authority and remained such. Hence its authority is neither more nor less than the sources laid under contribution are worth. A decree made by a universal council (consideratis considerandis) has the value of a universal law; a canon adopted by a particular council receives no additional force by being inserted in the Decree beyond that which it had before Gratian, etc. Hence each source must be examined independently as to its origin, authenticity, and authority.

At the same time it must be remembered that the Decree, on account of its popularity and the influence it exerted on teachers and judges, paved the way for other collections, which were no longer of merely private authority.

6. Time and Editions.—When Gratian composed his Decretum is a matter of controversy. We do not be-

14 Friedberg, l. c., pp. XIX ff.; p. XLII.

15 Cfr. Berardi, Gratiani Canones Genuini, 1783, I; Sarti, l. c., I, 247; Laurin, l. c., pp. 44 f.

16 Sarti, l. c., I, 247; Berardi, l. c., Praef., XXVIII; Schulte, l. c., I, 329.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lieve that intrinsic reasons will ever be found to clearly determine the time of its birth. What has been urged [17] in favor of an earlier than the usually accepted date, is not solidly proved nor free from bias. Extrinsic reasons rather favor 1150–1151 as the probable year of publication. The glossa of Joannes Teutonicus ad c. 31, C. 3, q. 6 and an old MS. state these two years, respectively.[18]

In the course of centuries the Decretum was often copied, sometimes with and sometimes without glossae, and the faithful rendering of the original text depended on the care of the copyists. Mistakes and corrections were already noticed by St. Antoninus (+ 1459) and they increased after the art of printing had been invented. Antony de Mouchy, in the edition of 1547, and Antony Conte, in the Paris edition of 1556 and the Antwerp edition of 1570, drew attention to spurious decretals. The Correctores Romani endeavored to eliminate some palpable errors and to render the text more intelligible. In 1580 and 1582 appeared a so-called official but not authentic text.[19] Henceforward the Decretum was reprinted by private savants, generally in connection with the "Corpus Juris Canonici." [20]

Appendices and Compilations.—Soon after the publication of the Decree some decretals were added to it or separately published, e. g., the "Appendix Concilii Lateranensis," the "Collectio Bambergensis," the "Collectio Lipsiensis," the "Decretales Alexandri III." [21]

17 The formula "salvâ sedis apostolicae auctoritate" has been alleged by Theiner and Schulte to prove 1139 as the year of divulgation.

18 The codex reads: "Decretum Gratiani, monachi, Felicis Bononiensis, Ord. S. Benedicti completum in dicto monasterio anno Dmi. MCLI, tempore Eugenii tertii;" Laurin, l. c., p. 34.

19 Theiner, l. c., app., p. 3; Friedberg, Prolog., LXXV ff.

20 Cfr. below on the whole C. J. C.

21 Cfr. Theiner, l. c., p. 4 ff.; Schulte, l. c., I, 77 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Of greater importance than these were the five so-called Compilationes, viz.:

a) Compilatio I Bernardi Papiensis, entitled by the author "Breviarium Extravagantium," issued between 1187 and 1191, divided into 5 books with titles and chapters according to the famous verse, "iudex, judicium, clerus, connubia, crimen."

b) Compilatio II, by John of Wales (Joannes Walensis), published before 1200. Neither of these compilations is authentic, whereas the folowing three must be considered authentic:

c) Compilatio III, made at the request of Innocent III by Petrus Collavicinus or Beneventanus (1210).

d) Compilatio IV, perhaps made by Innocent III himself, and consequently before or about 1216, although published only in 1217.

e) Compilatio V, made and promulgated under the auspices of Honorius III, 1226.[22] These three collections were alleged in schools and courts in the same manner as the Decretals.

ARTICLE 2

DECRETALES GREGORII IX (1234)

1. NAME.—By a Bull dated Sept. 5th, 1234, Gregory IX promulgated a collection of "Constitutions and Decretals," to which he himself, referring to the five preceding, attributed the name "compilatio." It was soon called "nova" (scil. compilatio) as well as "Liber Extravagantium" (scil. extra Decretum) and added to the five other compilations. However, the name "Decre-

22 Cfr. Theiner, l. c., pp. 1 ff.; Schulte, l. c., I, 80 ff.; Laurin, l. c., 97 ff.; Friedberg, Quinque Compilationes Antiquae, 1882; v. Scherer, I, 247, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tales" became more usual and finally exclusive,[23] and is now constantly employed.

The reason for this collection is stated in the Bull "Rex pacificus" as follows: Some decretals, on account of their length and resemblance to each other, appeared to cause confusion and uncertainty in the schools as well as courts, and to remedy this evil, the present collection is issued as an authentic one, to be employed in schools and ecclesiastic courts exclusively of all others. This meant that (a) the former five compilations were henceforward destitute of juridical value, and therefore could not be alleged as law-texts by the ecclesiastical judges; (b) each and every chapter in its dispositive part, no matter what its source or authority, was to have full juridical value as a law-text; (c) the collection was to be considered the Code of Law for the universal (Latin) Church, to the exclusion of all others of a general character. But this collection did not abrogate either the Decretum Gratiani or existing particular laws and customs, nor did it prevent the publication of later codes.[24]

2. COMPILER AND MATTER.—As the Bull "Rex pacificus" tells us, the Pope commissioned his chaplain and confessor, Bl. Raymund de Peñaforte (+ 1275), to make this compilation, and he accomplished his task within the space of four years, so that the collection could be published in 1234.

The material was gathered from Holy Scripture, from the canons of particular as well as universal councils, and from papal decretals. A few are taken from the civil laws. Most of the Decretals, with the exception of those of Innocent III and Gregory IX, were copied from the "five compilations." There are 1971 chapters, of which 23 Friedberg, Corpus Juris Can., II, Proleg., p. X.

24 Laurin, l. c., pp. 141 ff.; v. Scherer, I, 251 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google 1766 are borrowed from the compilations mentioned.

3. ORDER AND MODE OF QUOTING.—The whole collection is divided into five books according to the well-known verse quoted above (p. 36), each book into titles, and each title into chapters. Each title has an inscription, and the chapters are generally preceded by rubrics or brief summaries, which, however, are of purely private authority, whereas the titles, whenever their words exhibit a complete meaning (e. g., "Ne sede vacante aliquid innovetur," III, 9) have legal value. When the decretals appeared too long, Raymund cut off the arenga, or narratio, retaining only the dispositive part. The cut-off parts ("partes decisae") were marked "et infra." The modern way of quoting these decretals is: c. 4, X, I, 4, i. e., chapter 4, liber extravangantium (viz. extra or outside the Decretum Gratiani and the five compilations), book first, title fourth. Sometimes the beginning of the chapter is quoted with "extra" and the inscription of the title, v. g., De Consuetudine.

ARTICLE 3

DECRETALES BONIFACII VIII (1298)

From the time of Gregory IX the Roman Pontiffs developed much legislative activity. Thus Innocent IV (Fiesco), a canonist of merit, issued various Decretals, which he himself collected and divided into 28 titles with 42 chapters. Another collection was sent by the same Pope to the famous University of Bologna, in 1253.[25] Alexander IV, Clement IV, and Urban IV also issued Decretals, which were sometimes simply added to Greg-25 Theiner, l. c., p. 66; Schulte, Quellen, II, 30 ff.; Laurin, l. c., pp. 166 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ory's collection, sometimes remained "x," as Novellae.[26] These motley decretals caused some uncertainty. Whereupon three dignitaries, William, Archbishop of Embruns, Berengarius, Bishop of Beziers, and Richard of Siena, Vice-chancellor S.R.E., were ordered by the Pope to "revise" the Decretals, and after revision, to send them to the universities of Bologna and Paris. This was done in 1298, and the collection thus made at the request of Boniface VIII was added to the existing Decretals of Gregory IX as a continuation to the same, and therefore called "Liber Sextus." So we read in the Bull "Sacrosanctae," March 3, 1298.[27]

1. MATTER AND ARRANGEMENT.—The three above-named compilers took their materials from the canons of the first and second Councils of Lyons (1245, 1274) and from the Decretals of Gregory and his successors up to Martin IV and Boniface VIII. The Decretals of the latter form 229 chapters. The compilers made use of the preceding compilations and added the eighty-eight "Regulae Juris," taken from Dinus of Mugello (de Rossonibus).[28]

The title headings were taken from Gregory's, also the rubrics as well as the inscriptions of the single chapters. The latter, however, were often abridged, sometimes changed, and sometimes even wrongly quoted. The "partes decisae" were no longer marked "et infra," but simply "cut off." On the whole this collection is not as faithful and precise a rendering of the original text of the Decretals as one might have expected from Boniface VIII, but it has the character of a juridical code. Al-

26 Schulte, l. c., pp. 31 f.; Laurin, l. c., pp. 171 ff.

27 Friedberg, Corpus Juris Can., II, 933 f.

28 Sarti, l. c., I, 234 ff.; v. Scherer, l. c., I, 252; Laurin, l. c., 177.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

though called "Liber Sextus" and intended, as it were, to be a continuation of the Gregorian Decretals, it is really an independent collection, consisting, like the first authentic collection, of five books with their respective titles divided into chapters.

Hence the mode of alleging this collection is the same as that of the Gregorian compilation, with the sole difference that VI or 6° is substituted for X; hence: c. i, 6°, I, 2 = chap. 1 (Liceat), in the Liber Sextus, book 1, title 2 de Constitutione.

2. The juridical value of the Liber Sextus is nearly the same as that of Gregory's Decretals, which were not abrogated by this collection. But it invalidated all the Decretals issued between Sept. 5, 1234, and Dec. 24, 1294, and not inserted in the "Sextus" or reserved, i. e., indicated as such. The "Regulae Juris" have no legal value.[29]

ARTICLE 4

CLEMENTINAE (1317)

1. As the troublesome times required, Clement V published several constitutions, especially at the Council of Vienne in France (1313). He had them collected later, it seems, and sent to the two French universities of Orleans and Paris. This was after their promulgation at a public consistory held in the castle of Monteaux (de Montiliis), near Carpentras, in southern France. This collection, for some reason or other, was revoked by Clement himself, and only after his death (1314) were these Decretals, which had meanwhile been revised by "more skilful" hands, promulgated by his successor, [29] Schulte, l. c., II, p. 4; Friedberg, C. J. C., II, 935 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

John XXII, in the Bull "Quoniam nulla," October 25th, 1317. This collection is styled in the manuscripts "Liber Septimus," but owing to the influence of the glossators, the title was soon changed into "Constitutiones Clementinae" or simply "Clementinae." [80]

2. MATTER, ARRANGEMENT AND LEGAL VALUE.—With the exception of two decretals, one of Urban IV and one of Boniface VIII, all the "Clementinae" belong to the first Pope of the so-called "Babylonian Captivity." These decretals are, like the two preceding collections, divided into five books, and these into titles and chapters, the sum total of the latter being 106. The mode of quoting the Clementinae is, with the exception of the characteristic sign "Clem.," the same as that of the Gregorian or Bonifacian Decretals, viz.: c. 1, Clem. I, 2 de rescriptis = chapter 1, Clementinae, book 1, title 2 de rescriptis; or, as in the ancient canonists, cap. Abbates, Clem. (de rescriptis, which is not seldom omitted).

John XXII in his Bull of publication commands the addressees to receive these Decretals with good will (prompto affectu) and to make use of them in future "in the courts and schools" (in judiciis et scholis). Hence the Clementinae enjoy the same authentic valor as the decretals of Gregory IX and Boniface VIII. But it must be added that the other decretals which issued from the Apostolic See after the Bonifacian collection but not inserted or mentioned in the Clementinae, did not lose their legal value because the Clementinae contain 80 Cfr. Schulte, Quellen, II, 451 ff.; Corpus Iuris Can., ed. Friedberg, II, Prol., pp. LVII ff. Joannes Andreae in his glossa ad verbum "de caetero" in Const. "Quoniam nulla" narrates that Clement V himself revoked the collection on account of some decretals being too long, others faulty, others unsuitable, and that these mistakes were then corrected by "more skilled hands"; that John XXII changed them cannot be proved.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

no invalidating clause with regard to them, as was the case in the Bull of Boniface VIII, "Sacrosanctae."[31]

ARTICLE 5

EXTRAVAGANTES

1. Pope John XXII published several important constitutions, touching chiefly upon beneficiary subjects, not contained in the Clementinae and yet commented on by the glossators. Thus William de Monte Laudano had furnished "glossae" on three decretals of the aforesaid Pope: "Sedes apostolica," "Suscepti regiminis," and "Execrabilis," issued in the first year of John's pontificate (1317). Zenzelinus de Cassanis also composed glosses on these three constitutions and, besides, on seventeen others of the same Pontiff, in the year 1325. These twenty decretals became known as the "Decretales extravagantes, quae emanaverunt post Sextum," or later as "Extravagantes Johannis XXII." They were divided into 14 titles and 20 chapters.[32]

2. These "Extravagantes" were published by JOHN CHAPPUIS in 1501 and 1503, together with some other decretals which had emanated from the Holy See, from John XXII to Sixtus IV. Out of these materials Chappuis made a collection, which he called "Extravagantes Communes," in five books with titles and chapters. However, the fourth book (De Matrimonio) is missing, for lack of materials. The whole collection is poorly digested and cannot claim authenticity as a collection, though the decretals taken singly have the authority due to pontifical laws, as far as they are still in force (v. g., "Ambitiosae" in III, 4).[33]

31 Laurin, l. c., pp. 202 f.
32 Schulte, op. cit., II, 59 f.
33 Laurin, l. c., p. 202.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Mode of quoting:

c. 2, Extr. Joannis XXII, tit. I (suscepti regiminis),
c. un. Extr. Comm. III, 4 (Ambitiosae).

ARTICLE 6

THE "CORPUS JURIS CANONICI"

After having considered the several collections which were all published after the art of printing had been invented, either in five or in three volumes, a word must be added concerning the whole body of them, known as "Corpus Juris Canonici."

1. "Corpus Juris" was a term applied at first to any body of laws, and later, in the twelfth century, to the collection of civil laws.[34] In a Brief of Gregory XIII, "Quum pro munere pastorali," July 1, 1580, the collection containing the Decretum Gratiani, the Decretales Gregorii, the Decretales Bonifacii, the Clementinae and the two Extravagantes was styled "Corpus Juris Canonici." Hence, in a wider sense, these five collections may be said to constitute the Corpus.

In the strict sense, however, the title can be applied only to the three authentic collections, viz.: to the Decretals of Gregory IX and Boniface VIII, and the Clementinae. The nomenclature "Corpus Juris Canonici Clausum" is arbitrary and without foundation.[35]

2. If we regard the structure or make-up of the C. J. C. in its strict sense, i. e., of the three authentic collections, we find inscriptions prefixed to the single titles as well

34 Kipp, Gesch. d. Quellen d. Röm. Rechts, 1909, 168; v. Scherer, I, 270.

35 Benedict XIV, "Jam fere sextus" (Bullarium, ed. Mechlin, 1826, I, XIV); Laurin, l. c., pp. 19, 25, 225 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as to the chapters, which latter, moreover, have summaries put immediately before the text.

a) Concerning the inscriptions above the titles there is a twofold class. Some exhibit simply the subject they treat of, v. g., De Consuetudine (I, 4), while others are longer and offer a clause or sentence complete in meaning, v. g., "Ne sede vacante aliquid innovetur" (X, III, 9). The former inscriptions have no legal value, whereas the latter have.

b) The "summaria" placed at the head of nearly every chapter are additions of the glossators and, therefore, destitute of legal value.

c) Neither legal nor historical merit can be attached to the indications of the sources whence the composer pretends to have borrowed his matter.

d) As to the text itself, juridical value can be attributed only to the pars decisiva or dispositiva, regardless of whether the source is genuine or spurious, but not to the narrative part or to the allegations of the contending parties.[36]

3. Mention must be made of the various editions of the Corpus Juris Canonici which are not all of equal authority.

a) Authentic is the edition published after the commission consisting of six cardinals and fifteen "doctors" had corrected the C. J. C. at the command of Gregory XIII in Rome, in 1582.[37] But the work of the "Correctores Romani," incomplete as it is, can claim only doctrinal value.[38] However, the Roman edition had the distinction that it could be quoted in the ecclesiastical courts as well as outside of them.[39]

36 Wernz, Jus Decretalium, I, 325 f.

37 Theiner, l. c., app. I, pp. 3 f.

38 Laurin, l. c., p. 69.

39 Greg. XIII., "Quum pro munere," July 1, 1580; Friedberg, II, p. LXXXII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) Of purely private authority were the editions made by the brothers PIERRE and FRANÇOIS PITHOU, at Paris in 1687. The same holds good of the critical edition of JUSTUS H. BÖHMER, Halle, 1747, whose "emendations" are not always happy.[40] For official purposes these editions are useless.

Better and worthy of attention is the edition which EMIL FREDERICK RICHTER published at Leipsic in 1839. He used the Roman edition as basis and added textual corrections of his own. This edition can be safely used in practice, although it is not authentic.

A later critical edition is that of EMIL FRIEDBERG, published in two 4to volumes under the title, Corpus Juris Canonici. Vol. I, 1879, contains the Decretum Magistri Gratiani, Vol. II, 1881, the Decretals and Extravagantes. This edition is based on extensive MS. researches, but neglects the Roman edition and omits all glosses, though inserting the partes decisae.

40 Friedberg, II, XLII.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 3

SOURCES OF THE LAST PERIOD

1. After the golden age of Canon Law, resplendent with works and authors some of whom shall be mentioned later, there was a setting of the sun, until the Council of Trent seemed to breathe new life into the half-motionless frame of the Church at large and the skeleton of canonistic science in particular.

This gathering of learned men had, of course, for its chief aim not a reform of laws, but of morals. Still discipline and morals cannot easily be separated, and hence we see that the Council, especially in its third period, issued many important enactments bearing directly on Canon Law. These decrees form a real source of Canon Law. Pius IV confirmed them and ordained that, after they had been duly promulgated in the city of Rome, legal force should be attributed to them from the first day of May, 1564.[1]

2. But, surprising though it be, it is a fact that, at least to our knowledge, there exists no authentic collection of these decrees. Some private editions were even placed on the Index.

The most noteworthy editions are:

a) AUG. BARBOSA'S "Collectanea Bullarii aliarumve Summ. PP. Constitutionum nec non Praecipuarum Decisionum, quae ab Apost. Sede et s. Congregationibus

1 Constitutions of Pius IV: "Sicut ad sacrorum," July 18, 1564; "Benedictus Deus," Jan. 26, 1564. — The promulgation was made at the Lateran, St. Peter's, the Apost. Chancery, the Campo de' Fiori; exception was made for the "Tametsi" (c. 1, sess. 24 de ref. mat.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

S.R.E. usque ad a. 1633 emanaverunt," Lyons, 1634 (formerly on the Index).[2]

b) JOHN GALLEMART'S "Concilium Tridentinum cum Declarationibus Cardinalium ejusdem Interpretum," ed. Guerra, Venetiis 1780, 2 Vols. (formerly on the Index).

c) RICHTER and SCHULTE'S "Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini ex ed. Rom. a. 1834 repetiti," Berlin, 1864 (repr. Naples, 1869).[3]

3. Towards the close of the sixteenth century an attempt was made to gather the three authentic collections of Gregory IX, Boniface VIII, and Clement V into one body together with the decrees of the V Lateran and the Tridentine councils. Cardinal Pinello offered an undigested digest, which he styled "Liber Septimus," to Clement VIII, in 1598, whence it was also called: "Ssmi. D. N. Clementis P. VIII Decretales." However, the Pope declined the offer and Pinello's work, though printed, was never promulgated.[4]

This was the last effort to codify the laws of the Church, until PIUS X, of happy memory ("Arduum sane," March 19, 1904), instituted his commission, to which we owe the New Code.

4. After the Council of Trent (1563) the legislative activity of the Popes was by no means stayed. But this period, owing to a more intensified centralization, made it imperative for the Pontiff not to divide but rather to distribute his power among various tribunals and congregations which came into existence soon after the Council. Thus the channel of laws, as it were, was twofold: constitutions and decisions.

2 H. Reusch, Der Index, II, 74.

3 Concerning the history of the Council of Trent see Pallavicini, Istoria del Concilio di Trento, 1666; and Concilium Tridentinum, published by the Görresgesellschaft, Herder, 1901 ff.

4 Sentis, Clem. VIII. Decretales, 1870; v. Scherer, I, 275.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

a) The Constitutions emanated chiefly in the form of Bulls, sometimes also in the form of Briefs, directly from the Pontiff and touched upon matters of importance for the Church at large. These have so far not been published in an authentic collection. All the so-called Bullaria, with the exception of that of Benedict XIV,[5] are of a purely private character. The chief Bullaria are:

α) L. CHERUBINI'S Bullarium seu Collectio Diversarum Constitutionum Multorum Pontificum a Gregorio VII usque ad Sixtum V, Rome, 1586. The second and third editions of this work comprised the constitutions of the Popes from Leo I to Paul V, to which ANGELUS A LANTUSCA and JOHN PAUL A ROMA added those from Urban VIII to Clement X (Rome, 1672).

AND. BARBERI and ALEX. SPETIA published the so-called Continuatio Bullarii (Clement XIII to Gregory XVI), Rome, 1825–57.[6] Here must also be mentioned the Acta Pii IX, 1854 ff. and the Acta Leonis XIII, 1881 ff., which, however, appear to lack authentic character, whilst the Acta Pii X (Vatican Press, 1907 ff.) are authentic and official.

β) Bullarium Luxemburgense (first printed at Geneva), or Bullarium Magnum Romanum a Leone I ad Benedictum XIV, 1717–28.

γ) Turinense (Al. Tomasetti), Diplomatum et Privileg. S.R. Pont. a Leone I ad Clement. XII editio, 1857–72, without critical discernment and with a great number of printing errors.

Mention must here be made of P. COUSTANT, Epistolae RR. Pontificum a Clem. I ad Innoc. I, Paris, 1721; AND. THIEL, Epistolae RR. PP. Genuinae ab Hilario ad Pelagium II, 1868. Of value are also the Regesta edited by 5 "Jam fere sextus," 1746, sent to Bologna University.

6 Coquelines, Bullarum Amplissima Collectio, Rome, 1739–44.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

JAFFÉ, LÖWENFELD, PFLUGK-HARTUNG, EWALD-HARTMANN (Greg. I.), and P. F. KEHR.

b) The decrees and decisions of the Roman Congregations, especially those of the Congr. of the Council, were collected and published. The only authentic collections, however, are the following:

S. Rit. C. Decreta Authentica, Rome, 1898–1912, 6 Vols.

Collectanea S. C. de Propaganda Fide, Rome, 1907, 2 Vols.

The collection of decrees of the Congr. of the Council, which ran first under the name of "Libri Decretorum," from 1573 on were gathered in the Thesaurus Resolutionum S.C.C. 1718 (resp. 1745) to 1908, in 167 vols. Strictly private collections are ZAMBONI'S Coll. Declarationum S.C.C., Atrebati, 1868, 4 Vols.; PALLOTINI, Coll. Omnium Concl. et Resolv., 1564–84 (alphabetic); LINGEN and REUSS, Causae Selectae, Ratisbon, 1871. There are also many scattered volumes of decisions of the S. R. R.[7]

STUDY OF CANON LAW

It would be worth while to enter the studio of one of those learned canonists of the past in order to observe his way of studying, not only Canon Law, but also civil law, from which was borrowed the method of applying Canon Law ("ordinem placitandi ex legibus"). Then we might enter a law school and learn their manner of teaching. There, in the midst of hundreds of disciples, 7 Besides the authors mentioned above, the student may consult: Doujat, Praenotionum Canonicarum libri quinque, Venice, 1769; Sarti, O. Camal., De Claris Archigymnasii Bononiensis Professoribus, Rome, 1768, t. I; Savigny, Geschichte des Röm. Rechts im Mittelalter, 1834–54, Vols. III and IV.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

eagerly intent on the teacher's words, a Decretum might be seen on the professor's table. First, with a sonorous voice, he reads the summary of the chapter he is about to expound. After that follows the reading of the litera, i. e., the text of the chapter (or canon), with distinct accentuation and more slowly, that the students might be enabled to take down the wording in case they could not, because of poverty (books at that time were rare and expensive), or for other reasons, acquire the volume. Then the litera, if necessary,[8] is corrected, which was called emendatio literae. Hereupon the proper work of the teacher began — the exposition or expounding of the canon. This work comprised different acts: Contradictions were pointed out and solved by the method assigned by the "magister," then followed casuistry and corroboration of the explanation given and other arguments taken from the Decree or other sources.

The students under the supervision of the teacher are busy at work, engaged partly in repetitions, partly in disputations. The former are much like our modern "seminars," in which postgraduates or aspirants to the laurea expound some particular text more elaborately. Disputations were held diebus Mercurii (Wednesdays), and conducted in scholastic style — sometimes, we fear, to extravagance.

This method of training, if kept up from six to ten years, was apt to produce thorough scholars and future "masters," which title towards the end of the twelfth century was changed to "doctors." Note must be taken of the fact that the universities, being few in number, attracted the cream of professors and were efficient in maintaining a choice staff. The clerical character of 8 Cfr. Huguccio's Glossa on c. 31, C. 2, q. 6.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

these flourishing schools, endowed by Popes and Bishops with benefices and other sources of revenue, was carefully maintained and proved no hindrance to effective teaching, intense study, and good morals.[9] [9] Cfr. Schulte, Quellen, I, pp. 111 ff.; 196; II, pp. 214 f., 493, etc.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION 4

THE GLOSSATORS

If we call the epoch extending from the appearance of Gratian's Decretum to the Council of Trent the period of the Glossators, we look to the majority of writers (denominatio fit a potiori) without intending to exclude other writers and writings of a different kind.

1. Mention was made of the method the teachers were wont to employ in school. It was but natural that the work of the school should not be confined within the school-walls but also prove a fertile soil for literary products. These are, to a great extent at least, still preserved, either in the form of Glossae, or in the more stately shape of Summae and Tractatus.

In order of time the Glossae were the first literary output of the followers of the Master. A gloss [1] or verbal explanation was generally placed above the word to be explained, and therefor, called glossa interlinearis. Not rarely these glosses were placed on the margin or at the bottom of the page (glossae marginales). If continuously applied to the whole text of the Decree or the Decretals, such a series was styled apparatus.

Some authors, v. g. Bernardus Papiensis, preferred another way, viz.: that of writing commentaries, called Summae. These either followed the order of the text

1 From the Greek γλῶσσα (lingua); "dicitur expositio sententiae literam continuans et exponens, unde dicitur glossa, i. e., lingua." Doujat, l. c., l, V, c. 2, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

(Decree or Decretals) closely and uninterruptedly, or left the order of the text and exhibited only a summary, using the text for the sake of proof. In this latter case they might just as well be called Tractatus, although these, properly speaking, were rather essays on some particular subject (v. g. Durantis' "Ordo Judiciarius"). It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between Summae and Tractatus.[2] The glossators had the custom of distinguishing their glosses from those of others by certain initials or sigla, v. g. Huguccio used H., Bartholomaeus of Brescia, B. or Bart., etc.

2. We will name some of the most noteworthy glossators and authors of canonical works, retaining their Latin names, as they were then known. To the Decretum JOANNES FAVENTINUS composed an apparatus about 1179–87. CARDINALIS introduced the jus civile into the Decree. BAZIANUS (+ 1197) in his glosses employed the decretals. The famous "Glossa Ordinaria" was furnished by JOHANNES TEUTONICUS, about the year 1215. A rich glossary based upon the preceding and on the compilations is that of BARTHOLOMAEUS BRIXIENSIS, about 1240–45; it is the last gloss on the Decretum.[3]

The Decretales Gregorii were glossed by VINCENTIUS HISPANUS and BERNARDUS PARMENSIS DE BOTONE (+ 1263), whose glossa is called "ordinaria."

The "Liber Sextus" and the "Clementinae" were adorned with the glosses of JOANNES ANDREAE (+ 1348), one of the most illustrious canonists, "fons et tuba juris," as he was called.[4]

3. SUMMAE AND TRACTATUS.—An entire catalogue would be necessary to do justice to the galaxy of writers who flourished from the twelfth to the fifteenth

2 Schulte, Quellen, I, 219.
3 Ib., I, 145, 191, 172; II, 86 f.
4 His daughter Novella also taught Canon Law,— but behind a curtain!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

century. We select the best known without wishing to detract from the fame of the others. Summa Magistri Rolandi (Bandinelli), later Pope Alexander III;[5] Summa Rufini, about 1166; Summa Stephani Tornacensis (1203); Summa Simonis de Bisiano, made about 1174–79; Summa Huguccionis, about 1187; Summa Bernardi Papiensis, about 1191–98; this is a sort of compendium of Canon Law.[6]

What were called Lecturae were in fact commentaries, and might also be styled Summae. Such were composed by Innocent IV (Sinibaldus Fliscus, 1243–54), "Apparatus in quinque libros Decretalium"; HOSTIENSIS (Henricus de Seguesia, + 1271), "Lectura in Gregorii IX Decretales"; ABBAS ANTIQUUS, "Lectura seu Apparatus ad Decretales Gregorii IX," composed about 1270; ÆGIDIUS DE FUSCARARIIS (1289); JOANNES GARSIAS HISPANUS (c. 1282); GUIDO DE BAYSIO, "Commentarius in Sextum" (c. 1299–1312); GUILIELMUS DE MONTE LAUDANO (1343), "Lecturae super Sextum, Clementinas et tres Extravagantes Joannis XXII"; ZENZELINUS DE CASSANIS (the same). Of great authority are the following: PETRUS DE ANCHARANO (1416), FRANCISCUS DE ZABARELLIS (1417), ANTONIUS DE BUTRIO (1408), JOANNES AB IMOLA (1436), and especially PANORMITANUS, also called Nicolaus de Tudeschis, O.S.B., Abbas Modernus or Abbas Siculus (+ 1453),— all of whom composed commentaries on the Decretals and the Clementinae.

The following works rather resemble treatises or essays:

BERNARDUS PAPIENSIS, "Summa de Matrimonio;" "Summa de Electione;" TANCRED, "Summa de Sponsalibus et Matrimonio," and "Ordo Judiciarius;" WIL-

[5] Ed. Thaner, 1874. [6] Ed. Laspeyres, 1860.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LIAM OF DURANT (1296), called "SPECULATOR," "Speculum Legatorum," "Speculum Judiciale," "Rationale Divinorum Officiorum."[7]

Some works are especially concerned with the papal power, which was, at times, rather insipidly defended. To this class belong: JOANNES PARISIENSIS (+ 1306), "Tractatus de Regia Potestate et Papali"; ÆGIDIUS ROMANUS (Colonna, + 1315), "De Excellentia Pontificatus," "De Potestate Ecclesiastica libri tres," "De Regimine Principum"; AUGUSTINUS TRIUMPHUS (+ 1328), "Summa de Potestate Ecclesiastica";[8] RODERIC SANCIUS DE AREVALO (+ 1470), "Defensorium Status Ecclesiastici," "De Monarchia Orbis" (the Pope is the monarch of the whole universe); JOHN A TURRECREMATA (+ 1468), "De Potestate Papae et Concilii Generalis Auctoritate;" THOMAS DE VIO (CAJETAN) (+ 1534), "De Auctoritate et Potestate Rom. Pont.," "De Auctoritate Conciliorum." Of some interest are the works of DOMINICUS DE DOMINICIS (+ 1478), "De Reformationibus Romanae Curiae," "De Cardinalium Electione et Legitima Creatione," etc.[9]

7 Edited, respectively, by Wunderlich, 1841, and Bergmann, 1842.

8 Cfr. Scholz, Publizistik zur Zeit Philipps des Schönen, K.-R. Abhandl. v. Stutz, 1903, 618.

9 Cfr. Schulte, Quellen, II, passim.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

SECTION 5

POST-TRIDENTINE LITERATURE

The reformation initiated by the Council of Trent was vigorously carried out by the later Popes, who proved themselves excellent legislators. The tendency of gravitation towards the centre became more accentuated. This is very noticeable in Canon Law. Besides this centralizing tendency there are two other characteristics which single out this period from those preceding. Humanism invaded the realm of law on a side where it was particularly vulnerable by introducing historical criticism. This operation was no detriment to the science, but it might have proved dangerous in the hands of an unskilful surgeon. It has produced works of great and lasting merit.

Another innovation, less necessary and rather cumbersome, is the moralizing strain now brought into Canon Law. This was a disadvantage because it obscured the character of the Church as a public society and made the law appear to be an appendix of the confessional. The moralists entered into the vineyard of Canon Law and — but melius est silere quam loqui.

The following list may serve students especially in their selection of canonical books. The works may be divided into historico-critical writings, commentaries, and manuals; those which, for one reason or another, are preferred at the Roman Curia are marked with an asterisk.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. HISTORICO-CRITICAL WRITINGS

Besides the authors mentioned above the following may be recommended:

CARD. JOHN BAPTIST PITRA, O.S.B., "Juris Ecclesiastici Graecorum Historia et Monumenta," Rome, 1864–68; "Analecta Novissima Spicilegii Solesmensis," Tusculi, 1885; L. THOMASSIN, "Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disciplina circa Beneficia," Magontiaci, 1787; E. LOENING, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenrechts, 1878, 2 vols. (still a standard work).

2. COMMENTARIES

Although not a commentary in the proper sense, yet as embracing almost the whole range of Canon Law, we must mention the works of the "Princeps Canonistarum,"[1] BENEDICT XIV, whose Opera Omnia (Prati, 1839 ff.) are a rich source of information.

A. BARBOSA, Opera Omnia, Lugdun., 1660.

C. S. BERARDI, "Commentaria in Jus Eccl. Universum," Taurini, 1766 (critical).

DE ANGELIS, "Praelectiones Juris Canonici," Rome, 1877 ff.

L. FERRARIS, "Prompta Bibliotheca Canonica," etc., various editions, the latest by J. Bucceroni, S.J., Romae, 1885–99, 9 Vols., but with little improvement as to dates of the decisions of the S. Congregations.

*CARD. VINCENT PETRA (+ 1747), "Commentaria in Constitutiones Apostolicas," Romae, 1705–1726, 5 Vols., besides "De S. Poenitentiaria Apostolica," 1712.

E. PIRHING, S.J., "Universum Jus Canonicum," Dillingae, 1674.

1 Cfr. Hurter, Nomenclator, 3rd ed., Innsbruck, 1910, Vol. IV, col. 1595 sqq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PICHLER, S.J., "Jus Can. Universum," Ingolstadii, 1735.

*ANACLETUS REIFFENSTUEL, O.F.Min., "Jus Canonicum Universum," Antwerpiae, 1743, 3 Vols.

*JOHN BAPT. RIGANTI, "Commentaria in Regulas, Constitutiones et Ordinationes Cancellariae Apostolicae," Romae, 1744 (an important work for the Rules of the Apostolic Chancery).

SANTI-LEITNER, "Praelectiones Juris Canonici," Ratisbonae, 1898 f.

*F. SCHMALZGRUEBER, S.J., "Jus Eccl. Universum," Romae, 1843 ff., 12 Vols.

*GONZALEZ TELLEZ, "Commentaria perpetua in singulos textus quinque lib. decretal. Gregorii IX," Lugduni, 1673.

WERNZ, S.J., "Jus Decretalium," Romae, 1898 ff.

JOHN BAPT. CARD. DE LUCA (+ 1683), "Theatrum Veritatis et Justitiae" (a prolix work of motley content), Romae, 1671 f., 18 Vols.

3. MANUALS

AICHNER, "Compendium Juris Eccl.," Innsbruck, 1895.

J. DEVOTI, "Juris Canonici Universi Publ. et Privati libri quinque," Romae, 1803, 3 Vols. (still useful).

F. HEINER (S.R.R. Auditor), "Katholisches Kirchenrecht," Paderborn, 1897.

JOS. LAURENTIUS, S.J., "Institutiones Juris Ecclesiastici," Freiburg, 1903.

G. PHILLIPS, "Kirchenrecht," 1845 ff., 8 Vols.

VON SCHERER, "Handbuch d. Kirchenrechts," Graz, 1886, 2 Vols. (incomplete, but very thorough and critical).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

J. F. SCHULTE, "Lehrbuch d. Kath. Kirchenrechts," 1863.

S. B. SMITH, "Elements of Ecclesiastical Law," 1891, 3 Vols. These we have frequently consulted.

It may be permitted to add a few Benedictine authors.

PLACIDUS BOEKHN (+ 1752), "Commentarius in Jus Canonicum Universum," 1735 f. (commentary-like and extensive).

*LUD. ENGEL (+ 1674 at Melk in Austria), "Collegium Universi Juris Canonici," Salisburgi, 1671–74; ID., "Tractatus de Privilegiis et Juribus Monasteriorum," ibid.

MARTIN GERBERT (S. Blasii, + 1793), "Principia Theoriae Canonicae," 1758; "De Communione Potestatis Ecclesiasticae inter Summos Ecclesiae Principes et Episcopos," 1761; "De Legitima Ecclesiastica Potestate circa Sacra et Profana," 1761.

ROB. KÖNIG (+ 1713), "Principia Juris Can.," Salisburgi, 1691–97.

MAURUS SCHENKL (+ 1816), "Institutiones Juris Eccl. Germaniae Accommodatae," Ingolstadii, 1760; Ratisbonae, 1853.

*FRANCIS SCHMIER (+ 1728), "Jurisprudentia Canonico-Civilis," Salisburgi, 1716.

COEL. SFONDRATI (+ 1696), "Regale Sacerdotium R. Pontifici Assertum," 1684; "Gallia Vindicata," S. Galli, 1687.

GREG. ZALLWEIN (+ 1766), "Principia Juris Ecclesiastici Universalis et Particul. Germaniae," 1763 (considered one of the best manuals in its day).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

OLD AND NEW LAW

Our gloriously reigning Holy Father Benedict XV, in his Bull of promulgation, refers to the Motu proprio "Arduum sane," which was issued by Pius X, March 17, 1904, and gave rise to the present Code. In that memorable pronouncement the late Pontiff stated the reasons which prompted him as the supreme Pastor of souls, who has the care of all the churches, to provide for a new codification of ecclesiastic laws, with a view "to put together with order and clearness all the laws of the Church thus far issued, removing all those that would be recognized as abrogated or obsolete, adapting others to the necessities of the times, and enacting new ones in conformity with the present needs." We leave it to the reader and the watchmen of Sion to judge whether this purpose has been achieved. A fair-minded and unbiassed critic will certainly acknowledge the juridical genius of H. E. Cardinal Gasparri, who bore the heaviest part of the burden, and of his zealous collaborators in getting up, within the short space of twelve years, a collection covering centuries of legislation and volumes of laws and commentaries. Those who will have to make practical use of the New Code will not fail to admire, first and above all, its brevity as well as the convenient arrangement of the matter and the clearness of the style. The canonist is grateful and in his heart will muse over Virgil's verse, "Redeunt Saturnia regna," because, after a long period of relative neglect, his office again becomes important and, we dare say, necessary. For although the advantages of the New Code are undeniable, a commentary is necessary in order to grasp the full meaning of the text. This is evident from the fact that the Code embodies "nova et vetera."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The old laws must be explained, according to the general rules of interpretation indeed, but also in harmony with the traditional significance that can be gathered only from an acquaintance with bygone ages and authors. This is plainly stated in canon 6, which reads:

"The Code for the most part retains the discipline thus far in use, although it also offers opportune changes. Hence: 1.° All laws, both universal or particular, which are opposed to the laws prescribed in this Code, are abrogated, with the exception of those particular laws for which express provision is made."

The term law is to be taken in the strict sense of a written enactment. Privileges are not included, for they are special,. not particular, laws. The provision concerning particular laws must be expressly mentioned, at least in a general way. Cfr. Can. 1253 concerning feast-days, which is specially applicable to our country.

"2.° Canons which state the old law unchanged, must be understood according to the authority of the old law and therefore according to the interpretations given by recognized authors.

"3.° Canons which conform to the old law only in part, must be understood according to the old law as far as they agree with it; in so far as they differ from it, they must be explained in their own light.

"4.° When there is doubt whether an enactment of the Code differs from the old law, the latter must be upheld."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

These rules not only establish the continuity of the law, but also offer a key to the interpreter. It is evident that a society which has lasted for centuries cannot entirely overthrow and set aside all of its old laws.

Hence we find throughout the Code not only allusions to, but almost verbal restatements of, the old law. When the Code says "ex integro," which we translate by "unchanged," this term must be taken in its substantial, not verbal meaning. Thus, concerning postulation, the Code (Can. 180, § 2) is almost a repetition of the text of the Corpus Juris, though not ad verbum.

When a canon is divisible, i. e., when it partly rehearses an old law, and partly gives new regulations, the interpretation and application must necessarily conform to the old law, as well as to the ratio legis and the wording of the newly enacted part, as shall appear more fully in the course of this Commentary. It were useless to set forth examples which occur in nearly every canon. But these rules show and clearly prove that even the new Code does not make the authority of the school superfluous or useless.

"5.° All penalties not mentioned in this Code, of whatever denomination, spiritual, temporal, medicinal or vindictive (so called), whether ferendae or latae sententiae, are hereby abrogated."

The "Apostolicae Sedis" of Pius IX (1868) had a similar purpose, i. e., to reduce the penal Code to a unit and to certain limits. The new Code embodies another attempt to simplify the penal law.

"6.° As regards the other disciplinary laws thus far in use, those that are neither explicitly nor implicitly contained in this Code must be held to have lost obligatory force, unless they are found in approved liturgical books or are part of the divine law, either positive or natural."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is another guiding line along which the interpreter has to move. With the exception of natural and divine positive law and such rules as are contained in the approved liturgical books (the Pontifical, the Missal, the Roman Ritual, and the Ceremoniale Episcoporum) all disciplinary laws made by human authority cease to be binding. The commentator may take illustrations from them, but is not allowed to confound them with the existing law or to represent them as still binding.

Having before our mind these wise rules, we shall, with God's help, endeavor to comply with them scrupulously and to follow the injunction of the S. C. Sem. et Stud., Aug. 7, 1917, concerning the teaching of Canon Law.[1]

It remains to point out the division of the new Code. It consists of five books, doubtless as a remembrance of the Decretals. However, a mere glance at the Code will convince the student that the real principle of division is the threefold time-honored one according to personae, res, and actiones. The first book contains all that was embraced in the first book of the Decretals and is here called "general rules," whilst the fourth and fifth books form one subject, viz.: the actiones, with this sole difference that procedure is separated from the penal code. The second book is entitled De Personis, and the third, De Rebus. But the ancient trilogy certainly is apparent in the new Code.

1 Acta Ap. Sedis, IX, p. 439.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONSTITUTION "PROVIDENTISSIMA" OF BENEDICT XV, PROMULGATING THE NEW CODE

To Our Venerable Brethren and Beloved Sons the Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, Bishops, and Other Ordinaries, and also to the Professors and Students of the Catholic Universities and Seminaries

BENEDICT, BISHOP

SERVANT OF THE SERVANTS OF GOD

FOR A PERPETUAL REMEMBRANCE OF THE MATTER

The most provident of mothers, the Church, enriched by her Divine Founder with all the notes befitting a perfect society, from the very beginning of her existence, when, obeying the mandate of the Lord, she commenced to teach and govern all nations, undertook to regulate and safeguard the discipline of the clergy and the Christian people by definite laws.

In process of time, however, particularly when she achieved her freedom and grew greater and more widespread from day to day, she never ceased to develop and unfold the right of making laws, which belongs to her by her very constitution. She did this by promulgating numerous and various decrees emanating from the Roman Pontiffs and Ecumenical Councils, as events and times suggested. By means of these laws and precepts she made wise provision for the government of the clergy and Christian people, and, as history bears witness, wonderfully promoted the welfare of the State and civilization. For the Church was at pains not only to abrogate the laws of barbarous nations and to reduce their rude customs to civilized form, but, trusting in the assistance of the divine light, she tempered the Roman law itself, that wonderful monument of ancient wisdom, which has deservedly been called "written reason," and, having corrected its defects, perfected it in a Christian manner to such a degree that, as the ways of public and private life tended to greater perfection, abundant materials were supplied for the making of new laws both in the Middle Ages and more recent times.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

However, owing to changes in the circumstances of the times and the necessities of men, as Our Predecessor of happy memory, Pius X, wisely declared in his Motu proprio "Arduum sane," of March 17, 1904, Canon Law, no longer achieved its end with sufficient speed. For in the passing of centuries a great many laws were issued, of which some were abrogated by the supreme authority of the Church or fell into desuetude, while others proved too difficult to enforce, as times changed, or ceased to be useful to the common good. To these objections must be added that the laws of the Church had so increased in number and were so separated and scattered, that many of them were unknown, not only to the people, but to the most learned scholars as well.

Moved by these reasons, Our Predecessor of happy memory, at the very beginning of his Pontificate, considering how useful it would be for the restoration and strengthening of ecclesiastical discipline, if the serious inconveniences enumerated above were removed, decided to gather together and to digest with order and clearness all the laws of the Church issued down to our own day,

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

removing all that were abrogated or obsolete, adapting others as far as needful to the necessities and customs of the present time,[1] and making new ones according as the need and opportunity should direct. When, after mature deliberation, he put his hand to this most difficult enterprise, he deemed it necessary to consult with the Bishops, whom the Holy Ghost has chosen to rule the Church of God, and to ascertain fully their views on the matter. Accordingly, he directed that, by letter from the Cardinal Secretary of State, all the Archbishops of the Catholic world should be invited to consult with their suffragan Bishops and other Ordinaries obliged to take part in Provincial Councils, and, after such consultation, to report to this Holy See what parts of the existing ecclesiastical law in their opinion stood in need of change or correction.[2]

Then, after having called upon numerous experts in Canon Law residing in Rome and other places to collaborate in the undertaking, he commanded Our Beloved Son, Cardinal Gasparri, then Archbishop of Caesarea, to direct, perfect, and, as far as necessary, complete the work of the consultors. He also instituted a Commission of Cardinals, naming as its members Cardinals Dominic Ferrata, Casimir Gennari, Benjamin Cavicchioni, Joseph Calasanctius Vives y Tuto, and Felix Cavagnis, who, in accordance with the suggestions of Our Beloved Son Cardinal Gasparri, should diligently examine the proposed canons, and change, correct, and perfect them as their judgment directed.[3] When these five men passed away, one after the other, there were appointed in their places Our Beloved Sons Cardinals Vincent Vannutelli,

1 Cfr. the Motu proprio "Arduum sane."

2 Cfr. the Epistle "Pergratum mihi," of March 25, 1904.

3 Cfr. the Motu proprio "Arduum sane."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cajetan De Lai, Sebastian Martinelli, Basil Pompili, Cajetan Bisleti, William Van Rossum, Philip Giustini, and Michael Lega, who have admirably completed the work confided to them.

Finally, after again consulting the prudence and authority of all his Venerable Brethren in the Episcopate, he directed that to them and to all the Superiors of the Regular Orders, who are accustomed to be summoned to an Ecumenical Council, should be sent copies of the new Code finished and corrected, before promulgation, in order that they might freely manifest their observations on the proposed canons.[4]

But since, meanwhile, to the sorrow of the whole Catholic world, Our Predecessor of immortal memory passed out of this life, it became Our duty, as soon as by the secret will of Providence we began Our Pontificate, to receive with due honor the views thus collected from every quarter of those who with Us form the teaching Church. Then finally we acknowledged in all its parts, approved, and ratified the new Code of the whole of Canon Law, which had been petitioned for by many Bishops at the Vatican Council, and begun more than twelve years ago.

Therefore, having invoked the aid of Divine grace, and relying upon the authority of the Blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, of Our own accord and with certain knowledge, and in the fullness of the Apostolic power with which we are invested, by this Our Constitution, which we wish to be valid for all time, We promulgate, decree, and order that the present Code, just as it is compiled, shall have from this time forth the power of law for the Universal Church, and We confide it to your custody and vigilance.

4 Cfr. the Epistle "De Mandato," of March 20, 1912.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But in order that all concerned may be able to have a thorough knowledge of the regulations of the Code before they begin to be binding, We ordain that they shall not come into effect until Pentecost day next year, i. e., May 19th, 1918.

Notwithstanding all contrary regulations, constitutions, privileges, even those worthy of special and individual mention, and notwithstanding contrary customs, even though they be immemorial, or whatever else may run counter to this Constitution.

For no one, therefore, is it lawful willingly to contradict or rashly to disobey in any way this Our constitution, ordination, limitation, suppression or derogation. If any one should dare to do so, let him know that he will incur the wrath of Almighty God and of the Blessed Apostles Peter and Paul.

Given at Rome, from St. Peter's, on the Feast of Pentecost of the year one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, the third year of Our Pontificate.

PETER CARD. GASPARRI,
Secretary of State

O. CARD. CAGIANO DE AZEVEDO,
Chancellor of the H. R. Church.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PROFESSION OF FAITH PRESCRIBED BY THE NEW CODE

Ego N. firma fide credo et profiteor omnia et singula, quae continentur in symbolo Fidei, quo sancta Romana Ecclesia utitur, videlicet: Credo in unum Deum, Patrem omnipotentem, factorem caeli et terrae, visibilium omnium et invisibilium. Et in unum Dominum Iesum Christum, Filium Dei Unigenitum. Et ex Patre natum, ante omnia saecula.— Deum de Deo, lumen de lumine, Deum verum de Deo vero. Genitum non factum, consubstantialem Patri: per quem omnia facta sunt. Qui propter nos homines, et propter nostram salutem descendit de caelis. Et incarnatus est de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria Virgine, et Homo factus est. Crucifixus etiam pro nobis, sub Pontio Pilato: passus, et sepultus est. Et resurrexit tertia die, secundum Scripturas. Et ascendit in caelum: sedet ad dexteram Patris. Et iterum venturus est cum gloria iudicare vivos, et mortuos: cuius regni non erit finis. Et in Spiritum Sanctum, Dominum et vivificantem: qui ex Patre Filioque procedit. Qui cum Patre et Filio simul adoratur, et conglorificatur: qui locutus est per prophetas. Et Unam, Sanctam, Catholicam et Apostolicam Ecclesiam. Confiteor unum Baptisma in remissionem peccatorum. Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum. Et vitam venturi saeculi. Amen.

Apostolicas et ecclesiasticas traditiones, reliquasque eiusdem Ecclesiae observationes et constitutiones firmissime admitto et amplector. Item sacram Scripturam iuxta eum sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta Mater

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ecclesia, cuius est iudicare de vero sensu et interpretatione sacrarum Scripturarum, admitto; nec eam unquam, nisi iuxta unanimem consensum Patrum, accipiam et interpretabor.

Profiteor quoque septem esse vere et proprie Sacramenta novae legis a Iesu Christo Domino nostro instituta, atque ad salutem humani generis, licet non omnia singulis, necessaria, scilicet, Baptismum, Confirmationem, Eucharistiam, Poenitentiam, Extremam Unctionem, Ordinem et Matrimonium; illaque gratiam conferre, et ex his Baptismum, Confirmationem et Ordinem sine sacrilegio reiterari non posse.— Receptos quoque et approbatos Ecclesiae Catholicae ritus in supradictorum omnium Sacramentorum sollemni administratione recipio et admitto.— Omnia et singula quae de peccato originali et de iustificatione in sacrosancta Tridentina Synodo definita et declarata fuerunt, amplector et recipio.— Profiteor pariter in Missa offerri Deo verum, proprium et propitiatorium Sacrificium pro vivis et defunctis; atque in sanctissimo Eucharistiae Sacramento esse vere, realiter et substantialiter Corpus et Sanguinem una cum anima et divinitate Domini nostri Iesu Christi, fierique conversionem totius substantiae panis in Corpus, et totius substantiae vini in Sanguinem, quam conversionem Catholica Ecclesia Transsubstantiationem appellat. Fateor etiam sub altera tantum specie totum atque integrum Christum, verumque Sacramentum sumi.— Constanter teneo Purgatorium esse, animasque ibi detentas fidelium suffragiis iuvari. Similiter et Sanctos una cum Christo regnantes venerandos atque invocandos esse, eosque orationes Deo pro nobis offerre, atque eorum Reliquias esse venerandas. Firmiter assero imagines Christi ac Deiparae semper Virginis, necnon aliorum Sanctorum habendas et retinendas

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

esse, atque eis debitum honorem ac venerationem impertiendam.— Indulgentiarum etiam potestatem a Christo in Ecclesia relictam fuisse, illarumque usum Christiano populo maxime salutarem esse affirmo.— Sanctam, Catholicam et Apostolicam Romanam Ecclesiam, omnium Ecclesiarum matrem et magistram agnosco, Romanoque Pontifici beati Petri Apostolorum Principis successori ac Iesu Christi Vicario veram obedientiam spondeo ac iuro.

Cetera item omnia a sacris Canonibus et Oecumenicis Conciliis, ac praecipue a sacrosancta Tridentina Synodo et ab Oecumenico Concilio Vaticano tradita, definita ac declarata, praesertim de Romani Pontificis primatu et infallibili magisterio, indubitanter recipio atque profiteor, simulque contraria omnia, atque haereses quascunque ab Ecclesia damnatas et reiectas et anathematizatas, ego pariter damno, reiicio et anathematizo. Hanc veram Catholicam Fidem, extra quam nemo salvus esse potest, quam in praesenti sponte profiteor et veraciter teneo, eandem integram et inviolatam usque ad extremum vitae spiritum, constantissime, Deo adiuvante, retinere et confiteri, atque a meis subditis seu illis, quorum cura ad me in munere meo spectabit, teneri et doceri et praedicari, quantum in me erit curaturum, ego idem N. spondeo, voveo ac iuro. Sic me Deus adiuvet, et haec sancta Dei Evangelia.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART II
COMMENTARY

BOOK I

GENERAL RULES

CAN. 1

Licet in Codice iuris canonici Ecclesiae quoque Orientalis disciplina saepe referatur, ipse tamen unam respicit Latinam Ecclesiam, neque Orientalem obligat, nisi de iis agatur, quae ex ipsa rei natura etiam Orientalem afficiunt.

Though the discipline of the Oriental Church is often referred to in the Code of Canon Law, the Code itself regards only the Latin Church and does not bind the Oriental Church except in matters which of their very nature concern also the latter.

In other words, the new Code binds the Oriental Church only in so far as its dicipline is expressly mentioned therein.

This point was decided in 1907 by the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda in a decree which touches upon the binding force of the Constitutions of the Holy See.[1]

1 Cf. Collectanea P. F., 1907, II, n. 1578.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

This decree establishes that laws emanating from the Holy See are binding upon the Oriental Church,

a) if they concern matters of faith or morals;

b) if they contain matters connected with the divine or the natural law, e. g., the application of Holy Mass for the people at least sometimes during the year;

c) if the laws themselves expressly state that they are meant to bind the Oriental Church.

The Oriental Churches are distinguished from the Latin Church by their respective liturgical rites,[2] whilst in faith or dogma they are united with the Roman Pontiff. To the Oriental Church belong eight large groups with their respective subdivisions: the Byzantine Uniats with the Melchites, the Ruthenians, the Bulgarians, the Rumanians, the Italo-Greeks (in Calabria and Sicily), the Chaldees, the Copts, the Abyssinians, the Catholic Syrians, the Maronites, and the Armenians and Uniats of Malabar. The Oriental Catholics living in the U. S. remain subject to their respective Church, so far as rite is concerned, but in disciplinary matters, v. g., celibacy of the clergy, they follow the Latin Church.

CAN. 2

Codex, plerumque, nihil decernit de ritibus et caeremoniis quas liturgici libri, ab Ecclesia Latina probati, servandas praecipiunt in celebratione sacrosancti Missae sacrificii, in administratione Sacramentorum et Sacramentalium aliisque sacris peragendis. Quare omnes liturgicae leges vim suam retinent, nisi earum aliqua in Codice expresse corrigantur.

2 Cf. Cath. Encyclopedia, Vol. V, s. v. Eastern Churches. The Orientals also gain indulgences like the Latins (S. Poenit., 7 July, 1917, A. Ap. S., 1917, ix, p. 399).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code, furthermore, decrees nothing about the rites and ceremonies which the liturgical books approved by the Latin Church prescribe for the celebration of the most holy Sacrifice of the Mass, the administration of the Sacraments and sacramentals, and other sacred functions. Hence all liturgical laws retain their force unless expressly corrected in the Code.

See Introduction, supra, pp. 60 sqq.

CAN. 3

Codicis canones initas ab Apostolica Sede cum variis Nationibus conventiones nullatenus abrogant aut iis aliquid abrogant; eae idcirco perinde ac in praesens vigere pergent, contrariis huius Codicis praescriptis minime obstantibus.

The canons of the Code in no wise abrogate or derogate from the agreements entered into between the Apostolic See and different nations; these agreements therefore remain in full force, notwithstanding contrary prescriptions of the Code.

This canon is evidently intended for those countries which maintain a so-called diplomatic or juridical relation with the Holy See. Where there is complete separation between Church and State, this canon does not apply, and hence the United States and England are not directly affected. We say directly; for, if one of the countries in which the aforesaid separation prevails should acquire a territory, or part thereof, which had a concordat with the Holy See, it would be obliged to abide by the concordat until the case could be legally settled with the Apostolic See (Congregation of Extraordinary Affairs).[3] An instance of a peaceful settlement is that with the United States concerning the Philippine Islands.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 4

Iura aliis quaesita, itemque privilegia atque indulta quae, ab Apostolica Sede ad haec usque tempora personis sive physicis sive moralibus concessa, in usu adhuc sunt nec revocata, integra manent, nisi huius Codicis canonibus expresse revocentur.

Rights otherwise acquired, as well as privileges and indults hitherto granted by the Apostolic See either to individuals or to organizations remain intact if they are still in use and have not been revoked, unless expressly revoked in the canons of this Code.

The rights here mentioned are the so-called jura quaesita,[4] i. e., the legally acquired subjective rights of a third person. For instance, a bishop has the right of appointing one to a certain office; hence, though a corporation (monastery) has the right of appointing one of its members, this appointee must be presented to the Ordinary. Indults are faculties granted by the Holy See, e. g.,

3 A concordat (conventio) is a mutual agreement entered into between the Apostolic See and a State regarding matters which concern both parties, and is of the nature of a bilateral contract; cf. our Summa Iuris Eccl. Publici, 1910, p. 138 f.; there is no reason to relinquish that notion.

4 Cfr. the saying: "Ius quaesitum fortius est quam ius quaerendum." Cf. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Axioma 135, ed. Lugd. 1660, p. 89.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the triennial faculties. These remain unchanged unless the Code expressly abolishes them, and consequently all faculties obtained before the promulgation of the Code and not expressly abolished therein remain in vigor until they lapse.

CAN. 5

Vigentes in praesens contra horum statuta canonum consuetudines sive universales sive particulares, si quidem ipsis canonibus expresse reprobentur, tanquam iuris corruptelae corrigantur, licet sint immemorabiles, neve sinantur in posterum reviviscere; aliae, quae quidem centenariae sint et immemorabiles, tolerari poterunt, si Ordinarii pro locorum ac personarum adiunctis existiment eas prudenter submoveri non posse; ceterae suppressae habeantur, nisi expresse Codex aliud caveat.

Such customs, whether universal or particular, as are now in vogue contrary to the prescriptions of these canons, if they are expressly reprobated by the canons, should be amended as corruptions of the law, even though they be immemorial, and should not be allowed to revive in future; others, which are of century-long duration and immemorable, may be tolerated if the Ordinaries, with due regard to places and persons, consider that they cannot be prudently abolished; the rest shall be regarded as suppressed, unless the Code expressly provides otherwise.

On privileges and customs see infra, under the respective titles.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 6

Codex vigentem huc usque disciplinam plerumque retinet, licet opportunas immutationes afferat. Itaque:

1.° Leges quaelibet, sive universales sive particulares, praescriptis huius Codicis oppositae, abrogantur, nisi de particularibus legibus aliud expresse caveatur;

2.° Canones qui ius vetus ex integro referunt, ex veteris iuris auctoritate, atque ideo ex receptis apud probatos auctores interpretationibus, sunt aestimandi;

3.° Canones qui ex parte tantum cum veteri iure congruunt, qua congruunt, ex iure antiquo aestimandi sunt; qua discrepant, sunt ex sua ipsorum sententia diiudicandi;

4.° In dubio num aliquid canonum praescriptum cum veteri iure discrepet, a veteri iure non est recedendum;

5.° Quod ad poenas attinet, quarum in Codice nulla fit mentio, spirituales sint vel temporales, medicinales vel, ut vocant, vindicativae, latae vel ferendae sententiae, eae tanquam abrogatae habeantur;

6.° Si qua ex ceteris disciplinaribus legibus, quae usque adhuc viguerunt, nec explicite nec implicite in Codice contineatur, ea vim omnem amisisse dicenda est, nisi in probatis liturgicis libris reperiatur, aut lex sit iuris divini sivi positivi sive naturalis.

The Code for the most part retains the discipline hitherto in force, but makes some opportune changes. Thus:

1.° All laws, whether universal or particular, that are opposed to the prescriptions of this Code, are abrogated, unless some special provision is made in favor of particular laws;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Those canons which restate the ancient law without change, must be interpreted upon the authority of the ancient law, and therefore in the light of the teaching of approved authors;

3.° Those canons which agree with the ancient law only in part, must be interpreted in the light of the ancient law in so far as they agree with it, and in the light of their own wording in so far as they differ from the ancient law;

4.° When it is doubtful whether a canon contained in this Code differs from the ancient law, the ancient law must be upheld;

5.° As regards penalties not mentioned in the Code, whether spiritual or temporal, medicinal or (as they say) vindictive, whether incurred by the act itself or imposed by judicial sentence, they are to be considered as abrogated;

6.° If there be one among the other disciplinary laws hitherto in force, which is neither explicitly nor implicitly contained in this Code, it must be held to have lost all force unless it is found in approved liturgical books or unless it is of divine right, positive or natural.

This canon establishes the relation between the old and the new law of the Church, as explained in the Introduction to this Commentary, supra, pp. 60 sqq.

Can. 7

Nomine Sedis Apostolicae vel Sanctae Sedis in hoc codice veniunt non solum Romanus Pontifex, sed

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

etiam, nisi ex natura rei vel sermonis contextu aliud appareat, Congregationes, Tribunalia, Officia, per quae idem Romanus Pontifex negotia Ecclesiae universalis expedire solet.

By the term "Apostolic See" or "Holy See" in this Code is meant not only the Roman Pontiff, but also, unless a different meaning follows from the nature of the thing or the context, the Congregations, Tribunals, and Offices by means of which the Roman Pontiff is wont to transact the affairs of the universal Church.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE I

ON ECCLESIASTICAL LAWS

DEFINITION AND NATURE

An ecclesiastical law may be defined as "a stable ordinance in accordance with reason, promulgated by the legitimate authority for the common welfare of the Church."[1] It is evident that a law spells stability and should always be based upon the dictates of reason, which requires that circumstances of person, time, and place should be duly considered.

Promulgation of ecclesiastical laws is necessary because, and in so far as, the will of the legislator must, in some way or other, be manifested to his subjects.[2]

The mode of promulgation depends on the legislator himself, and consequently is subject to change. Formerly ecclesiastical laws were promulgated in the City of Rome, at the gates of St. John Lateran, at St. Peter's, at the Apostolic Chancery and the Campo de' Fiori. The "Tametsi" had to be promulgated in every parish. Now an ecclesiastical law is sufficiently promulgated when it is published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis.

CAN. 8

§ 1. Leges instituuntur, cum promulgantur.

1 Accommodated from the definition of law in general by St. Thomas, S. Theol., 1a 2ae, qu. 90, a. 4.

2 It would be subversive of authority, as all canonists maintain (cf. the commentaries on tit. II Decretal.) to assert that the validity and obligatory force of laws depends on their acceptance by the people or clergy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Lex non praesumitur personalis, sed territorialis, nisi aliud constet.

§ 1. Laws go into effect when they are promulgated.

§ 2. A law is not presumed to be personal, but territorial, unless the contrary is evident.

CAN. 9

Leges ab Apostolica Sede latae promulgantur per editionem in Actorum Apostolicae Sedis commentario officiali, nisi in casibus particularibus alius promulgandi modus fuerit praescriptus; et vim suam exserunt tantum expletis tribus mensibus a die qui Actorum numero appositus est, nisi ex natura rei illico ligent aut in ipsa lege brevior vel longior vacatio specialiter et expresse fuerit statuta.

The laws enacted by the Apostolic See are promulgated by being published in the official Acta Apostolicae Sedis, unless some other mode of promulgation is prescribed in particular cases; and they become obligatory three months after the date affixed to the number of the Acta in which they appear, unless the nature of the law requires that it take effect immediately, or unless the law itself especially and expressly fixes a shorter or longer period.

Accordingly, a law published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis bearing date of August 1, 1918, goes into effect at midnight Oct. 31 to Nov. 1, 1918.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 10

Leges respiciunt futura, non praeterita, nisi nominatim in eis de praeteritis caveatur.

Laws affect the future, not the past, unless it is expressly stated therein that they are retroactive.

A famous example of a retroactive law is the Constitution "Consensus mutuus," of February 15, 1892, by which Leo XIII decreed that "henceforth in those places in which clandestine marriages are regarded as valid, all ecclesiastical judges who have cognizance of such matrimonial causes should forthwith cease to treat the intervention of carnal intercourse between betrothed persons as a presumption (iuris et de iure) of the marriage contract, and should not acknowledge or declare such union to be a lawful marriage." (Cfr. De Smet, Betrothment and Marriage, tr. by W. Dobell, Vol. II, Bruges, 1912, p. 18.)

LEGISLATORS IN THE CHURCH

Although the Code in its general rules does not mention the persons who are empowered to issue laws, it is safe to state that the following are ecclesiastical lawgivers:

1. The Supreme Pontiff, who in matters subject to ecclesiastical legislation may issue laws binding the whole Church. This he may do without or with his counsellors, through official organs, or personally.

2. The Bishops or Ordinaries, respectively, are entitled to issue laws for their respective territories. Their laws must be in conformity with the general laws or go beyond them; but without special commission or faculties Bishops or Ordinaries are not empowered to issue laws contrary to the general law. Their legislative activity may be exercised either in synod or without.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Superiors of communities of regulars (with solemn vows), especially Generals, enjoy legislative power co-extensive with the power granted by the Supreme Pontiff and the Constitutions of their orders.

Other superiors of religious communities, if not exempt, cannot be said to possess legislative power, properly so called, although they may issue statutes and precepts.

OBLIGATION OF LAWS

In order to determine the obligatory force of a law, it must be noticed, as we have already stated, that a difference exists between divine (positive) and human laws. We may safely say that all moral laws which are based on the dictates of reason, have been laid down in Holy Writ. However, there are also positive divine laws which, per se, do not regulate the morality of acts, but determine the constitution of the Church and the Sacraments or the essentials of divine worship. These positive divine laws are out of the reach of human legislation and subject only to declaration or interpretation. They receive their obligatory force from divine law, natural and positive, and bind all the members of the Church without further injunction. Such laws evidently have no territoral limits. It is otherwise with positive human laws, which admit of distinction. Hence § 2 of Canon 8 (supra) says that a law must be presumed to be not personal but territorial, unless the contrary is evident, as, for instance, in case of the law prescribing the recital of the Breviary, which is manifestly personal.

Considering the intrinsic force of the obligation imposed by ecclesiastical law, we must make a distinction between merely prohibitive and nullifying laws. A merely prohibitive law renders an act against that law illicit, and this may be stated in barren terms, affecting merely conscience; or it may prohibit an act under penalty. In the former case we speak, with the old Roman jurisconsults, of a lex minus quam perfecta, in the latter of a lex perfecta, which has a penal sanction attached.

Digitized by Google · Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There is another species of laws, called irritantes or inhabilitantes, which are nothing else but nullifying laws, viz., such as render an act committed contrary to them null and void (lex plus quam perfecta).

Now the Code says:

CAN. 11

Irritantes aut inhabilitantes eae tantum leges habendae sunt, quibus aut actum esse nullum aut inhabilem esse personam expresse vel aequivalenter statuitur.

Only those laws are to be considered as nullifying which state in express or equivalent terms that either the act is null and void or that a [certain] person is incapable [of performing a valid act against the law].

Thus, e. g., the first degree of consanguinity renders a marriage null and void, whilst the attempted marriage of one in sacris is null by reason of the incapability of the person, expressly so declared. Equivalent means equal in force or significance so far as concerns the matter under consideration.

(Canons 12, 13, 14, and 15, infra pp. 86 sqq.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The subject of nullifying laws is continued in Canon 15.

CAN. 15

Leges, etiam irritantes et inhabilitantes, in dubio iuris non urgent; in dubio autem facti potest Ordinarius in eis dispensare, dummodo agatur de legibus in quibus Romanus Pontifex dispensare solet.

If a doubt arises as to the law, nullifying laws are not urgent; if there is a doubt regarding a fact, the Ordinary is empowered to grant a dispensation, provided there is a question of laws in which the Roman Pontiff is wont to dispense.

A dubium juris may arise from an imperfect knowledge of the existence of a law or its being in force. Such ignorance, of course, is not likely to be as common now as it was before the promulgation of the new Code. But even now, unless one is thoroughly acquainted with the law and the rules of interpretation, doubts may arise, without serious guilt, especially in cases or texts which refer to the old law.

A dubium facti may be caused by insufficient cognizance of a fact or its circumstances. Under this category falls, e. g., the whole range of nullifying impediments. Ordinaries must acquaint themselves with the customs of the Roman Curia so as to know whether or not a dispensation may be granted in certain cases.

CAN. 16

§ 1. Nulla ignorantia legum irritantium aut inhabilitantium ab eisdem excusat, nisi aliud expressse dicatur.

§ 2. Ignorantia vel error circa legem aut poenam aut circa factum proprium aut circa factum alienum no-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

torium generatim non praesumitur; circa factum alienum non notorium praesumitur, donec contrarium probetur.

§ 1. Ignorance of nullifying laws does not excuse from their observance, unless the contrary is expressly stated.

§ 2. Ignorance or error concerning a law or a penalty or a fact which touches one's own person, or a notorious fact which touches another, as a general rule is not to be presumed; if, however, there is question of a fact regarding another, which is not notorious, ignorance or error may be presumed until the contrary has been established.

This canon does honor to the juridical sense of the law-framers against a certain tendency of minimizing the valor of laws. A well known instance is that of the impediment of crime, which some authors wished to cover with the cloak of ignorance.

In regard to § 2 several observations are to be made:

a) Ignorance is the lack of necessary knowledge, whereas error is a state of mind approving falsehood for truth. The former is negative, the latter positive and hence more obnoxious, but perhaps also less imputable.

b) A notorious fact is one which is publicly known and committed under circumstances that cannot be excused by any artifice (tergiversation) or aid of law (cf. can. 2197).

c) Presumption is anticipating a judgment, or forming a judgment from probable arguments and conjectures. Hence our Code defines presumption (a means of defence, but may here serve as a definition in law) as "a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cilium vel quasi-domicilium habent et simul actu commorantur, firmo praescripto can. 14.

§ 1. General laws bind all for whom they are given, everywhere.

§ 2. Laws given for a particular territory bind only those for whom they are given and who have a domicile or quasi-domicile in that territory and actually reside therein, except as noted in Can. 14.

A general law (which term here appears to mean universal law) is one given for the entire Church and all its members, as, e. g., yearly confession, hearing Mass, etc.

Particular laws are limited to the territory for which they are given, for instance, the law governing the election of bishops in the U. S., or laws made by provincial councils and diocesan synods. Particular laws suppose residence in the territory for which they are made,—residence conditioned by domicile, which the present canon limits to domicile proper and quasi-domicile. Domicile proper, according to the Roman law,[7] which has been adopted in this matter by canonists, is a fixed habitation in a certain place (municipality, parish) with the intention of staying there always. Hence actual residence, as manifested by the purchase or leasing of a house for an indefinite time, and the intention to remain in that place permanently, are signs of a true domicile. Now-a-days such fixed habitation is rare in large cities,

7 Cf. l. 7, Cod. Iust., X, 10 de incolis: "habere domicilium non ambigitur, ubi quis larem (housegods) rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit, unde rursus non sit discessurus, si nihil avocet, unde cum profectus est, peregrinari videtur; quodsi rediit, peregrinari jam destitit."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

though frequent enough in farming districts. It is therefore entirely reasonable that a quasi-domicile should be admitted as meeting the requirements and order of law. This is established by actual residence in a certain parish or municipality with the intention of remaining there for the greater part of a year. This intention may be presumed if a person stays at least six months in the same place.[8] The distinction therefore between domicile and quasi-domicile consists in a difference of intention (animus), domicile requiring a perpetual, or at least an indefinitely protracted sojourn, whilst quasi-domicile may be established by a residence of six months. This quasi-domicile is acquired from the first day of residence if the person concerned can be proved to have had the intention of remaining there for the time stated.

This canon does not consider the monthly stay (can. 1097) peculiar to the matrimonial celebration.

The expression: "For whom they are given" (can. 13, § 1) calls for special attention. Laws given for laymen do not invariably apply to the clergy, and vice versa. Neither do all the laws intended for the secular clergy eo ipso bind the regular clergy; nor are the penal laws intended for the clergy meant for bishops and cardinals.

Some peculiarities are attached, by reason of laws being per se territorial, to foreigners (peregrini), i. e., such persons as have for the moment relinquished their domicile or quasi-domicile, although they retain it (can. 91). Of these can. 14 treats as follows:

CAN. 14

§ 1. Peregrini:

1.° Non adstringuntur legibus particularibus sui territorii quandiu ab eo absunt, nisi aut earum trans-

8 Cf. Reiffenstuel, l. II, tit. 2, nn. 17 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gressio in proprio territorio noceat, aut leges sint personales;

2.° Neque legibus territorii in quo versantur, iis exceptis quae ordini publico consulunt, vel actuum sollemnia determinant;

3.° At legibus generalibus tenentur, etiamsi hae suo in territorio non vigeant, minime vero si in loco in quo versantur non obligent.

§ 2. Vagi obligantur legibus tam generalibus quam particularibus quae vigent in loco in quo versantur.

§ 1. Strangers:

1.° Are not obliged to observe the particular laws of their own territory while they are absent therefrom, unless non-observance of these laws should prove detrimental in their own territory, or unless the laws are personal.

2.° Neither are they bound to observe the particular laws of the territory in which they are sojourning, with the exception of those that concern the public welfare or legal formalities.

3.° General laws they must observe, even though these laws are not enforced in their home territory; they are not bound to observe general laws if these laws are not binding in the place where they sojourn.

There is little to be said concerning the first clause. Some examples may illustrate the case. There is, e. g., the law binding every Catholic to support his pastor. If one is absent when the pew-rent is due, he is not, on account of his absence, free from the obligation of paying the same, because such an excuse would be detrimental to discipline. A bishop's obligation of applying Mass at stated times is incumbent on him even during his absence from the diocese, because it is personal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The second clause concerns the particular laws of the territory in which one sojourns and provides that whatever is connected with the public welfare or concerns legal formalities, must be observed by strangers (peregrini).

The Code does not mention scandal, although canonists give that as a reason for the obligation of observing particular laws. The omission is probably due to the fact that scandal may negatively be reduced to considerations of public welfare. An instance may be taken from a particular diocesan statute concerning the frequenting of dramshops, which in some dioceses is forbidden under suspension, whilst in other dioceses no such sanction is attached.

Formalities (sollemnia) are outward details which must be observed in order to make an act legal. These are partly civil, e. g., in contracts and last wills, and partly pertain to proceedings in the episcopal court.

The last clause, No. 3, touches upon general laws. An example may be furnished by the ten general holydays of obligation (can. 1247), of which only six are observed in the United States. An American travelling in countries where the ten holydays are kept, must observe them. A European, on the other hand, sojourning in this country, may conform himself to our custom.[9]

Section two added to our cannon concerns the vagi, i. e., such as possess neither domicile nor quasi-domicile. They are obliged to observe both the general and the particular laws in effect at the place where they are staying. This regulation is somewhat stricter than usually accepted by commentators. Yet it is in keeping with the civil law and is really nothing else but the consistent application of the forum competens.[10]

[9] A stricter view is taken by Suarez, De Leg. III, cc. 32 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INTERPRETATION OF LAWS

By interpretation we mean an explanation of the will of the legislator taken from the wording of the text. As the Roman emperors issued interpretations of obscure texts,[11] so did the popes, first and above all in matters of faith, but also, especially after authentic collections had been published, in disciplinary matters. The Council of Trent decreed that authentic interpretations should be given by the authority from which the law emanated. The S. C. Council was especially charged with interpreting the Tridentine decrees. Besides as the jurisconsults, too, rendered decisions or explanations, so did the canonists proffer their explanations, which at times were sought for, or at least accepted, by the Roman Court.

Thus we have a twofold interpretation, authentic and private. An authentic interpretation[12] proceeds from the maker of the law.

CAN. 17

§ 1. Leges authenticae interpretatur legislator eiusve successor et is cui potestas interpretandi fuerit ab eisdem commissa.

§ 2. Interpretatio authentica, per modum legis exhibita, eandem vim habet ac lex ipsa; et si verba legis in se certa declaret tantum, promulgatione non eget et valet retrorsum; si legem coarctet vel extendat aut

10 Cfr. c. 20, X, II, 2 de foro compet. and the commentators on the same, for instance, Reiffenstuel, II, 2, n. 44 f.; Engel, h. t., n. 11.

11 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, p. 58.

12 Authentic from the Greek αὐθέντης, means self-authorized, original, authoritative.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dubiam explicet, non retrotrahitur et debet promulgari.

§ 3. Data autem per modum sententiae iudicialis aut rescripti in re peculiari, vim legis non habet et ligat tantum personas atque afficit res pro quibus data est.

§ 1. Laws are authentically interpreted by the legislator or his successor, or by those to whom the power of interpretation has been given by either the legislator or his successor.

§ 2. An authentic interpretation, given in the form of a law, has the same force as the law itself; if it is merely a declaratory interpretation, it needs no promulgation and its obligatory force goes back to the day when the law itself was promulgated; but if the interpretation is restrictive or extensive or settles a doubt, it is not retroactive and requires to be promulgated.

§ 3. If an interpretation is given in the form of a legal judgment, or of a rescript in a special case, it has not the force of law, but binds only those persons and affects only those matters for whom or for which it is given.

As an authentic interpretation can be given only by the lawgiver or his successor and by those to whom the power of interpretation is committed by the lawgivers, the Pope and the Roman Curia (congregations, tribunals, offices) are the authentic interpreters of all those laws which proceed from the Sovereign Pontiff, whilst the Bishops or their successors are the interpreters of their own laws.

The interpreter may be in a position where he has either to extend the law or restrict it. He extends by

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

interpretation if he applies the wording or text to cases or persons not mentioned in the law or not included in the original intention of the lawgiver, although the extension is not against the lawgiver's will;[13] for instance, exemption or papal enclosure to religious without solemn vows.[14]

A restrictive interpretation takes place when the law is limited to fewer persons or cases than the wording and the mind of the legislator would seem to indicate,[15] e. g., if the people are interdicted but the clergy is not included. Besides doubts may arise, e. g. in rubrics, which must be solved. And, lastly, there may be required a merely comprehensive (declaratory) explanation, viz., one which explains the law literally, but in more obvious terms, by substituting other words.

The Code (can. 17, § 2) says that an authentic interpretation of a law is of equal force with the law itself and has the same binding power; and if it be a merely declaratory interpretation, it needs no promulgation and its obligatory force goes back to the date of the promulgation of the law itself. An interpretation that is extensive or corrective (restrictive), on the other hand, must be promulgated and is not retroactive.

There is, however, another authentic interpretation possible, viz., one demanded by parties directly interested. It may happen, for instance, that a matrimonial case, or a case of precedence, must be decided by way of interpretation. This is done by a so-called judiciary interpretation, rendered by a legitimate judge (can. 17, § 3). Evidently such an interpretation binds only the parties

13 Cfr. c. 3, 6°, III, 14.

14 Suarez, l. c., VI, cc. 2 f.; Reiffenstuel, I, 2, n. 370 f.

15 Saurez, l. c., VI, 5, 1: "Omnis restrictio legis eo tendit, ut mentem ipsam legislatoris ad pauciora coarctet, quam verba vel ratio legis prae se ferre videntur."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

concerned and in the matter decided, and outsiders are not affected thereby.

Private interpretation, viz., one given by jurisconsults not commissioned by the lawgiver, or by expert canonists (doctors), must be made in conformity with certain rules which are necessary for the right understanding of ecclesiastical — in fact of all — law. These rules are, of course, generally obeyed also by the authentic interpreters, but they are of importance especially in private interpretation and for those who wish to read and study Canon Law rightly. These rules are briefly the following:

CAN. 18

Leges ecclesiasticae intelligendae sunt secundum propriam verborum significationem in textu et contextu consideratam; quae si dubia et obscura manserit, ad locos Codicis parallelos, si qui sint, ad legis finem ac circumstantias et ad mentem legislatoris est recurrendum.

Ecclesiastical laws must be understood according to the proper meaning of the words considered in their context; if the meaning remains doubtful and obscure, recourse must be had to parallel texts in the Code, if there are any, to the purpose of the law and the circumstances surrounding it, and to the mind of the lawgiver.

Ecclesiastical laws must be interpreted in the light of their wording, as borne out by the context. Hither belong various rules culled from the Roman and the Canon Law: "Ubi verba non sunt ambigua, non est locus interpretationi;"[16] "Verba sunt intelligenda secundum [16] L. 25, Dig. 32 delegatis et fidei-com. (ed. Mommsen, 1902, p. 445).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

propriam significationem," i. e., in their usual and common signification;[17] "Verba generalia generaliter sunt sumenda," and "Ubi lex non distinguit, neque nos distinguere debemus."[18]

The context, too, must be considered, for it may be useful to compare words or sentences in the order and connection which they have with one another.

When the terms are doubtful and obscure, the interpreter must have recourse to parallel texts of the Code, and study the purpose and circumstances of the law and the mind of the legistator. Parallel texts are such as have an affinity with the subject or are expressly related to the same. Here the rule holds good: "De similibus idem est judicium."[19] Note, however, that the similarity must bear on the point at issue.

The purpose or end of the law must be regarded in such a way that the interpretation really effects the scope, hence the rule: "Certum est, quod is committit in legem, qui legis verba complectens, contra legis nititur voluntatem." The scope is sometimes, especially in long decrees, premised in the preamble, which may then serve as a guide to the interpreter.

The circumstances surrounding a law are either historical, i. e., facts which prompted the law, e. g., the removal of a parish priest, or real, i. e., actual needs and reasons of time and person.

The mind of the legislator must, of course, first and above all be deduced from the words of the law. Circumstances, context, subject, etc., also help to disclose the mind of the legislator, as well as the ratio legis, which is called the soul of the law. Hence the rule, 17 Reiffenstuel, I, 2, 390 ff.; Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, p. 59.

18 Cf. Summarium ad l. 8, Dig., 6, 2 de Publiciana.

19 Cfr. can. 701 with can. 106; c. 2, X, I, 7; c. 3, X, I, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"Non debet intentio verbis deservire, sed verba intentioni." [20]

But we must guard against the assumption that the intention of the interpreter may be carried into the text. Hence if all the means so far enumerated fail in discovering the true mind of the legislator, nothing is left but to make direct inquiry by petitioning the competent authority. Therefore we sometimes read: "Iuxta mentem," and the "mens" is set forth explicitly; but sometimes it must be guessed at, as said before.

Can. 19

Leges quae poenam statuunt, aut liberum iurium exercitium coarctant, aut exceptionem a lege continent, strictae subsunt interpretationi.

All penal laws as well as those which restrict the free exercise of rights or embody an exception to the law, are subject to strict interpretation.

The first clause of this canon is contained in the well known rule XV in Sexto: "Odia restringi, favores convenit ampliari," and rule 49, I. C.: "In poenis benignior interpretatio est facienda." Such an interpretation is neither extensive nor restrictive, but merely comprehensive; but an explanation which simply negatives the penalty is no interpretation. Strict interpretation clings to the text, and pays due regard to the mind of the legislator, but mitigates the rigor of the law as far as the ratio legis will permit. What is meant by restricting the free exercise of rights is best understood by the example of the Ordinary exercising his rights as diocesan in appointments, etc.

Exceptions from laws may be either privileges or favors of a personal nature, or particular or special laws, which latter are called exorbitantes,[21] i. e., running beyond the sphere of general or common law. For instance, a private oratory is a favor, exemption is a special law, and all these are subject to strict interpretation.

[20] Cfr. c. 11, C. 22, q. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 20

Si certa de re desit expressum praescriptum legis sive generalis sive particularis, norma sumenda est, nisi agatur de poenis applicandis, a legibus latis in similibus; a generalibus iuris principiis cum aequitate canonica servatis; a stylo et praxi Curiae Romanae; a communi constantique sententia doctorum.

If a general or a particular law contains no definite prescription concerning a case, unless there is question of applying a penalty, the rule for deciding such a case must be taken from laws given in similar cases, from the general principles of Canon Law based on equity, from the method and practice of the Roman Court, or from the common and constant teaching of approved canonists.

It is evident that a lawgiver cannot foresee or anticipate all the cases that may arise in practice in connection with his law. Hence something is always left to private judgment. Now there are four sources from which private judgment may draw aid in solving exceptional cases. They are:

1. The "usus forensis" or "auctoritas rerum similiter iudicatarum." This is nothing else but the norm of customary procedure and decisions previously rendered in 21 Cf. c. 11, C. 22, q. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cases similar to the one in dispute. Although such decisions, especially if they have emanated from the Roman tribunals, must be received respectfully, and may be followed securely, yet their force does not extend so far as not to admit of a contrary verdict if the reasons are strong enough to upset former decisions.[22]

2. The second means of deciding cases is recourse to general legal principles based on the equity of Canon Law. That equity is a means of practical interpretation and application is evident, for reason dictates that, if a law is deficient in a particular case, it should be applied according to the principles of law, indeed, but with a human feeling.[23]

The principles, of course, must be taken from Canon, not from civil law. It is surprising that the Code does not refer to civil laws at all, except in so far as concordats are concerned. Hence in interpreting the Code it would be useless to refer to civil laws, and we merely note the fact that there is no palpable trace in the New Code of "canonized" civil laws, i. e., civil laws formally sanctioned by the Church. On the other hand it is plain that just laws issued by the civil power are not spurned by the ecclesiastical authorities but accepted and proposed as binding the members of the Church.

3. The third means of applying the law is by rendering a decision in default of an existing law in accordance with the stylus curiae. From remote antiquity, as the "Liber Diurnus" [24] shows, the Roman Court or Apostolic Chancery employed a uniform, nay almost stereotyped mode of expediting affairs. This "stable method

22 Boekhn, Comment. in Jus Universum, 1735, I, 4, n. 39.

23 L. 8, Cod. Iust., III, 1: "Placuit in omnibus rebus praecipuam esse iustitiae aequitatisque quam stricti iuris rationem;"— but this feeling must not be indulged too far, lest it destroy all law. Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, p. 61.

24 Ed. Th. Sickel, 1889.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of proceeding in ecclesiastical causes and dispatching apostolic documents" is called the style of the Roman Curia. It partakes of the nature of a law for the different tribunals and the parties engaged in litigation before them.[25]

4. The last mode of propounding or expounding a case is the authority of the school. That the professional canonists have exerted a decided influence since the time of Gratian, not only upon decisions but on lawmaking itself, is well known. The "school" itself distinguished a threefold class of opinions: communissima, when all authors agreed; communis, when several weighty authors held the same opinion; controversa, when there was disagreement among canonists.[26] And it was always regarded as rash to deviate from the opinio communissima. The Code mentions the "common and constant opinion" of the school as a guiding principle in deciding a doubtful case, and justly so because such a consensus is sufficient for moral certainty. For the rest, even the opinio communissima does not constitute law.

Applying these rules, and especially that of equity, one may persuade himself that a certain law does not apply to himself under given circumstances. This may be true. However, since the law is intended for the common welfare, it is necessary to consider the rule laid down in canon 21.

CAN. 21

Leges latae ad praecavendum periculum generale, urgent, etiamsi in casu peculiari periculum non adsit.

Laws given in order to guard against a common

25 Riganti, Comment. in Reg. Canc. Ap., 45, § 1, n. 96.

26 Schulte, Quellen, 1860, I, p. 258.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

danger must be observed even if that danger in a particular case is absent.

The term "generale" here has reference to the community or body of the faithful, because a term extends to the species contained in the genus.[27] However, the term may also be taken as comprising a certain class of members, e. g., the clergy, or the laity. Thus the law of reading forbidden books binds all, the law of guarding the privilegium fori, the clergy only, etc.

CESSATION OF LAWS

CAN. 22

Lex posterior, a competenti auctoritate lata, abrogat priori, si id expresse edicat, aut sit illi directe contraria, aut totam de integro ordinet legis prioris materiam; sed firmo praescripto can. 6, n. 1, lex generalis nullatenus derogat locorum specialium et personarum singularium statutis, nisi aliud in ipsa expresse caveatur.

A later law, given by competent authority, abrogates an earlier one if it expressly says so, or if it is directly contrary to it, or re-orders the subject-matter of the older law; however, Can. 6, No. 1 of this Code remains in full force, that is to say, a general law in no wise derogates from the laws in force in particular places or with regard to particular persons, unless the contrary is expressly provided therein.

27 Cf. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Axioma 106: "Generalis dispositio omnes species comprehendit." Suarez, De Leg., III, c. 30. This is, of course, more urgent when there is necessity of professing the faith or maintaining its unity or obeying superiors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In other words, an existing law loses its force if a new law is made by which it is abolished. This may be done (a) by an act of explicit abrogation, or (b) in virtue of the prescriptions of the new law being directly opposed to that of the old, or (c) if the new law reorders the entire subject-matter of the old.

a) Papal constitutions sometimes contain the clause, "hac immutabili et in perpetunm valitura constitutione." This is merely an emphatic assertion that the law should not be recalled without reason; it does not bind the Pope's successor, because "par in parem non habet imperium." [28] If the successor expressly mentions his predecessor's law as abolished, the latter loses its force.

b) A later lawgiver may issue a law about a matter (e. g. matrimonial) which runs contrary to former laws; hence the rule, "Lex posterior generalis derogat legi priori generali."

c) A thorough overhauling of the subject-matter has the same effect, for instance, in the removal of parish priests.

However, a general law does not abrogate a particular or special law unless the intention of the lawgiver is clearly expressed to that effect in a special clause. Such a clause would be, "non obstantibus quibuscunque etiam speciali vel specialissima mentione dignis." [29] In the canon quoted the Code ordains that all particular and special laws remain in force unless the contrary is expressly stated. Thus, e. g., the particular law on episcopal nominations in the U. S. remains in force even under the new Code.

CAN. 23

In dubio revocatio legis praeexsistentis non prae-

28 Cfr. c. 20, X, I, 6 de elect.

29 Cfr. the Constitution of Benedict XV prefixed to the Code, supra, pp. 64 sqq.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sumitur, sed leges posteriores ad priores trahendae sunt et his, quantum fieri possit, conciliandae.

Where there is doubt whether or not a law has been revoked, [by the Code or by another general law], it may not be presumed that the law has been revoked, but the old law should be compared with the new, and both made to harmonize, as far as possible.

This canon expresses the law of continuity in the legislation of the Church. It would be unwarranted to assume — as has, strangely enough, been done — that the new Code came into being like a Deus ex machina and that an insurmountable wall is now erected between the Corpus Juris Canonici (in a wider sense) and the Code. The sources (fontes) quoted will show the continuity of legislation.

CAN. 24

Praecepta, singulis data, eos quibus dantur, ubique urgent, sed iudicialiter urgeri nequeunt et cessant resoluto iure praecipientis, nisi per legitimum documentum aut coram duobus testibus imposita fuerint.

Precepts given to individuals oblige those for whom they are given, everywhere, but they cannot be juridically enforced, and cease to bind when the lawgiver loses his authority, unless indeed they were imposed by a legal document or in the presence of two witnesses.

A precept (command, injunction), therefore, differs from a law, in as far as it "cleaves to the person to whom it is given" (ossibus inhaeret) and ceases with the authority or office of the one who gave it. Hence if an Ordinary has given a precept [30] to a clergyman, that precept does not bind after the death or resignation of the Ordinary, unless the precept was given peremptorily by way of an official document (not merely a paternal letter) or in the presence of two witnesses (examiners).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

30 Cfr. for inst. can. 2177, against concubinarii.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE II

CUSTOM [1]

Logically the Code now proceeds to deal with that other source of legal obligation known as Custom. Custom (consuetudo) generally speaking is a "law introduced by uniform and constant usage of the people with the consent of the legitimate power." Two elements, therefore, constitute the essence of a customary law: a material one, which consists of a certain number of repeated acts, and a formal one, which is the consent of the legislator. Canon 25 asserts that an ecclesiastical custom obtains its obligatory force solely from the consent of ecclesiastical authority.

CAN. 25

Consuetudo in Ecclesia vim legis a consensu competentis Superioris ecclesiastici unice obtinet.

An ecclesiastical custom derives legal force solely from the consent of the ecclesiastical superior.

The word unice in the text clearly refers to consent.

The Code wisely abstains from determining the nature of the consent required.

Consent may be express, i. e., given by words or conclusive signs explicitly approving a custom; or tacit,

1 Cfr. title IV of the Decretals and the commentators thereon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

given by the fact that the lawgiver, though aware of the custom and in a condition to oppose it, does not contradict; or finally, legal, which is nothing else but the will of the legislator supposedly permitting a custom. The majority of canonists teach that legal consent suffices for introducing a custom.[2] The fact that customs have been introduced which the sovereign Pontiffs at first ignored[3] and afterwards accepted, seems abundant proof for that opinion.

That legal consent is required for the validity of a custom follows from the nature of the latter as a law; a law must proceed from legitimate authority.

As to the material element or repeated acts, these must bear the character of usage, and hence be frequent, public, and uniform. Frequency supposes more than one act, at least in common parlance. They must be public because they supply the formal act of promulgation; and uniform in order to demonstrate the conviction of the people.[4] This latter quality (uniformity) calls for another requisite, viz., voluntariness. The acts constituting a custom must be voluntary, for the people, in order to create or show the persuasio juris, must be free of intrinsic and extrinsic coercion,— in other words, they must not be under the impression as if they were bound to observe the custom in question because they falsely believe it to be a law.[5] Hence the intention of obliging themselves is necessarily included in the formation by the people of a custom.

One may ask, how can any one oblige himself to com-

2 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, I, 4, n. 136 ff.

3 Cfr. c. 2, 6°, I, 2: "Quia tamen locorum specialium et personarum singularium consuetudines potest probabiliter ignorare."

4 Cfr. c. 5, X, V, 41; Bockhn, l. c., I. 4, nn. 31 ff.; Zallinger, Iustit. Iuris Eccl., l. I, tit. 4, § 228 f.

5 Cfr. the glossa on c. 11, h. t.; v. Scherer, l. c., I, p. 132.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mit a sin? This objection supposes the distinction between a custom against the law and a custom beyond the law.

A custom against the law (contra legem) does not create law, but merely removes the obligation of observing a law contrary to custom, whilst a custom beyond or besides the law constitutes a law in defect of a law (deficiente lege inducit obligationem legis). The latter alone is a custom properly speaking.[6] The objection stated supposes mala fides in those who commence a custom contrary to a law which they are supposed to know. We do not deny that those who first act against the law may be in mala fide; for they may act with a doubtful conscience, which is not permitted except under certain well-defined circumstances. However, we fairly deny that mala fides is always the first cause of acting against a law. There may be a thorough conviction that a law is no longer useful or adapted to circumstances, and hence had better be disregarded. Besides, it must be maintained that the people directly and reflexly have the will only of freeing themselves from a burden or restriction opposed to liberty, which reflexive will cannot be said to be evil in itself. Therefore mala fides must not necessarily be supposed; and even if it were present in the beginning, it may disappear afterwards. At any rate, a custom against a law may arise[7] either with or without mala fides. The next query may be: what is understood by people, for so far we have only spoken of the people in general. Canon 26 answers that question.

6 A custom according to law (iuxta legem) is strictly no custom at all, but simply a vivid expression and interpretation of an existing law; hence can. 29 says: "consuetudo optima legum interpres," which needs no comment.

7 Cf. Reiffenstuel, I, 4, nn. 142 ff.; Boekhn, I, 4, nn. 19 ff.; Wernz, Ius Decretalium, ed. 1, I, 255.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 26

Communitas quae legis ecclesiasticae saltem recipiendae capax est, potest consuetudinem inducere quae vim legis obtineat.

A community which is capable of having an ecclesiastical law imposed on it, can introduce a custom which may obtain the force of law.

Law and custom suppose a certain amount of autonomy. This is verified in corporations acknowledged as such by the Church — for we are concerned with ecclesiastical law — and hence: (a) the Church at large, (b) ecclesiastical provinces and dioceses, and (c) ecclesiastical corporations specially designed as such, for instance, religious orders, also single exempt monasteries (e. g., of Benedictines), cathedral chapters, and congregations which enjoy exemption. Congregations of religious with simple vows, or rather, let us say, diocesan institutes, are incapable of introducing a custom, primarily so-called, because they lack autonomy in the proper sense. For the same reason ecclesiastical parishes cannot form a custom, although both parishes and diocesan institutes may have observances.[8]

Two other elements essential to custom are contained in canons 27 and 28.

CAN. 27

§ 1. Iuri divino sive naturali sive positivo nulla consuetudo potest aliquatenus derogare; sed neque iuri ecclesiastico praeiudicium affert, nisi fuerit rationabilis et legitime per annos quadraginta continuos et comple-

8 Reiffenstuel, l. c., nn. 110 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tos praescripta; contra legem vero ecclesiasticam quae clausulam contineat futuras consuetudines prohibentem, sola praescribere potest rationabilis consuetudo centenaria aut immemorabilis.

§ 2. Consuetudo quae in iure expresse reprobatur, non est rationabilis.

§ 1. No custom can in any wise derogate from a divine law, be it natural or positive; nor does any custom prejudice an ecclesiastical law, unless it is a reasonable custom and has obtained for forty continuous and full years; the only custom that can obtain against an ecclesiastical law containing a clause prohibiting future customs, is a reasonable custom that has existed for a century or from time immemorial.

§ 2. No custom is reasonable which is expressly reprobated by law.

If custom is a law which is essentially reasonable, the custom itself must be reasonable. Consequently no unreasonable custom is admissible. Canonists have laid down certain marks or notes by which a custom is shown to be unreasonable. A custom is unreasonable,

a) If it is contrary to natural and divine law or if it runs counter to faith and morals;[9]

b) If it is repugnant to the constitution of the Church, e. g., if laymen would usurp ecclesiastical power,[10] if a council would set itself above the pope, if a priest would claim episcopal power, if the liberty of the Church were [9] Cc. 4, 8, 11, Dist. 12; cc. 8, 9, X, V, 3 de simonia.

[10] C. 14, X, I, 6 de elect.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

curtailed, or the free communication between pastor and faithful disturbed, etc.

c) If it is subversive of ecclesiastical discipline, for instance, contempt of censures,[11] multiplicity of benefices in the same hand,[12] and for religious communities if they should elect a superior from a different order.[13]

d) If a custom is reprobated by law.[14]

The other element is prescription,[15] which here means the time during which a custom has prevailed. Prescription, according to the Code, requires forty continuous and complete years. By this decision the Code has cut a Gordian knot and stopped much unnecessary waste of paper. The Code has gone even farther by demanding a centennial or immemorial prescription in cases where a custom is directed against an ecclesiastical law which contains a clause prohibiting future customs. For a custom beyond the law forty full years' prescription is also required.

CAN. 28

Consuetudo praeter legem, quae scienter a communitate cum animo se obligandi servata sit, legem inducit, si pariter fuerit rationabilis et legitime per annos quadraginta continuos et completos praescripta.

A custom beyond the law, which has been knowingly observed by a community with the intention of binding itself, becomes a law if it is 11 C. 5, X, I, 4: "insordescere in censuris."

12 C. 1, 6°, I, 4.

13 C. 1, Clem. I, 3.

14 Our Code employs the term "reprobata consuetudine" quite frequently.

15 Canonists of note reject prescription as a requisite for custom, but erroneously; cfr. Schulte, Quellen, I, p. 223 ff.; v. Scherer, I, 133.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reasonable and has been legitimately observed for forty full and continuous years.

Here we must revert to canon 5 (supra, p. 76) among the general norms, for it is directly connected with the present subject. This canon ordains, as we have seen, that all customs, either universal or particular, although immemorial, which are contrary to the canons here embodied and are expressly condemned as corruptions, must be set right nor be allowed to revive. Other customs, if centennial and immemorial, may be tolerated when the Ordinaries deem, according to circumstances of time and persons, that they cannot be abolished, while all other customs must be regarded as suppressed unless the Code provides otherwise. This canon states the relation of the customs in use at the time of the Code's going in force, i. e., the 19th of May, 1918, to the canons of the new Code, but it also touches future customs. Customs which are expressly reprobated in the new Code (cfr. can. 818 etc.) must be abolished because the Church regards them as corruptions. The future is considered as far as it is incumbent upon Sion's watchmen to guard against revival.

The second clause of Canon 5 treats of customs which are per se reasonable but not in keeping with the new Code. Such customs, if centennial and immemorial, may be tolerated. There seems to be a difference between a centennial and an immemorial custom, because the former term denotes a precise duration, whereas the latter implies no more than a span of time that is beyond the memory of a fairly old person; for instance, two generations may suffice to accept an immemorial custom.[16]

16 All commentators agree that "consuetudo immemorialis seu inveterata sit illa cuius initii non extat memoria." Cfr. c. 26, X, V, 40,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But canon 5 employs the conjunctive particle "et" (and), while canon 27, § 1, when speaking of prescription, employs the disjunctive particle "aut" (or). The difference lies in the introduction and abolition of customs, inasmuch as a legislator seems more ready to connive at the use of customs than at their opposition to a newly published code,— which position is entirely intelligible. However, all customs which are not of the venerable age indicated, should be suppressed, although common sense must even here have its sway; for common sense is based upon the dictates of reason and goes a long way.

CAN. 29

Consuetudo est optima legum interpres.

Custom is the best interpreter of laws.

This canon needs no further explanation in view of what we have said above.

ABOLITION OF CUSTOMS

CAN. 30

Firmo praescripto can. 5, consuetudo contra legem vel praeter legem per contrariam consuetudinem aut legem revocatur; sed, nisi expressam de iisdem mentionem fecerit, lex non revocat consuetudines centenarias aut immemorabiles, nec lex generalis consuetudines particulares.

Can. 5 remaining in full force, a custom either against or beyond the law may be revoked by a to which the Gloss adds: "diligenter notandum quod consuetudo illa ius sive privilegium inducit."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

contrary custom or law; however, a law, unless it makes express mention thereof, does not abolish centenary or immemorial customs, nor does a general law abolish particular customs.

That a contrary custom may make another custom ineffective, is evident; for custom is law, and therefore, as a law is revoked by a contrary law, so also a custom may be revoked by a contrary custom. Only we must notice that the contrary custom must fully cover the old custom and be vested with the requisites set forth above. As to the effect which a contrary law exerts upon a custom, the canon says that it does not revoke a custom unless it contains an express clause to that effect. Such clauses are: "nulla obstante consuetudine," and "nulla obstante consuetudine etiam immemoriali." The first clause revokes any general (not particular) custom less than centennial or immemorial; the second abolishes also immemorial customs. If the lawgiver wishes to do away with some particular custom, he adds the clause "non obstante consuetudine etiam particulari" or some similar expression. A custom expressly called "reprobata" is abolished even by the first-quoted simple clause.[17]

One last question: Can a custom arise against the new Code itself? The same query was made concerning customs arising against the decrees of the Council of Trent. Hence we answer with the majority of canonists:[18] A custom branded as reprobate, being unreasonable, cannot be admitted at all or only with greatest difficulty, but other customs may arise also against the new Code. For the resp. clausulae are nothing but disciplinary laws, and disciplinary laws admit of a contrary custom.

17 Cf. Reiffenstuel, I, 4, n. 190. 18 Cfr. Aichner, l. c., § 17, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE III

ON THE RECKONING OF TIME

The present title does not deal with the chronology employed in papal documents, but with the canonical method of calculating time. It may be noted that since the pontificate of Gregory VII (1073–85) the reign of each pontiff commenced with his election, and papal documents were dated according to the year of the Incarnation (25 March) or Christmas Day. Now they are dated according to the calendar year. The indictions (periods of fifteen years) have also disappeared without detriment to chronology. This premised, we will now follow the Code in its determination of the value and duration of the different components of time.

CAN. 31

Salvis legibus liturgicis, tempus, nisi aliud expresse caveatur, supputetur ad normam canonum qui sequuntur.

Aside from the liturgical laws, time must be reckoned according to the norms established in the following canons, unless a different method is expressly provided.

The liturgical norms which are here excepted from the following rules, concern the liturgical year commencing with the first Sunday of Advent, the celebration of feastdays (a vespera usque ad vesperam), as far as the office is concerned, and the gaining of indulgences. In these matters then, which were noted in the computus ecclesiasticus, the Code does not make a change.[1]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Can. 32

§ 1. Dies constat 24 horis continuo supputandis a media nocte, hebdomada 7 diebus.

§ 2. In iure nomine mensis venit spatium 30, anni vero spatium 365 dierum, nisi mensis et annus dicantur sumendi prout sunt in calendario.

§ 1. The day consists of twenty-four hours calculated from midnight; the week of seven days.

§ 2. The law reckons the month as a period of thirty days, the year as a period of 365 days, unless it is expressly declared that month and year are to be taken as they are in the calendar.

This is to be understood in the case only of several months or years being enumerated without any further designation, or in the sense of a period, where a month would equal 30 days, and vice versa.

Can. 33

§ 1. In supputandis horis diei standum est communi loci usui; sed in privata Missae celebratione, in privata horarum canonicarum recitatione, in sacra communione recipienda et in ieiunii vel abstinentiae lege servanda, licet alia sit usualis loci supputatio, potest quis sequi

1 Cf. Gavanti, Thesaurus S. Rituum, Venet., 1740, II, 17 ff.; Van der Stappen, Sacra Liturgia, Mechl., 1898, I, 123 ff. Concerning indulgences S. O. (de indulg.), Jan. 26, 1911.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tempus aut locale sive verum sive medium, aut legale sive regionale sive aliud extraordinarium.

§ 2. Quod attinet ad tempus urgendi contractuum obligationes, servetur, nisi aliter expressa pactione conventum fuerit, praescriptum iuris civilis in territorio vigentis.

§ 1. In reckoning the hours of the day, the common local usage must be followed; but in the private celebration of Mass, in the private recitation of the Breviary, in receiving Holy Communion, and in the observance of fast and abstinence, though the usual computation of time differs, one may follow the local time, true or mean, or the legal time, regional or extraordinary.

§ 2. When there is question of enforcing contractual obligations, the time prescribed by civil law should be followed, unless otherwise expressly agreed upon.

Common usage reckons the day from midnight to midnight. In some countries twice twelve hours are counted, while in others (e. g., Italy) the watch shows twenty-four continuous hours. Some liberty is granted in the private celebration of Mass, the private recitation of the Breviary, receiving Holy Communion and observing the laws of fast and abstinence. In these matters one may follow local or legal custom, although both may differ from common usage. Local custom may have accepted the real or mean solar time, whilst legal custom is that assumed by law and acknowledged in a province or country. The astronomical calculation of a day would be that of sidereal time, which differs from the mean solar time, the solar day being some three minutes and fifty-five seconds longer than the sidereal day.[2] What is of practical use, however, is to know that in the United States there are five different kinds of time, 15° of longitude corresponding exactly to one hour of time difference. The time of the 60th meridian is called Colonial, that of the 75th Meridian, Eastern, that of the 90th, Central, that of the 105th, Mountain, that of the 120th, Pacific time.[3] In fulfilling the duties mentioned in the canon, one may follow sidereal time, if one is a good astronomer, or the mean solar time, generally called "railroad time."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In matters of contract the time assumed by civil law must be followed, unless otherwise agreed upon by the contracting parties. In this country the laws of the different States will, therefore, have to be consulted.[4]

The next canon enters into details which touch more closely upon the starting and finishing point of a given period, and a distinction is drawn between juridical and calendar time. It is well known that the English law, for instance, has a double way of counting time. Thus when a deed speaks of a month, it is a lunar month consisting of 28 days, unless the context shows that a calendar month of 31 days was intended. Thus also, according to English law, when a calendar month's notice of action is required, the day on which it is served is included and reckoned one of the days; and therefore, if a notice be served on the 28th of April, it expires on the 27th of May, and the action may be commenced on

2 Cfr. Young, Manual of Astronomy, 1902, p. 84 ff.

3 Cfr. the New International Encycl., 1904, Vol. XIX, p. 291.

4 Cfr. Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, p. 141 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the 28th. The same law, however, in ecclesiastical matters calculates the month according to the calendar or solar reckoning.[5] This premised, let us see what the Code determines:

CAN. 34

§ 1. Si mensis et annus designentur proprio nomine vel aequivalenter, ex. gr., mense februario, anno proxime futuro, sumantur prout sunt in calendario.

§ 2. Si terminus a quo nec explicite nec implicite assignetur, ex. gr., suspensio a Missae celebratione per mensem aut duos annos, tres in anno vacationum menses, etc., tempus supputetur de momento ad momentum; et si tempus sit continuum, ut in allato primo exemplo, menses et anni sumantur prout sunt in calendario; si intermissum, hebdomada intelligatur 7 dierum, mensis 30, annus 365.

§ 3. Si tempus constet uno vel pluribus mensibus aut annis, una vel pluribus hebdomadibus aut tandem pluribus diebus, et terminus a quo explicite vel implicite assignetur:

1.° Menses et anni sumantur prout sunt in calendario;

2.° Si terminus a quo coincidat cum initio diei, ex. gr., duo vacationum menses a die 15 augusti, primus dies ad explendam numerationem computetur et tempus finiatur incipiente ultimo die eiusdem numeri;

3.° Si terminus a quo non coincidat cum initio diei, ex. gr., decimus quartus aetatis annus, annus novitiatus, octiduum a vacatione sedis episcopalis, decendium ad appellandum, etc., primus dies ne computetur et tempus finiatur expleto ultimo die eiusdem numeri;

4.° Quod si mensis die eiusdem numeri careat, ex.

[5] Cfr. Blackstone-Cooley, I, p. 141.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gr., unus mensis a die 30 Ianuarii, tunc pro diverso casu tempus finiatur incipiente vel expleto ultimo die mensis;

5.° Si agatur de actibus eiusdem generis statis temporibus renovandis, ex. gr., triennium ad professionem perpetuam post temporariam, triennium aliudve temporis spatium ad electionem renovandam, etc., tempus finitur eodem recurrente die quo incepit, sed novus actus per integrum eundem diem poni potest.

On account of the technical character of this canon, we shall add our explanation immediately to each paragraph.

1. If months and years are designated by their names, or in equivalent terms, they must be understood as calendar months and years. Thus the month of February must be taken as comprising 28 days; if an equivalent term is used, as, e. g., "in the next following year," let us say 1920, the leap year is understood, or 366 days, while the uneven years have each but 365 days.

2. If the starting point or date from which anything is calculated, is neither explicitly nor implicitly determined,[6] the time must be reckoned from moment to moment, thus, e. g., a suspension from the celebration of Mass for a month or two years commences on the day and hour when the letter was received by the suspended priest. The same holds good concerning the other example alleged, viz., three months' vacation a year. The canon further explains the first example thus: if the time or period is continuous (as in the case of suspension), the calendar month and year are to be understood; hence

[6] Implicitly, for instance, after Easter Sunday, or on the feast of Pentecost, next month.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if the letter of suspension arrives at 5 P. M., let us say, on the 5th of October, the suspension lasts until December 5th, 5 P. M. If the time or period is or may be interrupted, as in the example of leave of absence, a week means 7 days, a month 30 days, a year 365 days.

3. If the time or period consists of one or more months, or years, or of one or more weeks, or of several days, and the starting point is explicitly or implicitly determined, various hypotheses may arise.

1°. Months and years are always assumed to be calendar ones.

2°. If the starting point (terminus a quo) coincides with the beginning of the day, the first is included in reckoning the time, and the time or period expires with the beginning of the last day of the same number, e. g., if a two months' vacation is given, beginning August 15th, the time runs out on the morning of October 15th.

3°. If the starting point does not coincide with the beginning of the day, the first day is counted in and the term expires when the last day of the same figure is completed. Thus, if one commences a year's novitiate on the afternoon, say of the 5th of October, 1917, he can make his profession on October 6th, 1918, because the last day is complete only after the last stroke of midnight, October 5th, or as soon as October 6th has commenced.

4°. If the month has no day of the same number, say one month from January 30th, then, duly considering diverse cases, the term expires either with the beginning or ending of the last day. What "due consideration" means is evident from the two foregoing hypotheses; wherefore in the first case the month from January 30th is the 28th or 29th of February in leap years, if the terminus a quo fell on the beginning of the day; it ends on March 1st, if the terminus a quo fell on a later part of the day.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here the difficulty may be mooted as to what is understood by the beginning of a day. The Code (can. 32) merely says that the days must be completed from midnight. Civil law, generally speaking, rejects fractions of a day.[7] Canon law, by enjoining computation "from moment to moment," if nothing is said to the contrary, considers fractions.[8] Hence, speaking of the beginning of a day (initium diei), the law means that part which, according to common usage, forms the first portion of the day. How far that can be stretched, is mere guesswork; but to extend it to noon would, in our opinion, be against the intention of the law as well as contrary to common usage. Nine o'clock would be about the limit.

5°. If a recurrence of the same act at stated times is in question, the term expires on the same recurring day, but the new act may be performed throughout the whole recurring day, for instance, profession after a term of three years, temporary vows, triennial elections, for instance, October 5th, 1917 — October 5th, 1920.

Can. 35

Tempus utile illud intelligitur quod pro exercitio aut prosecutione sui iuris ita alicui competit ut ignoranti aut agere non valenti non currat; continuum, quod nullam patitur interruptionem.

The tempus utile is the time granted for exercising or prosecuting certain rights, so that in case one should ignore it or be unable to make use of it, the lapse of time would not damage or 7 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., p. 141. 8 Reiffenstuel, II, 27, n. 111.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prevent him; the tempus continuum is that which runs without interruption.

The so-called tempus utile is distinguished from the tempus continuum, i. e., time which runs continually without regard to ferial days or the presence or absence of persons, etc. For instance, if the tempus utile for a restitutio in integrum were four years, and one were not aware of having been wronged, the time would not commence with the day of the wrongdoing but with the day when the defendant realized that action must begin;[1] thus also in cases of summons or citations.

1 Cfr. Engel, I, 41, n. 11 de in integrum restitutione.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE IV

ON RESCRIPTS

A rescript is a written answer given by a legitimate ecclesiastical superior, either directly, or indirectly through the medium of a competent tribunal, to a question proposed or a favor asked for. As we have stated above, as early as the eleventh century there were two kinds of papal letters, litterae gratiae and litterae justitiae. Litterae gratiae or rescripts of favor proceed from the mere liberality — although perhaps petitioned — of the pontiff or bishop in matters wholly subject to their good pleasure and uncontested, e. g., a nomination to a domestic prelacy. Litterae justitiae refer to justiciable matter to be settled between contending parties in legal form, e. g., boundary disputes, questions of precedence, etc.

The definition says that rescripts may be granted directly or indirectly. To understand the difference between the two species note the fact that, as a general rule, the Pope issues rescripts through the ordinary Roman tribunals; yet he is not bound to use that means (can. 38).

Besides, it has become customary to send rescripts granted by the Roman Curia to an executor. The executor, as a rule, is a dignitary, i. e., one constituted in a real or honorary dignity, most commonly the Ordinary of the diocese or, for religious, the superior general or provincial. There is a distinction between the executor voluntarius and the executor necessarius; the former acts as a judge, i. e., he decides whether or not the rescript can be put into effect (can. 54); whereas the executor necessarius is obliged to sign and deliver the rescript to the person concerned. Whether an executor is voluntarius or necessarius depends on the clauses added to the rescript. If the conditional particles "si" or "dummodo" are to be found in the rescript, the executor is considered voluntarius, not a mere instrument for executing the will of the superior,[2] and hence is obliged to proceed as if he had received a mandate or authoritative commission, by which jurisdiction is given to him in the case (can. 55). These preliminary notions supposed, the Code first establishes who are capable of demanding a rescript, either from the Apostolic See or the Ordinaries, and lays down the rule that all may petition for a rescript, unless expressly incapacited under the law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 36

§ 1. Rescripta tum Sedis Apostolicae tum aliorum Ordinariorum impetrari libere possunt ab omnibus qui expresse non prohibentur.

§ 2. Gratiae et dispensationes omne genus a Sede Apostolica concessae etiam censura irretitis validae sunt, salvo praescripto can. 2265, § 2, 2275, n. 3, 2283.

§ 1. Rescripts may be freely asked both from the Apostolic See and from other Ordinaries by all who are not expressly prohibited (from asking for them).

2 Sometimes an exsecutor mixtus is inserted between the two mentioned. An exsecutor mixtus is one who is authorized to execute a gratia facienda, which is a favor granted and only needs execution; this kind of executorship may be called a "nudum ministerium."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Favors and dispensations of all kinds granted by the Holy See are valid, even if the beneficiaries are under censure, with due regard, however, to can. 2265, § 2, can. 2275, n. 3, and can. 2283.

Favors and dispensations of all kinds granted by the Holy See even to censured persons are valid, exceptis excipiendis. The law prohibits the following from asking for a rescript: All excommunicated persons, which heading includes all heretics,[3] all those excommunicated after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, and all who are personally interdicted or suspended, unless the rescript mentions the fact of excommunication. This is frequently done by the addition of the clause, "absolutis a censuris," etc., which has no other effect than to render the petitioner capable of receiving the rescript; hence de facto he is not absolved from excommunication.

It must be furthermore noted that, according to all authors, even excommunicated persons are allowed to ask for a rescript revoking their excommunication, interdict, suspension, etc., else the way of justice would be precluded to them.

CAN. 37

Rescriptum impetrari potest pro alio etiam praeter eius assensum; et licet ipse possit gratia per rescriptum concessa non uti, rescriptum tamen valet ante eius acceptationem, nisi aliud ex appositis clausulis appareat.

A rescript may be obtained for another (or [3] Cfr. c. 13, X, V, 7 de haereticis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

third) person even without the latter's consent; and though this third person may not be able to avail himself of the favor conceded by the rescript, yet the rescript is valid before its acceptance, unless otherwise provided for in the appended clauses.

The wording of this canon is not entirely clear; but comparing it with c. 28, X, I, 3, § 1, we may conclude that not only rescripts of favor, as the Decretals (l. c.) state, but also rescripts of justice, i. e., all kinds of rescripts, are valid before the act of acceptance is made by the party unable (e. g., because a heretic) to profit by the rescript.

The "appended clauses" may regard either the capability of the third person or the acceptation, which may be conditioned by circumstances of absence or other impediments.

DATE AND REQUISITES

CAN. 38

Rescripta quibus gratia conceditur sine interiecto exsecutore, effectum habent a momento quo datae sunt litterae; cetera a tempore exsecutionis.

Rescripts by which a favor is granted without the agency of an executor, take effect from the date of their signature; all others, from the date of execution.

Hence, e. g., a rescript granting a personal or, generally speaking, a private favor is valid as soon as the Pope has signed it. All other rescripts take effect from the date of the executor's signature.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What about a telephone or telegraph message? Leaving aside matrimonial and other weighty matters, the telephone or telegraph may be used in order to transmit notice whether the petition was granted or not. It is certain that the Papal Secretary of State may use this means. Generally speaking, the person from whom notice is demanded must be an official who is in a position to know. Private persons are not to be relied upon.

According to Canon 56 (infra, p. 145) the rescripts which are handed over to an executor demand execution in writing if they regard the forum externum. However, after the executor has properly investigated the matter and signed the document, he may, if asked for, transmit an answer by telephone or telegraph and send the written document afterwards. Note, however, that such a transmission is the exception, not the rule.[4]

The Code insists on written execution only for those rescripts which do not directly concern the conscience, and hence those touching the forum conscientiae may be transmitted by these "extraordinary" means, provided, of course the sigillum confessionis is safeguarded.

CAN. 39

Conditiones in rescriptis tunc tantum essentiales pro eorundem validitate censentur, cum per particulas si, dummodo, vel aliam eiusdem significationis exprimuntur.

Conditions made in rescripts are essential to their validity only if they are expressed by the 4 The Secretariate of State, 10 Dec., 1891, has declared this kind of transmission an extraordinary one. Cfr. De Smedt, De Spons. et Mat., 1910, I, p. 532, p. 547.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google particles si, dummodo, or others of the same meaning.

CAN. 40

In omnibus rescriptis subintelligenda est, etsi non expressa, conditio: Si preces veritate nitantur, salvo praescripto can. 45, 1054.

In all rescripts, even when not expressly stated, this condition must be understood: If the request is founded on truth, with due regard to can. 45 and 1054.

Phrases of similar meaning as si and dummodo are the ablative absolute, e. g. "constito de assertis" or "narratis," which is truly a conditional clause, so that if it were not verified the rescript would be invalid.[5] This condition, "si preces veritate innitantur," is implied in every rescript, with the exception of "motu proprio," with some modifications (see below). The reasons for a petition, and consequently for the validity of the grant, must actually exist at the time the rescript is signed by the grantor, provided no executor is assigned; if an executor is selected, the reason must be verified at the time when the executor signs the document. For instance, a rescript permitting a private oratory is valid when all the conditions for such an oratory are fulfilled at the date when the Ordinary (to whom such rescripts are generally directed) signs the paper. This is the meaning of Can. 41.

CAN. 41

In rescriptis quorum nullus est exsecutor, preces

5 Cf. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, de clausulis, n. 25, p. 375.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

veritate nitantur oportet tempore quo rescriptum datum est; in ceteris tempore exsecutionis.

In rescripts for which no executor is appointed, the conditions upon which the petition is based must be real at the time the rescript is signed; in all others, at the time of the execution.

It may happen, however, that the grantor, and perhaps the executor also, were deceived by the petitioner, who either did not state the full truth (subreptio) or alleged a reason which had no foundation in fact (obreptio). Such a deception may arise either from ignorance or malice.[6] This difference is not mentioned in the Code, which simply says:

CAN. 42

§1. Reticentia veri, seu subreptio, in precibus non obstat quominus rescriptum vim habeat ratumque sit, dummodo expressa fuerint quae de stylo Curiae sunt ad validitatem exprimenda.

§ 2. Nec obstat expositio falsi, seu obreptio, dummodo vel unica causa proposita vel ex pluribus propositis una saltem motiva vera sit.

§ 3. Vitium obreptionis vel subreptionis in una tantum parte rescripti aliam non infirmat, si una simul plures gratiae per rescriptum concedantur.

§ 1. Failure to state the full truth (subreptio) in the petition does not prevent a rescript from being valid and going into effect, provided mention was made of whatever the stylus Curiae requires for validity.

[6] Cfr. c. 20, X, I, 3, which chapter is called in the summary the "key of the whole title"; our canon disregards the distinction between ignorance and malice.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Neither is a rescript obtained by the allegation of a falsehood (obreptio) invalid, provided the sole reason, or at least one of the several reasons alleged, is true.

§ 3. Either defect, obreptio or subreptio, occurring in only one part of a rescript, does not invalidate the other parts, if several favors are granted simultaneously by the same rescript.

As to the first clause (§ 1), the stylus Curiae prescribes certain canonical reasons for matrimony, the different lines and degrees, as well as certain formularies to be used in obtaining faculties or dispensations from the various Roman Congregations. This customary style is, of course, best known to the agents engaged in business with these Congregations. If a petition is not properly drawn up, it is usually returned to the petitioner, to be corrected.[7]

As to § 2: The motive cause or final reason (can. 45) is the one which moves the superior to grant a petition. If, therefore, this one is false, the rescript will be null and void, and the petitioner can neither licitly nor validly use the favor granted therein.

Note that our canon makes a distinction in favor of subreptio, which the Corpus Juris did not admit under the circumstance of deliberate falsehood, either expressed or suppressed.[8] The new Code is also benign in admitting the divisibility of a rescript which contains sev-

[7] The stylus Curiae has been described above; cfr. also Putzer, Comment. in Facultates Apost., 1897, p. 15. The clausulae also belong to the "Roman Style."

[8] Cfr. c. 20, X, I, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eral favors, e. g., that of saying de requiem and reciting other prayers instead of the Breviary.

To provide for a uniform procedure and to avoid confusion, as well as to prevent rescripts from being, as it were, received stealthily, the following two canons have been inserted:

CAN. 43

Gratia ab una Sacra Congregatione vel Officio Romanae Curiae denegata, invalide ab alia Sacra Congregatione vel Officio aut a loci Ordinario, etsi potestatem habente, conceditur sine assensu Sacrae Congregationis vel Officii quocum vel quibuscum agi coeptum fuit, salvo iure S. Poenitentiariae pro foro interno.

A favor denied by one Sacred Congregation or Office of the Roman Curia cannot validly be granted by another Congregation or Office, or by the local Ordinary, even though he have the power, except with the consent of the S. Congregation or Office which handled the case first,—without, however, violating the right of the S. Penitentiary in matters of conscience.

CAN. 44

§ 1. Nemo gratiam a proprio Ordinario denegatam ab alio Ordinario petat, nulla facta denegationis mentione; facta autem mentione, Ordinarius gratiam ne concedat, nisi habitis a priore Ordinario denegationis rationibus.

§ 2. Gratia a Vicario Generali denegata et postea, nulla facta huius denegationis mentione, ab Episcopo impetrata, invalida est; gratia autem ab Episcopo

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

denegata nequit valide, etiam facta denegationis mentione, a Vicario Generali, non consentiente Episcopo, impetrari.

§ 1. No one shall ask another Ordinary for a favor refused by his own Ordinary without making mention of the refusal; if mention is made, the second Ordinary shall not grant the favor until informed of the reasons for the former Ordinary's refusal.

§ 2. A favor denied by the Vicar General and later obtained from the Bishop, without mention of the refusal, is invalid; a favor denied by the Bishop cannot validly be asked of the Vicar General without the Bishop's consent, even if mention of the refusal is made.

The underlying principle of this regulation is that the Roman Curia, as well as the Bishop and his Vicar General form a unit. Two different Bishops constitute two separate tribunals, wherefore in § 1 of Can. 44 the invalidity of the rescripts is not asserted,[9] but merely their illicitness, for the purpose touched above.

THE CLAUSE "MOTU PROPRIO"

Boniface VIII made a distinction between a rescript given "Motu proprio," which, he says, proceeds from pure liberality, and one obtained by petition.[10] In course of time, especially since Innocent VIII, "Motu proprios" became more frequent and were no longer acts of grace, 9 The "novum genus mercimonii" mentioned in c. 28, h. t., is thereby precluded.

10 Cf. c. 23, 6°, III, 4 de praebendis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

but could be petitioned for (ad instantiam); the Supreme Pontiff merely added "Motu proprio" in order to give full and unlimited effect. The new Code has partly retained this custom and partly modified it, as follows:

CAN. 45

Cum rescriptis ad preces alicuius impetratis apponitur clausula: Motu proprio, valent quidem ea, si in precibus reticeatur veritas alioquin necessario exprimenda, non tamen si falsa causa finalis eaque unica proponatur, salvo praescripto can. 1054.

Rescripts issued with the clause Motu proprio are valid, even if subreptitious, unless the final reason, if it be the only one, is falsely alleged.

For instance, if a rescript were obtained dispensing the petitioner from reciting the Breviary on account of weak eyes, and this claim rested on mere imagination, the rescript would be invalid. There are three other cases in which a "Motu proprio" is of no effect:

CAN. 46

Rescripta etiam Motu proprio concessa personae de iure communi inhabili ad consequendam gratiam de qua agitur, itemque edita contra alicuius loci legitimam consuetudinem vel statutum peculiare, vel contra ius alteri iam quaesitum, non sustinentur, nisi expressa derogatoria clausula rescripto apponatur.

A rescript, even though granted Motu proprio, is of no effect if given to a person incapable of the favor granted under the common law, or against the lawful custom or particular statute of the place, or against the acquired right of another person, unless a derogatory clause is appended to the rescript.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A rescript is invalid if given to a person who is incapable of the favor [11] granted because the law itself makes him incapable. The superior is not supposed to contradict the law. A favor is equally invalid if given against the lawful custom or a particular statute of the place or if it trenches on the lawfully acquired right of a third person. The reason for the last two provisions is the ignorance of a superior concerning particular laws and the jura tertii, which he is not supposed to infringe upon.[12] However, if a derogatory clause is appended directly affecting the incapability of the person, or particular laws, or the jus tertii, the rescript is valid. Exception is made in favor of matrimonial dispensations from minor impediments; see can. 1054.

MISTAKES IN RESCRIPTS

CAN. 47

Rescripta non fiunt irrita ob errorem in nomine personae cui vel a qua conceduntur, aut loci in quo ipsa moratur, aut rei de qua agitur, dummodo, iudicio Ordinarii, nulla sit de ipsa persona vel re dubitatio.

Errors affecting the name of the person to whom or by whom a rescript is issued, or the place where the person dwells,[13] or the favor itself, do 11 For instance, if the petitioner suffers from irregularity, defect of age, illegitimate birth. Reiffenstuel, I, 3, n. 208 f. Of course, if the rescript is issued precisely to take away these defects, the petitioner becomes capable of the favor and consequently of the rescript.

12 Cfr. c. 8, 6°, I, 3.

13 However, a mistake about the diocese would invalidate the rescript. Cfr. c. 34, X, I, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not render a rescript invalid, if the Ordinary is persuaded that no doubt exists as to the identity of the person or the thing asked for.

We may add, however, that as formerly, so now, a manifest error or an erasure in the dispositive and essential part would cast serious suspicion upon the genuineness of a papal document.[14]

PREFERENCE, INTERPRETATION, AND PRESENTATION

If several rescripts were obtained about one and the same question or subject-matter, e. g., some point of rubrics, let us say the recital of old or new canticles,[15] one rescript contradicting the other, the question arises, which one must be followed? The Code answers as follows:

CAN. 48

§ 1. Si contingat ut de una eademque re duo rescripta inter se contraria impetrentur, peculiare, in iis quae peculiariter exprimuntur, praevalet generali.

§ 2. Si sint aeque peculiaria aut generalia, prius tempore praevalet posteriori, nisi in altero fiat expressa mentio de priore, aut nisi prior impetratur dolo vel notabili negligentia suo rescripto usus non fuerit.

§ 3. Quod si eodem die fuerint concessa nec liqueat uter prior impetraverit, utrumque irritum est, et, si res ferat, rursus ad eum qui rescripta dedit, est recurrendum.

§ 1. If it should happen that two rescripts re-

14 C. 11, X, I, 3; c. 6, X, II, 22 de fide instrumentorum.

15 This happened in the Swiss-American Congregation of the Benedictine Order concerning a decree of June 9, 1915, and a rescript of later date; but the mistake was made in Rome.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

ferring to the same matter are contradictory, the rescript containing a peculiar or particular enactment must be accepted in preference to the one containing a general enactment.

§ 2. If both rescripts are alike particular or general, the one which is dated or received earlier must be preferred to that of later date, unless specific mention is made in the latter rescript of the earlier one, or unless the first petitioner, through fraud or notable negligence, has not made use of the earlier rescript.

§ 3. If the two rescripts were issued on the same day, and it is not apparent which was obtained first, both are invalid, and, if feasible, recourse must be had to the grantor.

According to § 1, a special favor is to be preferred to a general one, because "species derogat generi." [16]

Fraud may be committed by withholding the document, and notable negligence would be failure to make use of the favor granted for one year.[17]

CAN. 49

Rescripta intelligenda sunt secundum propriam verborum significationem et communem loquendi usum, nec debent ad casus alios praeter expressos extendi.

Rescripts must be interpreted according to the proper meaning of the words and common par-

16 Reg. juris 34 in 6°.

17 Cf. cc. 9, 23, X, I, 3. Fraud is possible in marriage rescripts, but especially in rescripts of justice.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lance, nor are they to be extended to cases not mentioned therein.[18]

Four kinds of rescripts must be interpreted strictly, i. e., neither extensively nor restrictively, but according to the exact wording of the text, to wit: (a) rescripts of justice which are intended to settle a controversy; (b) those which may injure the acquired rights of others; (c) those which are adverse to the special laws of private persons; and (d) those which contain an appointment to an ecclesiastical benefice. All other rescripts may be broadly and benignly interpreted; "favores ampliandi sunt." The reason for interpreting the first kind strictly is that the superior wishes to prevent litigation and this object could not be accomplished if a broad interpretation were admissible.[19] The reason for interpreting the second and third kind of rescripts strictly must be sought in the intention of the superior of defending the rights of others, especially if these are acquired by privileges, e. g., of exempt religious. The reason for a strict interpretation of rescripts in beneficiary matters lies in the fact that such rescripts favor ambition. Hence if, e. g., a dignity or office in a cathedral chapter is conferred, the two are not to be taken promiscuously. All other rescripts of favor are susceptible of a broad interpretation, because "plenissima alias in beneficiis interpretatio facienda."[20]

As to presentation, which is nothing else but the showing of the rescript to the Ordinary, it must be observed that this act, though not necessary, is at least very becoming, inasmuch as the diocesan Bishop is the proper guardian of law and discipline in his territory. Hence, in

18 C. 14, 6°, I, 3.
19 Cfr. c. 28, X, I, 3.
20 Cfr. cc. 4, 27, 6°, III, 4 de praebendis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rescripts giving faculties for various blessings the clausula is found, "cum consensu Ordinarii."

CAN. 50

In dubio, rescripta quae ad lites referuntur, vel iura aliis quaesita laedunt, vel adversantur legi in commodum privatorum, vel denique impetrata fuerunt ad beneficii ecclesiastici assecutionem, strictam interpretationem recipiunt; cetera omnia latam.

In case of doubt, rescripts which pertain to disputes, or which trench on the acquired rights of others, or which reverse the law in favor of private parties, or, finally, which were given for the attainment of an ecclesiastical benefice, demand a strict interpretation; all others may be interpreted broadly.

The following canons state the duty of presentation as limited by certain conditions.

CAN. 51

Rescriptum Sedis Apostolicae in quo nullus datur exsecutor, tunc tantum debet Ordinario impetrantis praesentari, cum id in eisdem litteris praecipitur, aut de rebus agitur publicis, aut comprobare conditiones quasdam oportet.

A rescript of the Apostolic See which designates no executor must be presented to the Ordinary of the petitioner only in case the presentation is enjoined in the document itself, or if there is question of public affairs, or if there are conditions that are subject to probation [i. e., ascertaining the truth].

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first condition is evident. The second, which concerns public acts (de rebus agitur publicis), seems to refer to such rescripts as contain a favor to be used publicly. Such favors would be, for instance, privileges attached to a sanctuary or benefice, or a distinctive ecclesiastical dress, or permission to collect alms.[21] The last condition evidently has reference to rescripts regarding oratories, matrimonial dispensations, etc.

As to the time within which rescripts must be presented, canon 52 states:

CAN. 52

Rescripta, quorum praesentationi nullum est definitum tempus, possunt exsecutori exhiberi quovis tempore, modo absit fraus et dolus.

Rescripts for the presentation of which no definite time is set, may be exhibited to the executor at any time, provided fraud and deceit are excluded.

Note that this canon does not distinguish between rescripts of justice and rescripts of favor,[22] but embraces both kinds, provided only fraud and deceit be avoided; for fraud and deceit deserve no indulgence and are contrary to the spirit of order.

21 Cfr. c. 6, X, I, 3 concerning Cistercians, who may collect tithes without heeding an apostolic rescript, unless mention is made therein of that privilege.

22 Formerly rescripts of justice had to be presented within a year from the date of receipt; the Code makes no distinction between the two species of rescripts in this regard.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE OFFICE OF EXECUTOR

We said above that it is the rule to choose an "executor" to investigate the matter and persons demanding a rescript. Certain duties, therefore, are incumbent on the executor, who may become the cause of grave mistakes which render a rescript invalid. Therefore the following canons more closely describe the functions of the executor.

CAN. 53

Rescripti exsecutor invalide munere suo fungitur, antequam litteras receperit earumque authenticitatem et integritatem recognoverit, nisi praevia earundem notitia ad eum fuerit auctoritate rescribentis transmissa.

The executor of a rescript acts invalidly if he acts before he has received the letters and determined their authenticity and integrity, unless he has been previously informed of their contents by authority of the grantor.

Hence, as soon as the executor has received the document, he must look at the signature and the seal, to ascertain whence it came; for this is to establish authenticity. Then he may peruse the contents, assuring himself that nothing substantial is wanting and that all the necessary papers are included. After that he will determine the subject-matter or nature of the case. Then he must carefully ponder over the clausulae, which contain certain conditions for the executor as well as the petitioner. Before he has done all this the executor cannot validly proceed to carry out the rescript, unless he has been informed by telegraph, telephone or other means as to the contents of the document. This information must come from the grantor or an official connected with the grantor. Next he must ascertain from the clausulae whether he is an exsecutor necessarius or voluntarius. Thus, e. g., "si constiterit" or "constito tibi," "conscientiam tuam oneramus," [23] etc., are indicative of an exsecutor voluntarius (or at least mixtus), whilst the absence of such clauses permits one to presume that he is merely an exsecutor necessarius, i. e., one who simply delivers the rescript. However, even if he is an exsecutor necessarius and cannot refuse the granting of the favor, circumstances may be such as to cause him to withhold the execution. Three cases only are enumerated.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 54

§ 1. Si in rescripto committatur merum exsecutionis ministerium, exsecutio rescripti denegari non potest, nisi aut manifeste pateat rescriptum vitio subreptionis aut obreptionis nullum esse, aut in rescripto apponantur conditiones quas exsecutori constet non esse impletas, aut qui rescriptum impetravit adeo, iudicio exsecutoris, videatur indignus ut aliorum offensioni futura sit gratiae concessio; quod ultimum si accidat, exsecutor, intermissa exsecutione, statim ea de re certiorem faciat rescribentem.

§ 2. Quod si in rescripto concessio gratiae exsecutori committatur, ipsius est pro suo prudenti arbitrio et conscientia gratiam concedere vel denegare.

23 This clausula is not, properly speaking, conditional, but intended to render the executor cautious. It means that the business is committed to the prudence of an honest man with common sense, who must follow the dictates of legal justice, but it also signifies that the executor cannot subdelegate his office. Cfr. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, de clausulis, cl. 24, p. 274.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. If a rescript commissions the executor merely to carry out its terms, he is not allowed to refuse to do so, unless it is evident that the rescript is void in consequence of a subreptio or obreptio, or the executor is satisfied that the conditions appended to the rescript are not fulfilled, or if the petitioner, in the judgment of the executor, is so unworthy of the favor granted that the grant would prove offensive to others; in the last-mentioned case the executor should not proceed to execute his commission but immediately notify the grantor.

§ 2. If the granting of a favor is committed to the executor, the latter may either grant or deny it, according to his prudent judgment and conscience.

As to the first point: The executor is supposed to know the circumstances of the petitioner, e. g., in matrimonial dispensations, and as a rule it is not difficult for him to judge whether or not the truth has been concealed. Obreptio and subreptio are mentioned, hence the executor is bound to investigate the existence or absence of the reasons alleged.

As to the second point, it will be noticed that the conditions must be fulfilled at the time of the execution, but nothing is said about the future. Hence all the conditions for a private oratory, for instance, must be previously complied with, whereas, in a rescript for a mixed marriage the future fulfillment of the conditions need not concern the executor.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

As to the third point, it may be noted that the position of the executor may become very ticklish because of the vagueness of the term indignus (unworthy). If we speak of one being indignus in an election, we mean that he lacks the required qualities. Perhaps a more reliable standard is furnished by a comparison with the refusal of administering the sacraments to "indigne petentibus." An "indignus" in the sense of our canon therefore is probably a public sinner.[24] The grant may be offensive to the faithful or to others, to whom it might give an occasion to belittle the Church. If that be the case, the executor is bound to postpone the execution and inform the grantor.

If the executor is a voluntarius, i. e., may either grant or refuse the favor according to his good judgment and conscience, all depends upon him and he must bear the consequences of his action. There is one notable consequence attending such a form of commission, viz., that the rescript expires with the death of the executor.[25]

CAN. 55

Exsecutor procedere debet ad mandati normam, et nisi conditiones essentiales in litteris appositas impleverit ac substantialem procedendi formam servaverit, irrita est exsecutio.

The executor is obliged to proceed as if he had received a mandate, and unless he shall have fulfilled the essential conditions laid down in the rescript, and followed in substance the required

24 A notorious Freemason, or a persecutor of the Church and hierarchy, a concubinarius publicus, all these would fall under the category of indigni.

25 "Arbitrium expirat morte illius, qui illud habet"; cfr. Barbosa, claus. 11, p. 364.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

form of proceeding, the execution is invalid.

A mandatum, broadly speaking, is a rescript by which a superior commands or prescribes something. There are two kinds of mandatum which may here come into question: the mandatum apostolicum, used in the provision or conferring of benefices, and the mandatum procuratorium, by which one is made procurator or empowered to act as proxy.[26] The latter is here to be considered, and what is said in general about a mandate of proxy applies to the present case, and therefore the executor must observe the form of the mandate. This he does if he grants neither more nor less than is expressed in the rescript, e. g., if the rescript permits a secularization ad tempus, the executor cannot grant it in perpetuum. He must furthermore observe the limits of the mandate as to persons, time, and conditions.[27] Finally, in rescripts of justice, the executor must follow the summary procedure explained in Book IV.

CAN. 56

Exsecutio rescriptorum quae forum externum respiciunt, scripto facienda est.

The execution of rescripts which affect the external forum must be made in writing.

CAN. 57

§ 1. Rescriptorum exsecutor potest alium pro suo prudenti arbitrio sibi substituere, nisi substitutio prohibita fuerit, aut substituti persona praefinita.

26 Reiffenstuel, I, 3, 21; I, 38, nn. 72 ff.; de procuratoribus.

27 Barbosa, l. c., Axioma 144: "quia paria sunt, non habere mandatum vel non servare formam mandati."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si tamen fuerit electa industria personae, exsecutori non licet alteri committere, nisi actus praeparatorios.

§ 1. The executor of a rescript may, if he prudently judges fit, appoint another in his place, unless such substitution is forbidden or some other person has been designated.

§ 2. If, however, an executor has been chosen by reason of his personal qualities, he may not delegate his office to another, but only the preliminary acts.

CAN. 58

Rescripta quaelibet exsecutioni mandari possunt etiam ab exsecutoris successore in dignitate vel officio, nisi fuerit electa industria personae.

A rescript may be executed by the successor in dignity or office of the original executor, unless the latter had been appointed on account of his personal qualities.

Since the code mentions no special reason for not attending personally to the affair, it is left to the executor to delegate another. Thus a Bishop may give general permission to his Vicar-general or Chancellor to attend to such matters unless such action is either expressly or implicitly forbidden; for it may be that a law does not allow the Ordinary to give such a general permission, which cases will be noted in the course of this commentary. Besides, if the executor is chosen for his personal qualities, e. g., his knowledge or acquaintance with

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

the case and the persons involved, or for peculiar merit, substitution is not permissible. The same holds good concerning the successor in dignity or office. Dignity here means jurisdiction and precedence, not merely dignitaries, for such do not succeed one other. Whether the term office is to be taken in the general sense of an ecclesiastical office, or in the stricter sense of officium, which implies neither jurisdiction nor precedence but only administration, is not stated, but the text seems to indicate the latter. Hence, e. g., the custodian of a cathedral church or the secretary or chancellor of a Bishop, are officials to the practical intent of this canon.[28]

CAN. 59

§ 1. Exsecutori fas est, si quoquo modo in rescriptorum exsecutione erraverit, iterum eadem exsecutioni mandare.

§ 2. Quod attinet ad taxas pro rescriptorum exsecutione, servetur praescriptum can. 1507, § 1.

§ 1. If an executor has made a mistake of any kind in the execution of a rescript, he has the right to repeat the execution.

§ 2. As regards the fees for the execution of a rescript, canon 1507, § 1 must be observed.

The fees for the execution of rescripts are governed by well-defined rules for each ecclesiastical province, which rules are prescribed by the Holy See, to whom also is reserved the approbation of taxation laws to be followed in a province (can. 1507).

28 Cfr. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Appellatio 126, p. 269; the custos of a cathedral or collegiate chapter is looked upon as a personatus (cf. Book II, on cathedral chapters).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RECALL AND CESSATION OF RESCRIPTS

The effect of a rescript — except it be a mere faculty — generally lasts forever or at least as long as the reason for which the petition was made. But it may be revoked. Hence

CAN. 60

§ 1. Rescriptum, per peculiarem Superioris actum revocatum, perdurat usque dum revocatio ei, qui illud obtinuit, significetur.

§ 2. Per legem contrariam nulla rescripta revocantur, nisi aliud in ipsa lege caveatur, aut lex lata sit a Superiore ipsius rescribentis.

§ 1. If a rescript is revoked by a special act of a superior, it does not lose its validity until the revocation has been duly intimated to the petitioner.

§ 2. No rescript is recalled by a contrary law, unless the law expressly so provides, or unless it is given by the superior of the one who granted the rescript.

CAN. 61

Per Apostolicae Sedis aut dioecesis vacationem nullum eiusdem Sedis Apostolicae aut Ordinarii rescriptum perimitur, nisi aliud ex additis clausulis appareat, aut rescriptum contineat potestatem alicui factam concedendi gratiam peculiaribus personis in eodem expressis, et res adhuc integra sit.

A rescript does not lose its force by reason of the vacancy of the Holy See or of a diocese, unless

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the contrary appears from the respective clausulae, or unless the rescript conveys the power of granting a favor to particular persons expressly named therein, and the matter has not yet been made the subject of litigation.

A rescript might be repealed by the issuing of another rescript, but unless the second rescript mentions the former as abolished, the former rescript remains in force. Here the act of repeal is not express and explicit and must be formally intimated to the petitioner or owner of the rescript. However, a sort of tacit recall is admitted, viz., by a contrary law, which must expressly mention the rescripts recalled or must have been issued by the superior of the one who issued the rescript. This latter clause evidently refers to the Pope in regard to a Bishop who may have granted a rescript, and means that the Sovereign Pontiff may cancel a rescript issued by an Ordinary. But here the rules of interpreting laws must be applied. The canon properly speaks of expiring rescripts. It was formerly held that rescripts of justice expired with the death or resignation of the grantor, re adhuc integra. But canon 61 makes no such distinction, and hence a rescript does not become extinct by the death of the pontiff or bishop who gave it. An exception is made when there is a clause signifying the intention of the grantor to concede the favor granted only during his life-time or for a certain limited period. Clausulae of that kind would apparently be the following: "usque ad beneplacitum nostrum," "usque ad beneplacitum Sedis Apostolicae," "donec revocavero." The first clausula would extinguish a rescript [29] at the death of the grantor, [29] Cf. c. 5, 6°, I, 3; cf. can. 73; the opinion of Laurentius, Inst.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

but the second (" usque ad benep. S. Ap.") would not, because the Apostolic See does not die;[30] nor does the last (" donec revocavero "), according to weighty authors, extinguish the rescript, because, they say, a positive act is required for the repeal of a rescript,[31] an opinion which seems to be supported by canon 60, § 1.

The other condition under which a rescript elapses at the death of the grantor consists in the direct faculty given to the executor to grant a favor to specially named persons. For in that case the executor acts as procurator, — at least this seems to be the underlying principle,— who has received a special mandate, which naturally ceases with the death of the mandans, unless the business has taken a juridical turn (res adhuc integra) and the juridical stage has been reached, if citations or summons have been legally issued or the parties have spontaneously appeared before the judge, or in this case, before the executor.[32]

The last canon of this title, which certainly has been dealt with liberally in our Code, says that if a rescript contains a privilege or dispensation, the rules for privileges and dispensations laid down in the following canons must be observed.

CAN. 62

Si rescriptum contineat non simplicem gratiam, sed privilegium vel dispensationem, serventur insuper praescripta canonum qui sequuntur.

If a rescript contains, not a simple favor, but a Iuris Eccl., n. 296, is destitute of foundation.

30 Cf. c. 5, 6°, I, 3.

31 Cf. Barbosa, l. c., claus. 43, p. 402; Reiffenstuel, I, 3, n. 263.

32 Cf. can. 1725, which settles the controversy about the moment when a matter ceases to be integra.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

privilege or dispensation, then besides [the rules laid down in the preceding canons] the regulations established in the following canons must be observed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE V

ON PRIVILEGES

A special class of laws is that dealing with privileges. A privilege (privilegium, lex privata) may be defined as "a more or less permanent concession made by the legislator against (or beyond) the law."[1]

A privilege is a law, and hence falls under the power of the legislator only in so far as he can establish laws. If a privilege contains a concession which the law prohibits, it is a privilege against the law. If a privilege grants a right beyond what the law has already granted, it is said to go beyond the law (praeter jus), as e. g., the privilege of absolving from reserved cases. Properly speaking only a privilege against the law is truly a privilege,[2] though faculties are justly enumerated among the privileges beyond the law (can. 66, § 1).

HISTORICAL NOTE

It is evident that the theory of privileges must have developed apace with the practice of the Roman See. Though privileges were granted and revoked by the popes before the great collections of ecclesiastic law were made, the doctrinal exposition of privileges began with Gratian.[3] In a famous dictum the Magister solves the objection raised by the necessity of strictly observing the canons of councils and the decrees of popes as follows: The 1 Cf. tit. 33, bk. V, Decretal., and the commentators thereon, for instance, Engel, Reiffenstuel, and Suarez, De Legibus.

2 Reiffenstuel, l. c., n. 8.

3 Cf. dictum ad c. 16, C. 25, q. 1; c. 30, C. 11, q. 1; c. 4, C. 24, q. 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Roman Church has the authority to establish laws, but she is not bound by them, because she is the head and support (caput et cardo) of all the churches, and all laws have attached to them the implicit clause, "salvo jure sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae." Hence if privileges are granted which apparently are against the common law, they do not clash with the right of the Church, because all privileges are reserved to her. From this point of view it followed, of course, that no privilege would be granted except for the honor and utility of the Church, and that privileges were revocable. Gratian's teaching was an innovation only in so far as this principle had not been laid down in any law-book before him. But in substance it simply embodied the practice which the Roman Court had followed for about a century. As the papal power developed under the "protection of St. Peter," the theory of privileges assumed a more detailed and definite form. This was the case especially in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.[4] We must add that in course of time clerical privileges and exemptions to a great extent lost their original character of privileges and became, as it were, part and parcel of the common law.

DIVISION OF PRIVILEGES

Manifold is the division of privileges. It will suffice for our purpose to note the following:

a) A personal privilege is one granted to a person for a reason inherent exclusively in that person, e. g., the wearing of the cappa magna or purple skullcap, if given not to the office but to the person. A real privilege is one attached to a thing, place, office, or dignity; e. g., the privilegium altaris or a privilege given to a sanctuary.

4 Cf. Saegmueller in the Tüb. Quartalschrift, 1907, p. 93 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A mixed privilege is one granted to a corporation or society or confraternity as such.

b) A favorable privilege is one containing a mere favor, without prejudice to a third person. An odious privilege is one involving prejudice or detriment to another, e. g., freedom from taxation or tithes.

c) Privileges are granted in various forms, either in writing or by word of mouth, either motu proprio or by petition, either absolutely (per se) or ad instar. A privilege granted in writing is always safer. A written document is required where injury to another is involved, unless an orally granted privilege can be proved by witnesses. Otherwise an oral privilege may be used personally as long as no legitimate authority or injured third party demands proof (can. 79).

d) A privilege given absolutely or per se is one granted without respect or reference to pre-existing privileges. A privilege ad instar refers directly to a pre-existing pattern. Thus, e. g., most of the privileges granted to religious and confraternities are ad instar.

ACQUISITION OF PRIVILEGES

A privilege being a law in favor of private persons, proceeds from the same power as the law. Hence the Sovereign Pontiff can grant privileges against the common ecclesiastical law, but not against the natural or divine law. It matters little, per se, whether he concedes these privileges in writing or orally (vivae vocis oraculo), directly, i. e., absolutely, or indirectly, i. e., ad instar, for he has the power to choose the mode of granting privileges. Hence the first canon of this title declares that privileges may be obtained both by direct concession and communication and through legitimate custom or prescription, and that centennial or immemorial possession creates a presumption in favor of a privilege.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:51 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 63

§ 1. Privilegia acquiri possunt non solum per directam concessionem competentis auctoritatis et per communicationem, sed etiam per legitimam consuetudinem aut praescriptionem.

§ 2. Possessio centenaria vel immemorabilis inducit praesumptionem concessi privilegii.

§ 1. Privileges can be acquired not only by direct concession on the part of legitimate authority and by communication, but likewise by legitimate custom or prescription.

§ 2. Centenary or immemorial possession of a privilege is a presumption in favor of its genuineness.

There is, then, a threefold way of acquiring ecclesiastical privileges: by direct concession on the part of a competent authority (pope or bishop), by communication, and by prescription.

The first is evident and needs no explanation.

Communication means partaking of a privilege either by extension or by aggregation (per connectionem). Thus if a confraternity is aggregated to an archconfraternity, it shares the privileges of the latter. A privilege may be acquired also by explicit application, the privileges granted to some being expressly conceded to others in the same manner, measure and form, yet with the effect that the latter grantees enjoy these privileges absolutely and independently of the former. This is called communicatio plena et absoluta, or aeque principalis, whilst the former is communicatio imperfecta et relativa or accessoria. A complete and absolute communication of privileges formerly took place between all mendicant orders. Excepted from communication are the so-called "exorbitant" privileges and such as are styled "incommunicable."[5]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The third method of acquiring a privilege is by custom or prescription. This has been the general teaching of canonists, based on a famous decretal of Innocent III. In this decretal the words "contraria consuetudo" occur,[6] and, since all canonists insisted on prescription, they simply said: "privilegium potest acquiri praescriptione seu consuetudine legitime praescripta."[7] This opinio communis receives, as it were, official sanction in the present canon.

The length of time required for prescription must be measured according to canons 27 f., quoted above; it is, besides, determined more closely by § 2 of can. 63.

Possession here means, not only actual occupation but the right of possessing a thing.[8] Such possession lasting for a century or time immemorial creates a presumption that the privilege is real and authentic. This presumption, not being further described, is to be taken as a simple praesumptio juris, which must cede to truth if conclusively disproved. Thus, e. g., if it be proved that regulars who have held a parish for forty or more years, never obtained a privilege to that effect, the Bishop can claim the parish for the secular clergy.

5 Only if a Bull contains the words, "etiam incommunicabilia," are these privileges included; see, e. g., the Const. of Urban VIII, "Plantata," of July 12, 1633, in the Bullarium Cong. Angl. O.S.B., 1912, pp. 5 ff.

6 C. 13, Novit., X, II, 1 de judiciis.

7 Reiffenstuel, V, 33, n. 39.

8 "Detentio rei corporis et animi et juris adminiculo."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The legislator now turns to the second mode of acquiring a privilege, which is more subject to abuse.

CAN. 64

Per communicationem privilegiorum, etiam in forma aeque principali, ea tantum privilegia impertita censentur, quae directe, perpetuo et sine speciali relatione ad certum locum aut rem aut personam concessa fuerant primo privilegiario, habita etiam ratione capacitatis subiecti, cui fit communicatio.

In the communication of privileges, even that called aeque principalis, only those privileges are included which were imparted to the original grantee directly, forever, and without special relation to a certain place, thing or person, and with due consideration of the capability of the receiver.

Evidently the Code wishes to clear up the nature of communicatio, especially as espoused by religious orders; yet, in the main, it adopts the ancient solid doctrine. Privileges which were not directly granted cannot be communicated. This provision is perhaps new, but it is wholesome, for otherwise privileges might be claimed over which the legislator has no control, and unduly multiplied. Religious orders under this canon cannot by communication claim a privilege which was already granted to another order by communication. However, this law is not retroactive, and hence the orders may retain what they possess, except where the Code rules differently.

A privilege, to be communicable, must have been

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

granted forever. Therefore spiritual favors granted ad quinquennium, e. g., are not communicable.[9]

Lastly, privileges granted to particular persons, places, or things cannot be transferred to others. For instance, the privilege of wearing a purple skullcap, given on account of personal merit and distinction, the privilege given to a special sanctuary or to a particular altar or sacred object, are incommunicable.

Note, too, that the persons or subjects to whom a communication of privilege is made, are capable thereof only in so far as their condition and position render them apt. Thus nuns (moniales) are not capable of enjoying all the privileges granted to monks or regulars, e. g., that of preaching, absolving, etc., although they may be capable of others.

The following canon determines the extent of a communicatio accessoria (ad instar):

CAN. 65

Cum privilegia acquiruntur per communicationem in forma accessoria, augentur, imminuuntur vel amittuntur ipso facto, si forte augeantur, imminuantur vel cessent in principali privilegiario; secus si acquirantur per communicationem in forma aeque principali.

Privileges acquired by communication in forma accessoria, are increased, diminished or lost to the second grantee in proportion to their increase, decrease, or loss in the original grantee; which rule is not, however, to be applied to the communicatio absoluta or aeque principalis.

9 Cf. Antonius de Spiritu S., Ord. Carm., Directorium Regular., tract. I, disp. 1, sectio 3, n. 42.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Hence, if an archconfraternity loses a part or all of its indulgences, they are also lost to the aggregated confraternities. This rule does not hold good in the communication of religious orders, wherefore, if one religious community were suppressed, another, which had received a privilege from it by communication, might continue to enjoy the same.

FACULTIES

A special canon treats of faculties, which term here means certain rights denied by common law but granted by special privilege. It follows from the nature of a faculty that it can be given only by one who can modify the common law. This one is primarily the Pope, though bishops also may grant faculties concerning matters subject to their legislation.[10] Since the sixteenth century special faculties were granted chiefly to the German bishops, and classified in certain formularies, pro foro externo and pro foro interno, quinquennales and triennales, and for a determined number of cases.[11] Their object is as wide as ecclesiastical discipline itself, and comprises especially dispensations, absolutions, and licenses for performing acts otherwise prohibited by law, e. g., reading forbidden books.

The Code says with regard to these faculties:

CAN. 66

§ 1. Facultates habituales quae conceduntur vel in 10 For instance, hearing confessions, preaching, etc.

11 Cf. Putzer, Comment. in Facult. apost., 1897, ed. 4.—For the formularies containing the faculties granted to the bishops of the U. S. see Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moralis, 1917. p. 1081 ff. These faculties, His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate, Most Rev. J. Bonzano, had the kindness to inform the author, are extraordinary, and therefore liable to modification or repeal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

perpetuum vel ad praefinitum tempus aut certum numerum casuum, accensentur privilegiis praeter ius.

§ 2. Nisi in earum concessione electa fuerit industria personae aut aliud expresse cautum sit, facultates habituales, Episcopo aliisve de quibus in can. 198, § 1 ab Apostolica Sede concessae, non evanescunt, resoluto iure Ordinarii cui concessae sunt, etiamsi ipse eas exsequi coeperit, sed transeunt ad Ordinarios qui ipsi in regimine succedunt; item concessae Episcopo competunt quoque Vicario Generali.

§ 3. Concessa facultas secumfert alias quoque potestates quae ad illius usum sunt necessariae; quare in facultate dispensandi includitur etiam potestas absolvendi a poenis ecclesiasticis, si quae forte obstent, sed ad effectum dumtaxat dispensationis consequendae.

§ 1. Habitual faculties, granted for ever, or for a limited time, or for a definite number of cases, are reckoned among privileges beyond the law.

§ 2. Unless they were conceded for personal reasons, or unless the law provides otherwise, habitual faculties do not expire with the authority of the Ordinary (or others; see can. 198, § 1) to whom they have been granted by the Apostolic See, even though he may have begun to execute them, but pass over to those who succeed him in office; faculties granted to the Bishop are intended also for the Vicar General.

§ 3. A faculty implies all the powers necessary for its exercise; hence the faculty of dispensing includes the faculty of absolving from

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

censures, if necessary, but only for the purpose of receiving the dispensation.

As to § 1 note: Habitual faculties are those which are commonly granted to bishops either for a certain time or for a limited number of cases, and are, as it were, concomitants of the episcopal office. As they are numbered among privileges, the rules of interpreting privileges must be applied to them, ceteris paribus.

As to § 2: These habitual faculties do not expire with the cessation of the Ordinary's term of office, but continue in his successors, and the faculties granted to the Bishop are also given to the Vicar General, unless the Bishop (or others to whom the faculties were given) was selected for this honor on account of personal qualities. The name "Ordinary" is applied to diocesan bishops, each for his territory, to Abbots Nullius, and to the Vicars-general of both, to Apostolic Vicars and Prefects, and to the Superiors of exempt religious.[12] The successor of the Ordinary to whom a faculty was granted, may complete the execution thereof which the predecessor had begun, e. g., by calling witnesses, issuing summonses, etc.

As to § 3: A faculty, if given, grants the use of all the means necessary for its application, and hence the faculty of dispensing includes the power of absolving from censures, when necessary; but only for the purpose of rendering the subject capable of receiving the dispensation. Therefore, e. g., an excommunication or suspension or personal interdict is, de facto, suspended only here and now, whilst conditions added to the censures for the case of real absolution remain.

12 Cfr. can. 198 and the declaration of the Holy Office of Feb. 20, 1888; when the term "loci" or "locorum" is added, the superiors of exempt orders are not included.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INTERPRETATION OF PRIVILEGES

CAN. 67

Privilegium ex ipsius tenore aestimandum est, nec licet illud extendere aut restringere.

A privilege must be interpreted according to its wording or purport, and must be neither extended nor restricted.

CAN. 68

In dubio privilegia interpretanda sunt ad normam can. 50; sed ea semper adhibenda interpretatio, ut privilegio aucti aliquam ex indulgentia concedentis videantur gratiam consecuti.

In case of doubt privileges must be interpreted in accordance with can. 50, but in such a way that those who have received the privilege always retain some favor from the good will of the grantor.

The interpretation of privileges follows the general rules of interpretation, as stated above, and especially that of rescripts. The principal rule is that the wording or purport (tenor) of the text must be duly consulted. Neither an extensive nor a restrictive interpretation of privileges is admissible. Where a doubt exists, the rule given in can. 50 must be applied, but in such a way that some privilege or favor remains.

CAN. 69

Nemo cogitur uti privilegio in sui dumtaxat favorem concesso, nisi alio ex capite exsurgat obligatio.

No one is obliged to make use of a privilege

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

granted to him solely for his own benefit, unless an obligation to that effect should arise from some other source.

CAN. 70

Privilegium, nisi aliud constet, censendum est perpetuum.

A privilege is perpetual, unless the contrary is evident.

A doubt may arise as to whether a privilege is purely personal, or real, or mixed. Such doubts can be solved by examining the subject-matter and the wording of the privilege. The purpose or scope of a privilege is, as a rule, obvious. If it is not clear whether the successor of a personally privileged Ordinary, e. g., the successor of an abbot, has the use of a certain privilege, the address of the document should be examined. If the name of the grantee appears first, and his dignity second, the privilege must be regarded as merely personal. Where the dignity is mentioned first, the privilege may be taken as real and is consequently transferable to the successor in the same dignity or office, unless the wording of the text excludes this interpretation.[13]

The Code adds, "nisi alio ex capite exsurgat obligatio," thereby no doubt referring to the so-called personal privileges of the clergy which cannot be renounced by the individual. It may also be that the fulfillment of a precept would urge, for instance, hearing Mass in a private oratory,[14] or absolving or dispensing, etc. Unless the contrary is clearly expressed, a privilege lasts for ever.

13 Cfr. Engel, V, 33, n. 4.
14 Laurentius, Inst. Iuris Eccl., 1903, p. 247.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LOSS OF PRIVILEGES

Although its nature would seem to spell perpetuity, a privilege may be lost, either by law, or lapse, or renunciation, or by one's own fault.

CAN. 71

Per legem generalem revocantur privilegia in hoc Codice contenta; ad cetera quod attinet, servetur praescriptum can. 60.

A general law repeals the privileges contained in this Code; otherwise can. 60 concerning the recall of rescripts must be applied.

Formerly a certain class of privileges was called "clausa in corpore juris" and sometimes "privilegia in corpore juris clauso," which signified those privileges contained in the Corpus Juris.[15] In like manner the privileges contained in the New Code, e. g., clerical, religious, and real, form a special class, and as such may be abolished by a general law issued by the supreme lawgiver.

CAN. 72

§ 1. Privilegia cessant per renuntiationem a competente Superiore acceptatam.

§ 2. Privilegio in sui tantum favorem constituto quaevis persona privata renuntiare potest.

§ 3. Concesso alicui communitati, dignitati, locove renuntiare privatis personis non licet.

§ 4. Nec ipsi communitati seu coetui integrum est renuntiare privilegio sibi dato per modum legis, vel si

15 The authors, however, did not agree as to what constituted the "Corpus Juris," some admitting only the three authentic collections, others including the Decretum and the Extravagantes.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

renuntiatio cedat in ecclesiae aliorumve praeiudicium.

§ 1. Privileges cease by renunciation if the renunciation is accepted by the competent superior.

§ 2. A merely personal privilege may be given up by any private person.

§ 3. A privilege granted to a community, dignity, or place cannot be renounced by private persons.

§ 4. Nor is the community or congregation (society) itself free to renounce a privilege granted by way of law, or if its renunciation should cause a prejudice to the Church or to others.

For a commentary on this point see p. 167, infra.

CAN. 73

Resoluto iure concedentis, privilegia non exstinguuntur, nisi data fuerint cum clausula: ad beneplacitum nostrum, vel alia aequipollenti.

Privileges are not extinguished even if the grantor goes out of office, unless they contain the clause: ad beneplacitum nostrum, or some other clause of like import.

A clause of like import would be, e. g., "durante pontificatu."

CAN. 74

Privilegium personale personam sequitur et cum ipsa exstinguitur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A personal privilege follows the person to whom it has been granted and expires with that person.

Here a note may be allowed as to the first clause. While it is true that the personal privilege cleaves, as the canonists say, to the bones of the person, the use of such a privilege may be limited or perhaps subject to the consent of another. Thus, e. g., the wearing of the Cappa Magna is granted to some abbots not in virtue of their office, but to the person, and hence is restricted to their own churches.

Can. 75

Privilegia realia cessant per absolutum rei vel loci interitum; privilegia vero localia, si locus intra quinquaginta annos restituatur, reviviscunt.

Real privileges cease upon the complete destruction of the thing or place, whilst local privileges revive if the place is restored within fifty years.

This enactment is of great importance for churches and monasteries, which, though the new proprietors or occupants have no relation whatever with the former, can enjoy their privileges without an act of renewal, if only a record be kept of the time of ruin and restoration. Of course it is understood that the restored places serve the same purpose as before,— the purpose for which, or in view of which, the privilege was given.

Renunciation of a privilege (as dealt with in canon 72, supra) is the voluntary giving up of a privilege acquired.[16] This is permissible because, as a rule, everyone is at liberty to relinquish his own rights.[17] However, to be effective, renunciation must be accepted by competent authority. Hence § 1 says that privileges cease by renunciation if the latter is accepted by the competent authority, which is none other than the grantor or his legitimate successors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

According to § 2, a merely personal privilege may be surrendered by any private person. The reason is because such privileges are supposed to affect the holder exclusively.

§ 3 declares that a privilege granted to a community, dignity or place cannot be renounced by private persons. It follows that the superior of a community, or a religious, or a clergyman cannot renounce such a privilege, e. g., of exemption or the privilegium canonis and fori.[18]

§ 4 provides that not even a community or congregation is free to renounce a privilege if it has been granted by way of law, or if its renunciation would cause a prejudice to the Church or to others. A privilege granted by way of law is one contained in the Code, e. g., clerical exemption, immunity. Such a privilege cannot be renounced, even if the community by common consent, or an assembly by general assent or a majority of votes, were ready to give it up. It is also forbidden to renounce a privilege, even though not contained in the Code, if 16 "Resoluto juris concedentis" (rescribentis, ferentis legem) is an expression often occurring in the Code, and is of general purport, including every kind of cessation of office by death, resignation, transfer, exchange, suspension, or deposition.

17 C. 6, X, V, 33.

18 Cfr. c. 12, X, II, 2; c. 36, X, V, 39; c. 5, X, I, 43: "Cum etsi sponte volueris, de jure tamen nequiveris, sine licentia Rom. Pontificis renunciare privilegiis vel indulgentiis libertatis, quae monasterium illud indicant ad jus et proprietatem Rom. Ecclesiae pertinere."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

giving it up would result in detriment to the Church or others, e. g., the faculty of binating or absolving from reserved cases. On the other hand, a community or chapter may give up such privileges as have become more or less useless or of little importance.[19] A sort of tacit renunciation seems to be what canon 76 calls non-usus or contrary usage.

Can. 76

Per non usum vel per usum contrarium privilegia aliis haud onerosa non cessant; quae vero in aliorum gravamen cedunt, amittuntur, si accedat legitima praescriptio vel tacita renuntiatio.

By non-use or contrary use a privilege which is not injurious to others does not cease; but a privilege that is burdensome to others loses its force by legitimate prescription or tacit renunciation.

It may be useful to recall the distinction between an onerous and a non-onerous privilege. The former causes a burden or damage to others, e. g., collecting tithes or alms, whilst the privilege of eating flesh-meat on certain days cannot be called injurious to others (except perhaps to the cook or the treasury).

There is also a difference between prescription and tacit renunciation. Prescription means a certain space of time, say forty years, during which the privilege has not been made use of, although there was occasion for using it. Tacit renunciation means that one has knowingly and willingly performed an act contrary to the privi-

[19] Cfr. c. 8, X, I, 2 de const.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lege, either negatively by not using the privilege when one should have used it, or positively, by doing the contrary to that which the privilege entitled one to.[20] The canon says that only onerous privileges, namely, such as follow the jus patronatus or right of presentation, cease by non-use or contrary use.[21]

CAN. 77

Cessat quoque privilegium, si temporis progressu rerum adiuncta sic, iudicio Superioris, immutentur ut noxium evaserit, aut eius usus illicitus fiat; item elapso tempore vel expleto numero casuum pro quibus privilegium fuit concessum, firmo praescripto can. 207, § 2.

A privilege also ceases if in course of time conditions change to such a degree that, in the judgment of the superior, the privilege becomes harmful or its use illicit; or if the time for which the privilege has been granted expires, or the number of cases for which it was given is full; without detriment, however, to canon 207, § 2.

This canon states what is self-evident under regula juris 61 in 6°: "quod ob gratiam alicuius conceditur, non est in eius dispendium retorquendum." In can. 207, § 2, the forum internum is excepted from the rule here laid down.

CAN. 78

Qui abutitur potestate sibi ex privilegio permissa,

20 Cf. Reiffenstuel, V, 33, nn. 201 ff.

21 Cf. c. 6, X, V, 33: "De privilegio tamen indulto tanto tempore vobis detrahere voluistis." The length of time is not expressed, but forty years may safely be assumed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

privilegio ipso privari meretur; et Ordinarius Sanctam Sedem monere ne omittat, si quis privilegio ab eadem concesso graviter abutatur.

Whoever abuses the power granted to him by a privilege, deserves to be deprived of the privilege itself; and the Ordinary shall not fail to notify the Apostolic See if anyone grievously abuses a privilege granted to him by the same.

The wording of this canon leaves no doubt that abuse does not, eo ipso, annul a privilege, but only after a sentence issued by the Apostolic See.[22] By the name of "Ordinary" is meant not only the diocesan Ordinary and his Vicar General, but the superior of exempt religious. On the other hand, it is also true that certain crimes are stated and singled out in the law itself as attended by the loss of certain privileges, e. g., if one commits a crime in a church, presuming on immunity, or fails to wear the clerical dress, of which more loco suo.

The last canon on privileges treats of privileges granted vivae vocis oraculo, i. e., by word of mouth.

CAN. 79

Quamvis privilegia, oretenus a Sancta Sede obtenta, ipsi petenti in foro conscientiae suffragentur, nemo tamen potest cuiusvis privilegii usum adversus quemquam in foro externo vindicare, nisi privilegium ipsum sibi concessum esse legitime evincat.

Although privileges orally granted by the Holy See, may be used by the grantee in the internal 22 Cf. c. 7, Dist. 74 (Greg. M.); c. 24, X, V, 33; the abuse may touch upon time or place or persons exceeding the limits thereof.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

court of conscience, no one should claim their use against another in foro externo, unless he can prove that the privilege was legitimately obtained.

For example, I know of a religious who received from Pius X, of happy memory, the privilege of reciting the Breviary, when traveling, according to the rubrics used at S. Anselmo. This privilege was given orally, and consequently touches the conscience rather than the forum externum. A privilege for the forum externum (e. g., one granted to an order against the jurisdiction of the Ordinary) requires proof. Hither belong the Constitution "Romanus Pontifex," of Gregory XV, of July 2, 1622, and that of Urban VIII, "Alias," of December 20, 1631, which abrogated all vivae vocis oracula both in foro interno and externo, except those obtained by the petitions of sovereigns and cardinals. The new Code admits the existence and use of orally given privileges, as long as conscience alone is concerned; but in justiciable cases such a privilege cannot be alleged, unless proven by witnesses. What witnesses are required? The Code does not specify, but we believe that the testimony of the cardinal-protector of a religious order, or any other cardinal, would be sufficient proof of the privilege having been granted by the Holy See.[23] (Can. 239, § 1, 17.)

In order to complete the subject of privileges, we may be permitted to add a few words on a topic which the Code does not explicitly treat, namely, the confirmation or ratification of privileges. A privilege may be ratified in forma communi or in forma specifica. Confirmatio in [23] Cfr. Reiffenstuel, V, 33, nn. 149 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

forma communi leaves the value and valor of a privilege in statu quo, without determining whether the privilege is valid or invalid, and hence adds no juridical force either to the first or second grant. Confirmatio in forma specifica is given after mature consideration of the privilege in case, and is executed either by verbal insertion of the former privilege or by using the clausulae: "ac si de verbo ad verbum inserta fuissent," or "ex certa scientia." In this latter case the confirmation gives juridical value to the privilege and is tantamount to a new valid concession; and the new grantee enjoys the privilege, even if the former should lose it.

Note, also, that privileges are sometimes granted especially by way of communication, or ratified with the clausula "dummodo" or "quatenus sunt in usu." This means that the grantor does not wish to ratify or grant anew by corroboration a privilege which has been lost by non-use or contrary usage, or for another reason.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VI

ON DISPENSATIONS

It is natural that a society spread over the whole globe and comprising members of the most diverse types living in different climes and under various conditions cannot apply the law with equal rigor at all times and in all circumstances. Even in the first four centuries of her existence the Church was compelled to mitigate the strictness of her penitential discipline. This is briefly and appropriately expressed by Abbo of Fleury (died 1004): "We must take into consideration the situation of countries, the character of the times, the frailty of men, and other reasons which of necessity change the laws of different provinces. The same is true concerning papal decress, which are of such authority that many judges expect the verdict of the Roman Pontiff. In these things, therefore, utility and equity (utilitas et honestas) must prevail, but not the enticing enjoyment of desires."[1] The same idea recurs in the prologue to the Decretum of Yvo of Chartres (died 1115). He, too, reduces the reasons for granting dispensations to two — utility and necessity, and compares the Church to a crew who throw merchandise over board in order to save the ship.[2] Gratian did not go further, for all his texts are taken from Yvo.[3]

1 Collectio Canonum, c. VIII (Migne, 139, 483), which is untouched by Pseudo-Isidorian influences.

2 Proleg. in Decretum (Migne, 161, 47 ff.).

3 Cfr. c. 56, Dist. 50; c. 41, C. 1, q. 1; c. 16, C. 1, q. 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

That with the outward growth of the papacy the power of papal dispensation also increased, goes without saying. Hence it cannot surprise us that Innocent III (1196–1216) said that "the fullness of power confers the right of dispensation."[4] Some bishops and provincial synods also exercised the right of dispensation, although in a limited way. Before Gratian's time, this power touched an accomplished fact rather than something to be done in future, although even this latter species of dispensation (super faciendum) was not entirely unknown. Dispensation came to comprise cases of simony, celibacy (especially the filii presbyterorum), irregularities, vows, and above all matrimonial cases.[5] The Council of Trent enacted into law what Abbo and Yvo had taught,—that a dispensation should be granted only for urgent and just reasons, for the greater utility of the faithful, and after previous deliberation and cognizance of the case.[6] We shall now see what the new Code has to say on the subject.

CAN. 80

Dispensatio, seu legis in casu speciali relaxatio, concedi potest a conditore legis, ab eius successore vel Superiore, nec non ab illo cui iidem facultatem dispensandi concesserint.

A dispensation, i. e., a relaxation of the law in a particular case, may be granted by the lawgiver, his successor or superior, and by those to whom the faculty of dispensing has been delegated.

There is a distinction between epikeia, so-called, or

4 Cf. c. 4, X, III, 8.

5 Cf. Stiegler, Dispensation, Dispensationswesen und Dispensationsrecht im Kirchenrecht, 1901, Vol. I (only one).

6 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 18 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

benign interpretation, which is related to equity, and a dispensation; for the latter is an act of jurisdiction flowing from the legislative and judiciary power, whilst the former is nothing more than either an interpretation or an excuse based on private judgment. Hence a dispensation presupposes legislative power, nay is, so to speak, coextensive with it. Therefore the Pope can dispense in all matters subject to his legislation, that is to say, in ecclesiastical, but not in divine laws.[7] The same power is vested in his successor, because he is his equal, and "par in parem non habet imperium." But the Pope can also dispense from episcopal laws, for he is superior to the bishops. On the other hand a bishop may dispense from papal laws if he has received the necessary faculties from the Apostolic See. The same right belongs to superiors of exempt religious orders.

The Pope is not bound by the existence or validity of reasons, but can dispense validly without reason, although it is not to be presumed that he would proceed thus, since a dispensation is a sore on the law and should not be used for destruction. This is not the case with those inferior to the Pope, hence canon 81 establishes the power of those inferior to the Roman Pontiff.

CAN. 81

A generalibus Ecclesiae legibus Ordinarii infra Romanum Pontificem dispensare nequeunt, ne in casu quidem peculiari, nisi haec potestas eisdem fuerit explicite vel implicite concessa, aut nisi difficilis sit recursus ad Sanctam Sedem et simul in mora sit pericu-

7 A difficulty might arise from vows and the matrimonium ratum; but in such laws, the obliging force of which depends on the free will of man, the Pontiff can, in virtue of his vicarious power, render the obligation ineffective. (Cfr. Wernz, l. c., I, n. 122.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lum gravis damni, et de dispensatione agatur quae a Sede Apostolica concedi solet.

Ordinaries inferior to the Pope cannot dispense from the general laws of the Church, not even in a particular case, unless they have received that power either explicitly or implicitly, or in cases in which recourse to the Holy See is difficult and there is at the same time grave danger in delay, and the dispensation requested is one which the Holy See is wont to grant.

Two sources for dispensing, therefore, are open to the Ordinaries, either a communicated power or the nature of the case requiring dispensation. Explicit power is granted through faculties which now will probably be forwarded in certain formularies newly to be issued and communicated directly to the Ordinaries; implicit power belongs to those who partake of the faculties by virtue of their office, e. g., Vicars General. Implicit concession is furthermore granted by the "caput liceat" of the Council of Trent,[8] which empowers Ordinaries to dispense in all cases of irregularity and suspension which arise from a secret crime, with the exception of voluntary homicide and such crimes as have been brought before the episcopal court by citation.

The class of cases mentioned in the second part of our canon may also be said to afford an ordinary reason for which those inferior to the Pope can dispense from the common law.

Three conditions must concur to make a dispensation valid[9] and licit: recourse to the Holy See must be dif-

8 Sess. 24, c. 6 de ref.

9 The canon simply says "nequeunt," which might be restricted to licitness; yet because dispensa-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ficult, there must be danger of grave damage, and the case must be subject to dispensation. The concurrence of these conditions may especially be verified in matrimonial cases, but also in irregularities arising from a hidden defect or crime. By recourse to the Holy See is here understood ordinary recourse, i. e., by mail, not by telegraph, which is an extraordinary means of communication. A grave danger is present when escape is almost, not entirely, impossible, and hence it is not necessary that it be a casus fortuitus, or unforeseen incident.[10] How grave the danger must be, cannot be determined by a general rule; but scandal or injury of reputation would suffice to constitute a serious danger. Finally, the case must be one from which the Holy See is wont to dispense, for nothing is included in the general concession which the superior is not likely to grant.[11] Hence, whatever is rare, extraordinary, unusual, or difficult to obtain from the Holy See, does not come within the sphere of episcopal power, for instance, irregularities in defectu corporis enormi. This is the viewpoint which the Ordinaries — and religious superiors also, for the canon does not add "loci" or "locorum" — must take in relation to the common law as contained in the Code.

The next canon deals with the power of Ordinaries regarding diocesan laws and laws of provincial councils.

CAN. 82

Episcopi aliique locorum Ordinarii dispensare valent

tions must be strictly interpreted, and because "negatio plus tollit quam affirmatio ponit," we believe that the interpretation given above is correct.

10 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, p. 278, p. 108.

11 Regula juris in 6°; Reiffenstuel, Comment in Reg. Iuris; Putzer, l. c., p. 36 f., enumerates still other cases, but with the exception of dubium juris or facti (cfr. can. 15) these cannot now be admitted, because the Code is silent about them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in legibus dioecesanis, et in legibus Concilii provincialis ac plenarii ad normam can. 291, § 2, non vero in legibus quas speciatim tulerit Romanus Pontifex pro illo peculiari territorio, nisi ad normam can. 81.

Bishops and other diocesan Ordinaries can dispense from diocesan laws and from the laws of provincial and plenary councils, according to the rule contained in canon 291, § 2, but not from laws specially given by the Roman Pontiff for that territory, except in conformity with canon 81.

There is a gradation in this canon as to the power of dispensing. Bishops can dispense from their own (diocesan) laws with or without reason, for of their own laws they are the lawgivers in the proper sense. The second class of laws referred to comprises those of provincial or plenary councils whose decrees are supposed, according to canon 291, to be recognized by the Holy See. From these the Ordinarii locorum cannot licitly dispense except in particular cases and for just reasons. Now a particular case is one which occurs less frequently, and, generally speaking, touches single persons or parishes. For to dispense a whole diocese or province, if it should happen at stated or frequent intervals, would be a general not a particular dispensation. Thus to dispense the whole clergy would also be a general dispensation. Finally, the canon adds that the Ordinaries cannot dispense from particular laws given by the Holy See for that particular territory; for instance, from the law governing the nomination of candidates for vacant sees in the United States (S. C. Cons., July 25, 1916), or, perhaps,

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

from the law regarding holy-days. The clause, however, permits dispensation in accordance with canon 81.

Descending in the scale of the hierarchy the Code says:

CAN. 83

Parochi nec a lege generali nec a lege peculiari dispensare valent, nisi haec potestas expresse eisdem concessa sit.

Parish priests can dispense neither from a general nor from a particular law, unless they have expressly received that power.

This text states an obvious truth, and at the same time deals a blow to a certain tendency which permitted parochi ex consuetudine to dispense in several cases.[12] For the law requires an explicit communication of that power. If parish priests need a dispensation from a general law, as embodied in our Code, the faculty must come from the Pope, either directly or indirectly through the Ordinary; if a particular law is to be dispensed from, a distinction must be made. If the law in question has been enacted by a plenary council, the habitual faculty of dispensing therefrom must be obtained from the Pope, either immediately or mediately, as in the case of the general law. For single cases, we believe, the bishops can without special faculties communicate the power of dispensing to their parish priests, for they have received this power by law (can. 291), and not from man. To dispense from merely diocesan laws depends exclusively on the bishop, who may therefore grant that faculty, either habitually or ad certum numerum casuum, to parish 12 Cfr. Putzer, l. c., p. 36, as to dispensations from fast and abstinence; servile work prohibited; see can. 1245.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

priests. However, it must be done expressly, either orally or in writing, and must not be presumed, for a presumption is no express concession.

After having determined the persons who may exercise the power of dispensation, the Code emphatically reinforces the Tridentine decree concerning the causes of dispensation:

CAN. 84

§ 1. A lege ecclesiastica ne dispensetur sine iusta et rationabili causa, habita ratione gravitatis legis a qua dispensatur; alias dispensatio ab inferiore data illicita et invalida est.

§ 2. Dispensatio in dubio de sufficientia causae licite petitur et potest licite et valide concedi.

§ 1. No dispensation from an ecclesiastical law is to be granted without a just and reasonable cause, and due regard must always be had to the importance of the law from which the dispensation is given; otherwise the dispensation given by an inferior is illicit and invalid.

§ 2. When there is doubt as to the sufficiency of the cause, a dispensation may be lawfully asked for, and licitly and validly granted.

The cause may be the motive or impelling reason, the former being the raison d'être of the dispensation, the latter only an aid, or, as the Scholastics express it: the motive cause is "ad esse simpliciter," the impelling cause, "ad facilius esse." Here the causa must be understood as the motive cause.[18] 18 If one reason is sufficient, two reasons perhaps convince: "rationes duae vincunt unam." Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Axioma 197, l. c., p. 130.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning the time when the causa must be verified, we refer to Can. 41 de rescriptis: If no executor is appointed, the cause must exist at the time of granting the dispensation; if an executor handles the dispensation, the cause must be verified at the moment of his signature.

As to the nature of the cause, the Code says that it must be just and reasonable. Justice refers to law, which admits certain causes and rejects others. Thus a list of canonical causes is set up, e. g., for matrimonial dispensations. The cause must be reasonable because, as law pertains to reason, so also must a dispensation partake of reason. The judgment as to the latter quality lies with the grantor.

Furthermore there must be a proportion between the seriousness or importance of the law and the dispensation, which is a vulnus legis. Hence for relaxing a serious law a serious and solid reason must be advanced; a graver cause is required to dispense from a major impediment than from a minor.[14]

Besides, it is but just that the persons should be considered for whom a dispensation is issued, because influential persons are more important for the public welfare than ordinary mortals.[15]

Lastly, the circumstances must be considered, not only of persons, but also of consequences which might probably follow, e. g., scandal, damage, injury, etc. If the reason alleged is not just and reasonable, the dispensation granted by an inferior is illicit and invalid. Notice that the canon does not say, as the Tridentine Decree did (Sess. 25, c. 18) that it is subreptitious; hence there can be no longer any doubt as to the view taken by the Church. Therefore, if, after the application of a dis-

14 Cfr. can. 1042 f.

15 Cfr. Putzer, l. c., p. 76 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pensation, the alleged cause is found to be without foundation, the dispensation is null and void (with the exception of can. 1054).

§ 2 mitigates the apparent harshness of § 1, inasmuch as it declares that, if the sufficiency of the reason alleged is doubtful, the dispensation holds.

The next canon treats of the interpretation of dispensations.

Can. 85

Strictae subest interpretationi non solum dispensatio ad normam can. 50, sed ipsamet facultas dispensandi ad certum casum concessa.

Dispensations must be strictly interpreted, according to canon 50; also the faculty of dispensing granted for a certain case is subject to strict interpretation.

In order not to repeat what has been said before, we only remind the reader of the rule that dispensations must never be extended to cases and persons not comprised in the faculties, as will be further explained in matrimonial cases. But other dispensations, too, e. g. from vows, must be strictly interpreted; thus the power of dispensing from vows does not include that of dispensing from oaths. Besides, the clausulae and the stylus Curiae must be closely observed.[16] Canon 85 further mentions dispensations granted ad certum casum. Here, a fortiori, extension of restriction is inadmissible, because no argument from dispositio similis can be drawn, e. g., if one receives the faculty to dispense a certain person, this cannot be applied to another, although he or she be similarly situated.

16 Cf. Putzer, l. c., p. 12 f., p. 165 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The term "facultas" must be strictly interpreted in a determined case, for the general supposition is that there are personal qualities, as well as a mandate implied, which are subject to strict interpretation. The last canon treats of the cessation of dispensations.

CAN. 86

Dispensatio quae tractum habet successivum, cessat iisdem modis quibus privilegium, nec non certa ac totali cessatione causae motivae.

A dispensation which permits of successive application ceases the same way as privileges, and with the certain and complete cessation of the motive cause.

What has been said concerning the manner in which privileges cease, must be applied here also, because habitual faculties are numbered among the privileges beyond the law (can. 66, § 1), and hence cease by renunciation, repeal, or the death of the grantor, if there is a clause that says so, otherwise not. To ask whether a dispensation can be lost by contrary usage and prescription seems, at first sight at least, silly. Yet a dispensation which permits of successive application (tractum successivum), e. g., eating flesh-meat, saying a "black Mass," etc., is not exhausted by one act and may therefore be forfeited, if contrary usage and an imperative act of the superior combine. Since the Code says that such dispensations lose their force in the same way as privileges, we must apply that disposition of the law also to the case in hand.

Finally, the Code provides that if the motive cause ceases entirely and for certain, the dispensation also ceases. The two conditions ("entirely and for certain") must be taken conjointly. For instance, if one has received a dispensation from the vow of chastity ad usum matrimonii on account of temptations, he may continue the use of marriage even after the cessation of these temptations, because there is no certainty. But if one has obtained a dispensation from reciting the Breviary on account of weak eyes, he cannot continue the use of the dispensation after his eyesight has been completely restored. Taking into consideration can. 85, regarding a faculty given for a determined case, the dispensation last mentioned must be held to be exhausted after application, and is therefore negotium finitum. For it is generally supposed that in such a case the faculty was given in forma mandati, which expires after application and admits of no extension or epikia.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

one stity may t of t if ary
the re-ng on firn d

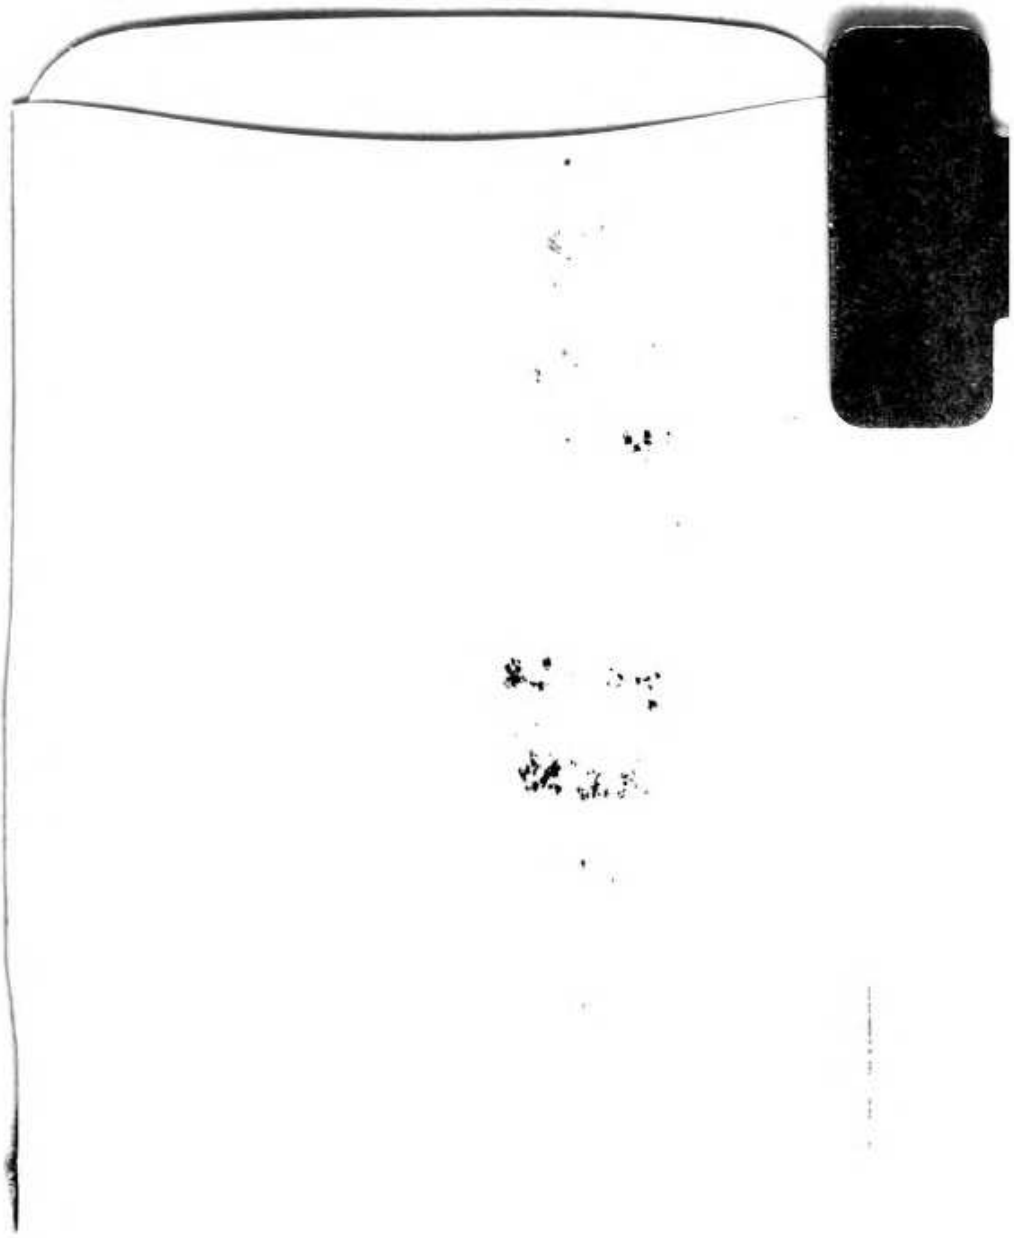
Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google



89097198154

B89097198154A

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

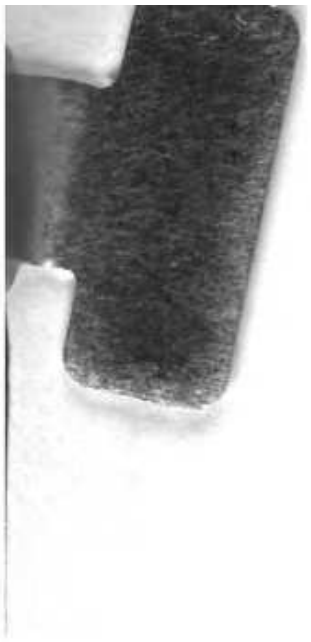
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89097198154

b89097198154a

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN



Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:52 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW
CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

VOLUME II
Clergy and Hierarchy

THIRD EDITION

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68 GREAT RUSSELL ST. LONDON, W. C.
1919

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cum Permissu Superiorum

NIHIL OBSTAT

Sti. Ludovici, die Sept. 7, 1918

F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR

Sti. Ludovici, die Sept. 8, 1918

✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright, 1918
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
.B12
2

587678

Grand Rapids Book Shop

TO

THE BELOVED HIERARCH OF OUR DIOCESE

THE RT. REV. MAURICE FRANCIS BURKE, D.D.

BISHOP OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.

THIS VOLUME IS RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED

1893-1918

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

FOREWORD

This second volume is dedicated to the Rt. Rev. Bishop M. F. Burke, D.D. (By mistake the dedication appeared in Vol. I.) On June 24, 1918, Msgr. Burke celebrated, amidst a gathering of the clergy, the silver jubilee of his episcopal career in our diocese. During this time our monastery as well as the author himself have enjoyed the most cordial and unruffled relations with the noble-hearted prelate. Wherefore it seemed appropriate to offer this book as a token of gratitude and esteem to his Lordship.

A word may be added concerning the make-up of the Commentary. Semi-official notice received from Rome, in response to our inquiry, caused us to limit our work to a commentary proper, since translations into the vernacular are not only not desired by the authorities, but rather discouraged, nay, at least for the whole Code as such, forbidden. Therefore we had to embody the contents of the Code in the Commentary, and rendered the Latin text into English only when it seemed absolutely necessary, or where no commentary was needed. Some canons have been neither translated nor paraphrased because the person concerned might have been offended by a translation or paraphrase.

THE AUTHOR

Conception Abbey, Mo.,
July, 1918.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TABLE OF CONTENTS

BOOK II.

ECCLESIASTICAL PERSONS

PAGE

INTRODUCTORY — PERSONS IN GENERAL 1
DOMICILE 12
BLOOD RELATIONSHIP AND AFFINITY 19
VARIOUS RITES 20
MORAL OR JURIDICAL PERSONS 23
ETHICAL QUALITIES OF LEGAL ACTS (Vis, Metus, Error) . 28
CONSENT OR ADVICE TO BE ASKED BY THE SUPERIOR . . . 34
PRECEDENCE 36

PART I. THE CLERGY 43
SECT. I. The Clergy in General 43
TITLE I. INCARDINATION IN A DIOCESE 50
TITLE II. RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES OF CLERICS . . . 56
The Privilegium Canonis 58
The Privilegium Fori 59
Personal Immunity 64
Beneficium Competentiae 67
Loss of the Clerical Privileges 68
TITLE III. OBLIGATIONS OF CLERICS 70
Religious Duties 70
Clerical Obedience 71
Scientific Equipment of the Clergy 74
Celibacy of the Clergy 77
Divine Office (Breviary) 82
Clerical Dress 84
Occupations and Amusements forbidden to the Clergy 85
Amusements 92
Negotiatio Prohibita 95
Absence from the Diocese 98
TITLE IV. ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES 100
CH. I. APPOINTMENT TO ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES . . 104

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

PAGE

ART. I. Libera Collatio 109
Requisites of Ecclesiastical Office Holders . . 110
Time of Appointment 112
Incompatible Offices 113
ART. II. Election 117
1. Election of a Pope 117
2. Election of Bishops 119
Time and Convocation 123
The Electors (Vox Activa) 127
Balloting 134
Compromise 139
The Number of Votes Required 143
Effect of the Election 143
Devolution 147
ART. III. Postulation 148
CH. II. LOSS OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES 154
Resignation 155
Tacit Resignation 159
Deprivation of Office 163
Transfers 167
TITLE V. ORDINARY AND DELEGATED POWER 170
Ordinary Jurisdiction 171
Delegated Jurisdiction 174
Interpretation of Jurisdiction 177
Extent of Jurisdiction 179
Duties of Delegates 182
Several Delegates 185
Cessation of Delegated and Ordinary Jurisdiction . 187
Power of Order 191
TITLE VI. RETURN OF CLERGYMEN TO THE LAY STATE . 193
SECT. II. THE HIERARCHY 200
THE LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS 200
TITLE VII. THE SUPREME POWER AND THOSE WHO PARTAKE THEREOF BY ECCLESIASTICAL LAW 207
CH. I. THE ROMAN PONTIFF 207
The Papal Titles and Insignia 214
CH. II. GENERAL (ECUMENICAL) COUNCILS . . . 217
Order and Authority of a General Council . . . 223
CH. III. THE CARDINALS OF THE HOLY ROMAN CHURCH 227

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

Office and Rank of Cardinals 229
Creation and Qualifications of Cardinals 231
Option 235
The Sacred College as a Corporation 237
Duties and Privileges of Cardinals 238
Rights of Cardinals in Their Titles and Sede Vacante 243
CH. IV. THE ROMAN COURT 246
ART. I. The Sacred Congregations 250
The Holy Office 250
The S. Consistorial Congregation 252
The S. Congregation of the Sacraments . . . 254
The S. Congregation of the Council 256
The S. Congregation of Religious 257
The S. Congregation of the Propaganda . . . 259
The S. Congregation of Rites 261
The S. Congregatio Ceremonialis 262
The S. Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs 263
The S. Congregation of Studies 263
The S. Congregation for the Oriental Church . 264
ART. II. Tribunals of the Roman Court 265
The Sacra Poenitentiaria 265
The Rota and the Signatura 267
ART. III. The Offices of the Roman Court . . . 269
The Apostolic Chancery 269
The Apostolic Datary 270
The Reverenda Camera Apostolica 271
The Secretariate of State 272
Authority of the Roman Court and its Decisions 274
CH. V. LEGATES OF THE ROMAN PONTIFF 278
CH. VI. PATRIARCHS, PRIMATES, METROPOLITANS . 286
The Pallium 292
Precedence 295
CH. VII. PLENARY AND PROVINCIAL COUNCILS . . 297
Plenary Councils 298
Provincial Councils 300
Conciliary Proceedings 303
CH. VIII. VICARS AND PREFECTS APOSTOLIC . . . 310
CH. IX. APOSTOLIC ADMINISTRATORS 326

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

PAGE

Ch. X. Inferior Prelates 331

Title VIII. The Episcopal Power and Those Who Partake Thereof 340

Ch. I. The Bishops 341

Qualities Required in a Bishop 343

Duties and Rights of Bishops 348

Pontifical Functions 356

Residence 358

Missa pro Populo 361

Reports to the Holy See 364

Visitatio ad Limina 365

Diocesan Visitations 367

Precedence 375

Titular Bishops 375

Episcopal Privileges 375

Ch. II. Coadjutors and Auxiliary Bishops . . . 378

Rights of Coadjutors 380

Residence 382

Ch. III. Diocesan Synods 384

Ch. IV. The Diocesan Court 391

Art. I. The Vicar General 393

Art. II. The Chancellor and Other Notaries — The Episcopal Archives 406

Custody of Archives 411

Secret Archives 413

Other Archives of the Diocese 417

Art. III. Synodal Examiners and Consultors . . 418

Ch. V. Chapters of Canons 424

The Canonicus Theologus and the Poenitentiarius . 436

The Appointment to Canonicates 440

Honorary Canons 441

Insignia 444

Statutes and Meetings 446

Duties of Canons 449

Rights and Privileges of Canons 455

Ch. VI. Diocesan Consultors 463

Appointment of Consultors 465

Qualities and Obligations 466

Ch. VII. Quasi-Vacancy and Vacancy of the Episcopal See — The Vicar-Capitular 470

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

PAGE

Vacancy Proper 474
The Vicar-Capitular 480
Qualities of the Vicar-Capitular 484
Rights of the Vicar-Capitular 487
CH. VIII. RURAL DEANS 497
CH. IX. PARISH PRIESTS 505
Incorporation 514
Irremovable and Movable Pastors 517
Appointment of Pastors 521
Examination — Concursus 527
Unity and Possession 534
Rights of Parish Priests 536
Duties of Pastors 543
Obligation of Residence 545
Application of the Mass pro Populo 549
Particular Duties 552
Care of the Sick and Charitable Works 554
Parish Books and Archives 556
CH. X. ASSISTANT PRIESTS (VICARS) 559
Vicars Proper 559
Vicars ad Interim 563
Temporary Substitutes 567
Assistants Proper 568
Coadjutors 571
Removal 576
Precedence of Assistants 577
CH. XI. RECTORS OF CHURCHES 580
Appendix. Episcopal Faculties 587

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

BOOK II

ECCLESIASTICAL PERSONS

INTRODUCTORY — PERSONS IN GENERAL

Person (persona) physically signifies a being endowed with life, intelligence, free will, and individual existence. The Roman law, however, restricted its meaning to one capable of right (subjectum iuris capax), and slaves were not considered to be persons.[1]

Roman[2] and civil, as well as canon law, also know artificial or moral persons, i. e., such as are created by human law for the purposes of society and government (corporations or bodies politic).[3] Such a corporation may be called "e pluribus unum," as our coins express it, or a subject consisting of several physical persons.

Three elements must combine to constitute a moral person or corporation: (a) a plurality of persons, according to the well known adage, "Tres faciunt collegium;"[4] (b) corporate rights embodied in the constitu-

1 Cf. § 4, Inst., I, 16. The slaves were called ἀπρόσωποι or personless; cfr. Cassiodorius, Variarum, VI, 8 (Migne, 69, 689).

2 Dig., 1, 5; Ins., I, 3; Vering, Gesch. und Pandekten d. röm. und heutigen Rechts, ed. 5, p. 104.

3 Blackstone-Cooley, Commentary, I, 122.

4 Fr. 85, Dig., 50, 16; New International Encyc., 1904, V, 438.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion and pertaining to the members as such, i. e., because they are members of the corporation; (c) legal acknowledgment or sanction. Only when these three conditions are verified, do we have a corporation in the proper sense. It is not amiss to add that the civil law does not create these corporations but finds and accepts them as products of the social life.[5]

English law distinguishes between corporations aggregate and corporations sole, the former being what we have defined above, whereas a corporation sole consists of one person only and his successors, incorporated by law in order to give them certain legal capacities and advantages, particularly that of perpetuity, which in their natural persons they could not enjoy. In this sense the King of England is a corporation sole; so is a bishop; so are some deans and prebendaries, distinct from their several chapters; and so is every parson and vicar of the established Church.[6] The U. S. acknowledge no ecclesiastical but various civil corporations.[6]

In order to construe a corporation, some authors resorted to a fictio iuris, which consists in the assumption or supposition of many physical persons as forming one body or person. There is no necessity whatever to maintain this theory. For the sum-total of corporate rights embodied in the community which is represented by its legal head or manager is a reality in the realm of law no less than the persons endowed with those rights. The legal fiction theory results from a too material conception of right or law.

But neither can the theory which takes the end or purpose of a moral person as the base and bearer of corporate rights, satisfy the inquirer after the constitu-

5 Blackstone-Cooley, Commentary, I, 472.

6 Zollmann, Am. Civil Church Law, 1917, pp. 38 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ent element of a corporation. The end indeed specifies, and gives coloring to, a corporation, but it cannot create or produce rights. The creation or production of rights must in the last analysis be attributed to human reason and will, whence every law arises, subordinate, of course, to the eternal law.[7] Therefore a corporation or legal community is the bearer of corporate rights and if not fully autonomous, only requires the sanction of the competent authority to actuate itself.

CAN. 100

§ 1. Catholica Ecclesia et Apostolica Sedes moralis personae rationem habent ex ipsa ordinatione divina; ceterae inferiores personae morales in Ecclesia eam sortiuntur sive ex ipso iuris praescripto sive ex speciali competentis Superioris ecclesiastici concessione data per formale decretum ad finem religiosum vel caritativum.

§ 2. Persona moralis collegialis constitui non potest, nisi ex tribus saltem personis physicis.

§ 3. Personae morales sive collegiales sive non collegiales minoribus aequiparantur.

This first paragraph sketches the charter of the Church founded by Christ. The following two establish the relation of dependent corporations and societies to the Church.

Here we might enlarge upon the constitution of the Church. However a brief summary must suffice to explain the necessary elements of that society which derives its origin from God. For a more elaborate exposition we must refer the reader to fundamental theology and to that part of canon law which goes by the name of public ecclesiastical law.

7 Cfr. Bachofen, Summa Iuris Eccl. Pub., 1910, p. 14 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Catholic Church[8] claims a divine foundation, because Christ, its Founder, came to establish the Kingdom of God, or the Kingdom of Heaven, which He embodied in the flock gathered by Him and placed upon the rock that was Peter, the prince of the Apostles. Here we find two essential elements of a corporation: a plurality of persons and corporate rights embodied in the visible head of the college or society.

The most important and essential element of the Church, as of every other corporation, is the constitution, which determines the nature and purpose of the corporation as well as the mode of organization and the rights of the members. That constitution, in its essential features, was mapped out by God and hence is of divine origin. The nature and purpose of the Church is the same as that for which Christ was sent into the world, viz.: the establishment of the Kingdom of God. This end and purpose is plainly supernatural or religious. This does not mean, however, that the Church does not need natural, even material, means to realize its end. A corporation consisting of men composed of body and soul, who can be led to spiritual apprehension only through the medium of the senses, cannot forego material, bodily means. This is very palpable in the support of ministers and external worship.

To direct a society to the end for which it is instituted an authority is needed. For uniform, constant, and unswerving direction of a multitude with many and different views and aspirations is impossible without some one having power to impose obligations and to distribute rewards. This authority Christ has built into the foundation of His Church, as it were, by conferring on St. Peter a supreme and indivisible power similar to that [8] See ibid., p. 22 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which He Himself enjoyed.[9] However, this power, indivisible and supreme, was not the only one which the Lord imparted to His Apostles. Besides St. Peter He appointed others who should be heard and should rule portions of the flock.[10] These are the bishops (or seniors) mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles.

If Christ wished His Kingdom to be stable and permanent, He must have provided means of perpetuation and continuity. This He did by providing successors to St. Peter and the other Apostles. The Fisherman's Throne was erected above Peter's tomb, and ever since the Roman Pontiffs, viz., those who succeeded St. Peter in the see of Rome, were acknowledged as Vicars of Christ. To them, therefore, belongs in equal measure the supreme and indivisible power over the whole Church. Under them the bishops by divine institution rule their respective districts. This is the essential organization of the Church as far as its external constitution is concerned. Priests and ministers also share in the power of the hierarchy, but their jurisdiction, as such, does not comprise external acts of a public nature.

How is this power exercised? Through a threefold function, called legislative, judiciary, coercive. If we speak of a threefold power, we do not mean to distribute it among various functionaries and bodies, as Montesquieu has done, but we consider it merely under various aspects or effects, which differ in procedure and execution. Thus legislation means the power inherent in the Supreme Pontiff to make laws for the entire Church; judiciary power applies these laws by means of judgment and trials or simple decisions, whilst coercive or executive power renders the law and its application effective

[9] Cfr. Matt. 16, 18; Luke 22, 31; John 21, 15.

[10] Cfr. Matt. 18, 18; Acts 20, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and respected, whilst at the same time it conserves the public welfare and provides satisfaction for violations of the public order.

A moral person endowed with such prerogatives is called a "perfect society." This term necessarily involves: (a) an existence independent of every other society, in other words, autonomy or sovereignty; (b) independence of end or purpose; (c) independence in the attainment of end or pursuit of means proportionate to the end.

The question arises: Are these conditions verified in the Catholic Church? What about the third requisite of a moral person, viz., legal sanction? If legal would mean only what the State sanctions, then the Church would have had no legal existence for more than three hundred years. But legal here means the natural right of existence. If God is the author of nature, and as such also of the State, He certainly enjoys power sufficient to give legal existence to a society which He Himself wished to found. The God of nature can not contradict the God of grace; neither does legal sanction given by God to the State exclude legal sanction given by the same God to the Church. When Constantine issued his edict of toleration 312–313, he did not legalise the Church, but merely acknowledged publicly what was due to her.

Legal sanction accrues to the Church by virtue of her divine foundation. The Church is a moral person in the most perfect sense of that word. The plurality of members is shown in her catholic character, whilst unity is manifest from her constitution, which was set up expressly for the preservation of one faith and one rule or government. In that same constitution is also included diversity of members. Not all the members of the Church are endowed with governing powers. Therefore the Church is called a societas inaequalis, which implies different rights and obligations on the part of its members,— a distinction between the clergy and laymen — between pastors and flock, between those who sanctify and those who are sanctified, between those who teach and those who are taught.[11]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Hierarchy in the strict sense means "a body of persons who enjoy ecclesiastical power in a different, gradually determined, degree."[12] Such is the case in the Catholic Church, of which can. 100 asserts that is a moral person. However, the Church forms a juridical person only in conjunction with the Roman Pontiff, because without him it would lack one of its essential constituents. The Supreme Pontiff (Apostolic See) would form a moral person even if the entire body of the faithful would cease to exist — an unlikely hypothesis, which is here stated merely to illustrate the necessity of a supreme head. Without exaggeration we may say that the Pope is a corporation sole by virtue of his sovereignty, like the King under English law. For this reason the Pope is said to have all laws in ventre,[13] i. e., he combines the whole legislative as well as judiciary and coercive power in his own person.

Besides the Church universal, or rather within it, there are other, inferior or minor juridical persons. As their purpose is subordinate to that of the whole Church, and they are therefore dependent on her with regard to the attainment of their end and the pursuit of the means leading thereto, these minor juridical persons necessarily owe their very existence to her. This is to be particularly emphasized from the legal point of view.

11 Cfr. Schema Conc. Vatic. de Ecclesia Christi, c. 10.

12 Aichner, Compendium Juris Eccl., § 26; Smith, Elements, I, p. 83.

13 Cfr. c. 1, 6°, I, 2 de Constitut.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

For if such a subordinate corporation would renounce allegiance to the Apostolic See, i. e., fall away from the Church, it would lose all its corporate rights, and consequently also its legal hold on church property, which would in that case belong to those members who remained faithful to their allegiance.[14]

Such inferior corporations, also called imperfect societies, may come into existence and obtain a legal standing in the Church either by law or by a formal decree of any competent superior. Legal consent is understood to be given for the formation of a diocese or cathedral chapter as soon as all the requisites are present. (On religious corporations see the next section.)

The Code expressly mentions moral persons whose end is charity. Such charitable corporations can be juridical persons only if the physical persons constituting them devote their time to charity, but do not themselves live on charity for the sake of charity. Some ancient confraternities, e. g., the Brothers of Mercy and various guilds, were of such a character. An orphanage, a hospital, etc., is not a juridical person in the strict sense; it may be called a charitable institute, or pia causa, because those who partake of its benefits are not members with definite rights, but mere beneficiaries of charity. In these therefore the end or purpose may be said to be the subject of rights.[15] Paragraph 3 of our canon compares such inferior or subordinate corporations and fellowships or societies in a wider sense to physical persons who are not yet of age (minors). The 14 Cfr. Bachofen, Summa, p. 43 ff.

15 Meurer, Die Juristischen Personen, 1901, p. 21, contradicts our exposition and holds that the de stinatarii (orphans, sick, etc.) are the subjects of quasi-corporate rights. Cfr. Bachofen, Summa, p. 16.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

tertium comparationis is the dependence of both as to free and unhampered action (see can. 89).

After this necessary explanation of the Church as a perfect juridical person or corporation in the highest sense, we now proceed with our commentary secundum ordinem.

CAN. 87

Baptismate homo constituitur in Ecclesia Christi persona cum omnibus christianorum iuribus et officiis, nisi, ad iura quod attinet, obstet obex, ecclesiasticae communionis vinculum impediens, vel lata ab Ecclesia censura.

Baptism is the sacrament of initiation, "the sacrament of Christian grace," the "receiving of Christ's livery," [16] concerning which more is said in the third book of the Code.[17] The effect of baptism consists in obtaining certain rights and assuming certain obligations. These are partly general, partly particular. All Christians have the same general rights and obligations with regard to spiritual favors and aids to salvation.[18] But not every Christian is obliged to embrace the clerical or religious state, although all who are called to it have a right to enter that state. In this respect the Catholic Church is truly democratic.

It would be wrong to hold that children, when they attain the use of reason, have a right to decide whether or not they wish to keep their baptismal vows.[19] One who by formal heresy or schism or apostasy rends asunder the bond that unites him with the Church, is yet bound by 16 Cfr. Coustant, Epistolae RR. Pont., 1721, pp. 875, 545, 550.

17 Cfr. Canon 737 ff.
18 Cfr. Canon 682.
19 Cfr. Conc. Trid., Sess. 7, c. 8, 14 de bapt; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, 1915, II, 273 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the obligations resulting from his baptismal vow. Again, one who commits a crime upon which the penalty of excommunication (censura) has been laid by law or inflicted by legitimate authority, loses his rights until absolution is obtained, but his obligations remain.[20]

CAN. 88

§ 1. Persona quae vicesimum primum aetatis annum explevit, maior est; infra hanc aetatem, minor.

§ 2. Minor, si masculus, censetur pubes a decimoquarto, si femina, a duodecimo anno completo.

§ 3. Impubes, ante plenum septennium, dicitur infans seu puer vel parvulus et censetur non sui compos; expleto autem septennio, usum rationis habere praesumitur. Infanti assimilantur quotquot usu rationis sint habitu destituti.

English and American law agree in fixing the age of minors at from fourteen to twenty-one.[21] Between these two termini lie the years of discretion, wherefore minors are capable of some, but not of all, legal actions. A margin is left to premature malice ("malitia supplet aetatem"), so that the limit, like the one from the seventh to the fourteenth (or twelfth) year, is only proximate or presumptive.[22]

Concerning infants[23] the same term "censetur" is employed, which involves supposition and not absolute certainty; hence, even after the seventh year the use of 20 Cfr. Heiner, Kirchenrecht, 1897, I, 125 ff. The disjunction in the canon is only apparent, for by heresy, etc., one eo ipso incurs censure.

21 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, 463.

22 Cfr. Canon 1254, § 1.

23 Infantes dicuntur qui fari nesciunt, i. e., who are speechless; cfr. Cicero, De Divinatione, I, 53; cfr. l. 18, Cod. Just., VI, 30; 16, ib., l. 3, V, 60. Cfr. Canon 1254, § 1; Ulpian, Frag., tit. XI; Lachmann, Gaii Institution., 1841, p. 138 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reason is only "presumed." Presumption must, of course, always cede to proven facts. Hence, if a boy or girl of seven is by medical attestation proved to be destitute of reason, all acts performed by him or her are null and void before the canon law. On the other hand the age-limit of seven is not so strict that infants could not share in the benefits which the law grants to such as are "compotes sui," even if they have not yet reached the seventh year, provided they actually enjoy the use of reason. But this is only to be understood with regard to favors. Thus, e. g., infants, even though they enjoy the use of reason, are not obliged to fast if they have not yet attained the seventh year.[24]

CAN. 89

Persona maior plenum habet suorum iurium exercitium; minor in exercitio suorum iurium potestati parentum vel tutorum obnoxia manet, iis exceptis in quibus ius minores a patria potestate exemptos habet.

The Code makes no distinction between the sexes, hence males and females are considered equally capable of legal action after they have attained the age of twenty-one.[25] Minors enjoy habitually or radically the same rights as those of age, but are hampered in their enjoyment because they depend on parents or tutors. This disability, as Blackstone well observes, is in fact a privilege, because it prevents children from hurting themselves by their own acts.[26] The Code adopts this universal principle by placing minors under the tutelage of parents

24 Cfr. can. 1254.

25 The earlier Roman law considered a woman of age only when married. Cfr. Blackstone-Cooley, I, 463.

26 Cf. Reiffenstuel, III, 38, n. 38; Blackstone-Cooley, I, 464.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and guardians, at least in certain cases. Thus we shall see that minors, except in certain cases, are incapable of electing or of being witnesses. They may be presented for a benefice, but only through their tutors.[27] They are exempt from observing the law of tutelage in choosing their vocation (clerical or religious state) as also in marrying, provided, however, that they have reached the age of puberty.

The new Code does not distinguish between tutor and curator, although in Roman law this distinction was made; a tutor was given to infants or impuberes, whilst a curator was assigned to puberes until they were of age.[28] However, this distinction is juridically unimportant.

We may observe that, although the Code has ecclesiastical laws in view, the civil laws, too, in as far as they do not clash with those of the Church in the matter of tutelage or guardianship, must be observed and may be followed in conscience; for instance, in deeds and contracts and in the alienation of land.[29]

DOMICILE

The term domicilium is derived from domum colere, to foster or inhabit the home. Hence it has reference primarily to the place where one is born. Place (locus) was taken by the Roman lawyers in a very narrow sense, viz., as a place or parcel of a larger property, called fundus, upon which one's affection was supposed to be especially centered.[30] Analogously, domicile, too, was restricted to the birthplace or origin or legal status which the citizen was supposed to possess in virtue of his belong-

27 Blackstone-Cooley, I, 464.

28 Cf. Dig., 26, 5; Cod. Just., V, 42; V, 33.

29 Cf. l. 60, Dig. 50 de verborum significatione: "locus est non fundus, sed portio aliqua fundi."

30 Cfr. Dig., l. c.; Cath. Enc., V, 103.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing to a determined municipality or city. This was, we say, supposed, because even if born elsewhere, a man was a citizen of the municipality in which in the natural course of events he would have been born. Hence, the son shared the domicile of his father. Now let us see what the Code establishes concerning domicile.

CAN. 90

§ 1. Locus originis filii, etiam neophyti, est ille in quo, cum filius natus est, domicilium, aut, in defectu domicilii, quasi-domicilium habebat pater vel, si filius sit illegitimus aut postumus, mater.

§ 2. Si agatur de filio vagorum, locus originis est ipsemet nativitatis locus; si de exposito, est locus in quo inventus fuerit.

The Roman Law is here again followed. The canon applies it not only to children but also to neophytes, i. e., persons baptized as adults,[31] although such were supposed to have their legal domicile in the place of baptism. Concerning illegitimate children, the old law is followed entirely; but an innovation appears to be introduced concerning posthumous children, i. e., such as are born after the father's death. These are put on a level with the illegitimate, which seems rather strange, because the civil law treats them as equals of legitimate children and entitled to share in all their rights. Perhaps this was assumed to make sure of the birthplace of the child.[32] Paragraph 2 restates the law as contained in the Constitution "Cupientes" of Paul III.

CAN. 91

Persona dicitur: incola, in loco ubi domicilium,

31 Conc. Nic., c. 2 (c. 1, Dist. 48). 32 Cfr. Dig., 28, 2; Cod. Just., VI, 29.
32 Paul III, "Cupientes," 21 March, 1542; cfr. Aichner, § 62.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

advena,[33] in loco ubi quasi-domicilium habet; _peregrinus_, si versetur extra domicilium et quasi-domicilium quod adhuc retinet; _vagus_, si nullibi domicilium habeat vel quasi-domicilium.

CAN. 92

§ 1. Domicilium acquiritur commoratione in aliqua paroecia aut quasi-paroecia, aut saltem in dioecesi, vicariatu apostolico, praefectura apostolica; quae commoratio vel coninuncta sit cum animo ibi perpetuo manendi, si nihil inde avocet, vel sit protracta ad decennium completum.

§ 2. Quasi-domicilium acquiritur commoratione uti supra, quae vel coniuncta sit cum animo ibi manendi saltem ad maiorem anni partem, si nihil inde avocet, vel sit reapse protracta ad maiorem partem anni.

§ 3. Domicilium vel quasi-domicilium in paroecia vel quasi-paroecia dicitur _paroeciale;_ in dioecesi, vicariatu, praefectura, non autem in paroecia vel quasi-paroecia, _dioecesanum_.

The definition of domicile is partly taken from the Code of Justinian, where we read: "Doubtless every incola has his domicile where he has established his house-goods, the bulk of his chattels and property, and which he does not intend to abandon unless called elsewhere, which he leaves as traveller and to which he returns after ceasing to travel."[35] This is the famous definition which, at least tacitly, had always been admitted by canonists and was enlarged after the twelfth century by the notion of quasi-domicile.

[33] "Advena est quem graeci ἄποικον appellant," i. e., one absent from home. (l. 239, Dig., 50, 16).

[34] L. 7, Cod. X, 40 de incolis. Cfr. Boudinhon in the Cath. Encycl., V, 103. This is one of the best articles in matters of Canon Law contained in that valuable reference work.

[35] Boudinhon, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The difference between a domicile and a quasi-domicile [36] consists first and above all in the intention. If one has the intention to reside, for instance, in a parish forever, he contracts a domicile from the very first day of his stay in the same. Of course, in the case of ordination, he would have to make oath to that effect. This intention is supplied by actual residence for ten full years.

Note that one and the same person may have two domiciles, for instance, a summer and a winter residence; for the intention in that case is equally directed to both, and perhaps the time almost equally divided between both.[37]

Quasi-domicile is determined by the intention of abiding in a place for the greater part of a year, which is generally taken to be at least six months,[38] although in common estimation seven months is properly speaking the greater part of a year. One's stay may be morally, but it must not necessarily be physically, continuous. In other words, a man may be absent from his domicile for a considerable time, say, two or three months each year, without losing his domicile, provided, of course, his intention to stay there forever is not changed. But one who has only a quasi-domicile may not be absent from it for more than five months, because quasi-domicile requires a stay of at least six months in a year in one and the same place. But an absence of a few days each month would not interrupt his quasi-domicile, as long as he has not given up the intention of remaining in the place at least six months.

What surprises us, to some extent at least, is the as-[36] Cfr. l. 6, § 2, Dig. 50, 1, ad municipalem.

[37] Cfr. decree of the Holy Office, 9 Nov., 1898. Bened. XIV, "Paucis," March 19, 1758. Students and soldiers have such a quasi-domicile.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sumption of a diocesan domicile. This is a recent notion, and it is not true to say that "many canonists,"[38] even after the "Ne temere," adopted it. Cardinal Gennari promoted the theory which has now prevailed. "The canon law," says Boudinhon[39] truly, "has never recognized as domicile an unstable residence in different parts of a diocese, without intent to establish oneself in some particular parish." Now a Catholic of, e. g., the diocese of Cheyenne, with its more than 100,000 square miles, has a pretty wide range for his domicile. Let it be confessed, however, that the "Ne temere" has turned the tide in favor of a diocesan domicile; for since the Ordinary is looked upon as equal to the parochus proprius, it is logical to regard the whole diocese as a domicile.

Paragraph 3 tells us that the parochial is not to be identified with the diocesan domicile, and consequently they may be two distinct juridical concepts. The question is therefore not quite useless: May one have a parochial and a diocesan domicile at one and the same time? The answer is rather difficult. One may move about the diocese from parish to parish for the time necessary to establish either a domicile or quasi-domicile, and, being tired of that nomadic life, settle permanently in one particular parish. As said above, from the first day of his intention to make his permanent abode in one parish a man acquires a domicile in that parish. But in that case it is clear that he intentionally gives up his domicile in another parish, because one intention excludes the other.[40] However, it is not impossible to contract two quasi-domiciles, one diocesan and the other parochial. For by staying a little over six months in one parish, a 38 Cath. Ency., l. c., p. 105.

39 Am. Eccl. Review, ibid.; Cath. Encyc., l. c., p. 105.
40 Cfr. l. 19, Dig., 1, 5; l. 27, § 2, Dig., 50, 1; c. 4, C., 34, q. 1, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google man contracts a quasi-domicile, and since the intention is supplied by this six months' stay, he is not compelled to change his intention.

CAN. 93

§ 1. Uxor, a viro legitime non separata, necessario retinet domicilium viri sui; amens, domicilium curatoris; minor, domicilium illius cuius potestati subiicitur.

§ 2. Minor infantia egressus potest quasi-domicilium proprium obtinere; item uxor a viro legitime non separata, legitime autem separata etiam domicilium.

The juridical status of wives and minors under the new Code is the same as under the Roman law.[41] But there is a difference concerning quasi-domicile, the Church law granting to wives, though not legally separated, the right to establish a quasi-domicile. This may be necessary in case of desertion, or of lawfully protracted absence from the husband; e. g., if he be called to military service. Concerning minors, the Roman law too acknowledged the possibility of their acquiring a domicile.[42]

CAN. 94

§ 1. Sive per domicilium sive per quasi-domicilium suum quisque parochum et Ordinarium sortitur.

§ 2. Proprius vagi parochus vel Ordinarius est parochus vel Ordinarius loci in quo vagus actu commoratur.

§ 3. Illorum quoque qui non habent nisi dioecesanum domicilium vel quasi-domicilium parochus proprius est parochus loci in quo actu commorantur.

41 Cfr. l. 17, § 11, Dig., 50, 1, ad municipalem; Engel, II, 2, n. 12.

42 Cfr. Can. 1097.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 95

Domicilium et quasi-domicilium amittitur discessione a loco cum animo non revertendi, salvo praescripto can. 93.

These two canons complete the subject of domicile or quasi-domicile, without mentioning the commoratio mensilis which the "Ne temere" decree had introduced, and which is adopted in the Code with regard to matrimony.[43] But this is the only case in which a monthly stay suffices for performing a legal act; in all other judiciary matters the domicile or quasi-domicile decides the forum competens with all its consequences, concerning which the fourth book is to be consulted. Here we will only mention the fact that the law makes no distinction between domicile and quasi-domicile so far as pastor and Ordinary are concerned. Hence the pastor of one's domicile has no preponderance over the pastor of one's quasi-domicile in the administration of the sacraments. In case, therefore, one has both a domicile and a quasi-domicile, it is he, not the pastor, who may decide from whom he wishes to receive the sacraments.

Concerning vagi, the new Code embodies the juridical norm of the Council of Trent,[44] which is practically followed also by our civil law. As if to prove that diocesan domicile is a vague notion, the Code compares those who have only a diocesan domicile to vagi; their pastor is the one in whose parish they happen to live at the moment. This is import in regard to marriages, but investigation must be made as to their free status.

Why can. 95 exempts wives, minors, and the insane

43 Cfr. Can. 1097.

44 Cfr. Conc. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 7, de ref. mat.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from losing their domicile is evident from the juridical assumption that they have no domicile of their own choice.

It is not so easy to see why a wife lawfully separated from her husband (by ecclesiastical and civil court) and who can have a domicile of her own, can not lose it by departing from it with the intention not to return.

BLOOD RELATIONSHIP AND AFFINITY

If a common dwelling place, e. g., a municipality or city, is determined chiefly by origin and domicile, and hence may be called a civic or ecclesiastical relation, there is a still nearer connection possible, viz., by blood and affection. Hence the Code now proceeds to the determination of those relationships,— consanguinity and affinity.

CAN. 96

§ 1. Consanguinitas computatur per lineas et gradus.

§ 2. In linea recta, tot sunt gradus quot generationes, seu quot personae, stipite dempto.

§ 3. In linea obliqua, si tractus uterque sit aequalis, tot sunt gradus quot generationes in uno tractu lineae: si duo tractus sint inaequales, tot gradus quot generationes in tractu longiore.

CAN. 97

§ 1. Affinitas oritur ex matrimonio valido sive rato tantum sive rato et consummato.

§ 2. Viget inter virum dumtaxat et consanguineos mulieris, itemque mulierem inter et viri consanguineos.

§ 3. Ita computatur ut qui sunt consanguinei viri, iidem in eadem linea et gradu sint affines mulieris, et vice versa.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Little practical value would ensue here from a further explanation, which must be deferred to the canons on marriage. Note that affinity has shared the fate of public honesty, in as far as also from a non-consummated marriage relationship results, which formerly was limited to matrimonium consummatum, or rather to carnal intercourse, licit or illicit.

VARIOUS RITES

CAN. 98

§ 1. Inter varios catholicos ritus ad illum quis pertinet, cuius caeremoniis baptizatus fuit, nisi forte baptismus a ritus alieni ministro vel fraude collatus fuit, vel ob gravem necessitatem, cum sacerdos proprii ritus praesto esse non potuit, vel ex dispensatione apostolica, cum facultas data fuit ut quis certo quodam ritu baptizaretur, quin tamen eidem adscriptus maneret.

§ 2. Clerici nullo modo inducere praesumant sive latinos ad orientalem, sive orientales ad latinum ritum assumendum.

§ 3. Nemini licet sine venia Apostolicae Sedis ad alium ritum transire, aut, post legitimum transitum, ad pristinum reverti.

§ 4. Integrum est mulieri diversi ritus ad ritum viri, in matrimonio ineundo vel eo durante, transire; matrimonio autem soluto, resumendi proprii ritus libera est potestas, nisi iure particulari aliud cautum sit.

§ 5. Mos, quamvis diuturnus, sacrae Synaxis ritu alieno suscipiendae non secumfert ritus mutationem.

What this canon says concerning the different rites, of which mention was made in the first book (can. 1),

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was determined in the Constitutions of Benedict XIV,[45] Pius IX,[46] and Leo XIII, especially in the latter's Apostolic Letter "De disciplina Orientalium conservanda et tuenda."[47] The solicitude of the Apostolic See for the reunion of the Oriental dissidents and, at the same time, for the preservation of their peculiar rites, has been amply illustrated by Benedict XIV in his "Allatae."

The reason why baptism is the characteristic mark of distinction between the different rites, must be sought in the ceremonies employed by the Orientals in conferring this sacrament,[48] which is the gate to the Church. The Oriental formula, though deprecatory rather than indicative, is equivalent to the Latin: "Ego te baptizo." The attending ceremonies, however, especially the confirmation connected with baptism, differ greatly. Hence it is proper that the difference of ceremony in conferring the sacrament of initiation should mark the distinction between the rites at large.

If a Latin minister baptizes "by fraud," e. g., pretending to be an Oriental minister, the child nevertheless belongs to his father's rite, for the rite of the father determines that of the child. A case of necessity, when by reason of not having an Oriental minister a Latin priest should have to baptize the child of an Oriental, is mentioned by Benedict XIV.[49] The last clause of paragraph 1 of our canon is an amplification of the case cited in Leo's "Orientalium," where mention[50] is made of one 45 "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742; "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743; "Allatae," Feb. 20, 1755 (Bull. Bened., ed. Prat., 1845, I, 197 ff; 328 ff; 249 ff.

46 "In suprema," Jan. 6, 1848; "Romani Pontifices," Jan. 6, 1862; "Amantissimus," Apr. 8, 1862 (Coll. Lac., II, 484 ff.).

47 "Orientalium," Nov. 30, 1894 (Leonis XIII Allocutiones, Epistolae, Constitutiones; ed. Desclée, 1898, v, 303 ff.).

48 Cf. Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," § II (l. c., p. 199).

49 "Demandatam," § 18 (l. c., p. 322).

50 No. XI (l. c., p. 308).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

converted to the unity of faith under the condition of embracing the Latin rite. Such a one is not bound to remain a Latin forever, but may return to his native (of course Catholic) Oriental rite.[51]

Paragraph 2 prohibits proselytizing, without, however, mentioning the penalty of suspension inflicted in "Orientalium" [52] and "Demandatam." Paragraph 3 is a modification of Leo's Constitution which permitted a return to the former rite if the Apostolic See had been asked — Apostolica Sede exorata.

Paragraph 4 is taken almost verbally from Leo's Constitution, with the exception of the clause, "unless otherwise provided by particular law." Under this clause a provincial council might issue regulations contrary to this canon.

As to the last paragraph, the respective passage in "Orientalium" is somewhat wider: "The faithful are at liberty to communicate in either rite, not only in places where there are no churches or priests of their own rite, but also where their places of worship are too distant to be conveniently frequented. But they must not on that account be supposed to have changed their rite, but remain in all other offices subject to their own pastor." [53]

Since this canon offers us an opportunity which, as far as we are aware, does not recur in the whole Code, it may not be amiss to complete the subject from the Constitution of Leo XIII. Religious who conduct schools frequented by members of the Oriental rite, should employ a priest of that rite for the respective functions. Every Oriental who lives outside the territory of his Patriarch is under the care of the Latin priest, but re-51 Ib., n. I (p. 306 ff.). Neither could we discover this penalty in the penal code.

52 L. c., n. II (p. 307).

53 Ib., n. III, IV, IX, XII, (l. c., p. 307 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mains subject to his own rite, so that nothing is changed in his relation to the Oriental rite. Matrimonial and other ecclesiastical causes appealed to the Apostolic Delegate must be submitted to the S. C. pro Ecclesia Orientali. These general rules also hold good for the Orientals in this country.

MORAL OR JURIDICAL PERSONS

CAN. 99

In Ecclesia, praeter personas physicas, sunt etiam personae morales, publica auctoritate constitutae, quae distinguuntur in personas morales collegiales et non collegiales, ut ecclesiae, Seminaria, beneficia, etc.

(For can. 100, see p. 3, supra.)

CAN. 101

§ 1. Circa actus personarum moralium collegialium:

1.° Nisi aliud expresse iure communi aut particulari statutum fuerit, id vim iuris habet, quod, demptis suffragiis nullis, placuerit parti absolute maiori eorum qui suffragium ferunt, aut, post duo inefficacia scrutinia, parti relative maiori in tertio scrutinio; quod si suffragia aequalia fuerint, post tertium scrutinium praeses suo voto paritatem dirimat aut, si agatur de electionibus et praeses suo voto paritatem dirimere nolit, electus habeatur senior ordine vel prima professione vel aetate;

2.° Quod autem omnes, uti singulos, tangit, ab omnibus probari debet.

§ 2. Si de actibus personarum moralium non collegialium agatur, serventur particularia statuta ac normae iuris communis, quae easdem personas respiciunt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 102

§ 1. Persona moralis, natura sua, perpetua est; extinguitur tamen si a legitima auctoritate supprimatur, vel si per centum annorum spatium esse desierit.

§ 2. Si vel unum ex personae moralis collegialis membris supersit, ius omnium in illud recidit.

What has been said, supra, pp. 1 sqq., about moral persons may now be detailed. Canon 99 draws a distinction between corporate and non-corporate bodies. What is required for the former has been stated above. Properly speaking, non-corporate bodies cannot be called juridical persons at all. For such the term "moral entities" (the Italians style all corporations "enti morali") would be more suitable. But it was precisely the Italian government, or rather some extremely radical jurists, who, in order more readily to suppress ecclesiastical corporations, denied the existence of such moral entities.[54] On the other hand, civil governments, especially in Europe, have acknowledged the legal title of corporations even to parishes.[55] Here a parish is not considered a corporation, because it lacks an end sufficiently distinct from others,— all parishes having one and the same end, the care of souls,— and because of the want of a subject proper as bearer of corporate rights. The parish as such is not the bearer of distinctly ecclesiastical rights, as it is composed of lay people who enjoy rights only as far as they are members of the Church. Hence the cor-

54 Thus Scaduto and Giorgi, La Dottrina delle Persone Giuridiche, Firenze 1897. But what about Italia Unita? Is it no ente or corpo morale?

55 Cf. Lampert, Die rechte Stellung der Landeskirchen in den Schweizer. Kantonen, 1908; ID., Doc. Stifungen, 1912; Schul-System, p. 252.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

porate rights would be vested in the pastor, who, however, cannot form a corporation, since to constitute a corporation requires at least three physical members. English law perceived the difficulty and assumed, very logically, a corporation sole. Our States, after some changes and development, assume either a corporation aggregate, or the trustee corporation, or the modern form of the corporation sole.[56]

As stated under can. 100, § 3, such corporations have an end subordinate to that of the universal Church, and depend for their legal existence on the supreme authority, and hence share the lot of minors placed under guardians. It follows that their corporate acts are subject to common law and to those particular laws which conform to the former, or if they do not conform, are at least approved of by higher authority. For just as the State requires conformity to its own common laws when approving a corporation, so also the Church approves only such corporations as correspond with her general end and are conducive thereunto. Hence can. 101 establishes some general rules to be observed at meetings held to decide a matter proposed to the vote of the members of a corporate body. Under 1°, the law speaks only of such acts as are voted on by the members present ("qui suffragium ferunt"). Now it is generally presumed that two-thirds of the members present form a quorum capable of making a decision.[57] Therefore the general law considers the absent members as not claiming their right of voting, and as having no right to remonstrate against a resolution adopted by the majority. We say, the common law treats absent members thus. If the particular statutes of the corporation contain a contrary [56] Cfr. Zollmann, l. c., p. 63. [57] Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 182.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google clause, viz., that the votes must be counted according to the total number of members, either present or absent, this statute must be followed. If no such statute exists, votes of the members present only are counted.

Number 2 provides that the invalid votes (demptis suffragiis nullis) must be subtracted from the sum-total of the voters present.

A suffrage is null and void, according to the Code,[58] if extorted, or not given secretly,— if secrecy be required by the particular statutes, in matters not touching election, — or if given conditionally. Such votes, therefore, must be thrown out.

An absolute majority is one vote more than half of those given; for instance, if there are thirteen who cast a vote for or against selling a certain property, and seven are for, while six are against selling, the resolution carries in favor of selling. A relative majority can take place only when more than two resolutions or more than two candidates are at issue. Thus, in the case just mentioned, there may be question not only of selling or not selling, but also of renting or borrowing money. If four of twelve members present would vote for selling, and three against, and five for taking up money, the last vote would carry, but only in the third scrutiny, not in the first and second, because for these two an absolute majority is required, and hence seven votes out of twelve would have to be cast for taking up money if it should carry in the first or second ballot.[59]

The last means of deciding an even vote is the president or presiding officer, who may give his vote in 58 Can. 169. These rules affect the moral and juridical liberty of the voters.

59 Cfr. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 184. This rule was formerly rejected by weighty canonists; but it is very reasonable in that it prevents waste of time.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

favor of either side. But there may be cases, especially in elections, when the president does not wish to cast the deciding vote. If two or three candidates come out with an even number of votes in three scrutinies, and the presiding officer refuses to decide in favor of any one, how is the election to be settled? First the rank and seniority of sacred orders must be considered, and therefore a priest must be preferred to a deacon, and a deacon to a subdeacon (minor orders are not taken into consideration). If in a religious community two priests are elected who were ordained on the same day, the date of their simple profession decides the preference, and if by a fanciful hypothesis both should have been ordained and made their profession on the same day,[60] the priority of age must decide who is elected; because then the rule would hold: "Prior in tempore, potior in iure," as will be seen under the canon governing precedence.

No. 2 of § 1 (canon 101) apparently sets up a contradictory rûle by ordaining that "what touches all, as individuals, must be approved by all," in accordance with the regula juris 29 in 6°: "Quod omnes tangit, debet ab omnibus approbari."[61] But our text by way of explanation adds: "ut singulos." These two words clear up the apparent contradiction. For in every corporation there are rights which touch the corporation as such (e. g., corporation property) and rights which are intrinsically inherent in each member as such. Concerning the latter class the law requires that the approval of all must be given, if rights are to be given up, or changed, or retained. An example of the former would be, according to our 60 Reg. S. Bened., c. 58; cfr. l. 5, Cod. Just., v, 59 de auctoritate praestanda; l. 11 Dig. 8, 3, De servitut. praed. rust; Reiffenstuel, t. ult., Reg. 29.

61 Reiffenstuel, Com. in Reg. Iuris, 29, n. 7 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

opinion, a change of statutes, of the latter, a change of election and compromise.[62]

As to paragraph 2, nothing need be added except that the acts mentioned therein are not properly speaking corporative acts or enactments, but mere rules set forth by proper authority.

That a moral person is perpetual, as can. 102 states, follows from the nature of its organization and end, which is enduring. That the legitimate authority which has sanctioned its existence, can also dissolve a corporation, needs no proof.

§ 2 enacts that corporate rights devolve on the surviving member. This follows from the generally accepted rule: "Collegium remanet in uno." Although at least three persons are required for constituting a corporation, yet by way of devolution the corporate rights would, in case of death or defection of all but one member, devolve on that member, who would become the bearer of all those rights, though he could not exercise all of them, for instance, he could not elect himself.[63]

ETHICAL QUALITIES OF LEGAL ACTS (VIS, METUS, ERROR)

If we speak here of moral qualities, we do not mean to deny the juridical character inherent in these qualities. It is evident that violence, fear, and error, of which the two following canons treat, affect chiefly the intrinsic or ethical side of corporate acts, and only indirectly their juridical nature. This is quite obvious, for it is impossible to sever morality from right or law.

62 Cfr. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 184, p. 601; Aichner, l. c., § 82, 1. Cfr. can. 162 (on election); can. 172 (on compromise).

63 Cfr. Bouix (as under note 62).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 103

§ 1. Actus, quos persona sive physica sive moralis ponit ex vi extrinseca, cui resisti non possit, pro infectis habentur.

§ 2. Actus positi ex metu gravi et iniuste incusso vel ex dolo, valent, nisi aliud iure caveatur; sed possunt ad normam can. 1684–1689 per iudicis sententiam rescindi, sive ad petitionem partis laesae sive ex officio.

CAN. 104

Error actum irritum reddit, si versetur circa id quod constituit substantiam actus vel recidat in conditionem sine qua non; secus actus valet, nisi aliud iure caveatur; sed in contractibus error locum dare potest actioni rescissoriae ad normam iuris.

These are general norms, universally accepted by canonists, except the second paragraph of Can. 103 in its broad sense. Civil law is more lenient with regard to accidental errors.

Violence, or physical force, whether justly or unjustly exercised, if irresistible, of necessity excludes free consent of the will. Wherefore an act posited — we cannot well say performed — under such influence, can neither be imputed nor does it entail a moral or juridical obligation. Note, however, the clause, "which cannot be resisted." For if the assailant can be resisted, at least by using equal violence, he should be resisted; violence must be warded off by violence, unless perhaps reverence or respect would dictate otherwise. Thus a child may not use violence against his parents, even though they should physically try to force him into a state of life distasteful to him. Violence is less practicable in case of a corporation, because a crowd is less liable to be attacked. Yet even a body of men, for instance, electors, may be subjected to violence. The people of Viterbo gave actual proof of this.[64]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Physical violence, thus brought to bear on the mind in order to force a man to do something against his will creates no voluntarium, and therefore produces no human act.[65] Notice, however, that this violence must affect the person himself; violence done to parents, near relatives, or friends, is not the violence of which § 1 of our canon speaks, but is rather fear or alarm, which the Code considers next.

Fear is an emotion excited by threatening evil or impending pain, accompanied by a desire to escape or avoid it. All violence, as the Pandects say,[66] is fear or causes fear; but metus does not always include physical force. The law then goes on to determine the nature of fear. Fear, to render an act involuntary, must be grievous, vehement, and at the same time unjustly threatened. Concerning the first condition authors generally describe fear as grievous when it is such as may befall a man of robust body and mind, not a nervous or weak-minded person. Wherefore, they add, two things are required to constitute grievous or vehement fear, viz., that the threatened evil exists objectively, not merely in the imagination, and that the evil threatened be important and weighty, e. g., death, mutilation, imprisonment, loss or confiscation of property, defloration,[67] and, we might add, the loss of 64 The incident of Viterbo, 1270–71, was instrumental in framing the decretal of Gregory X on papal elections, c. 3, 6°, I, 6.

65 S. Th., I-II, q. 6, a. 5; cfr. c. 4, X, I, 40 de his quae vi metusve causa fiunt; Dig. 4, 2; Cod. Just., 2, 19.

66 L. 1, Dig. 4, 2: "Metus instantis vel futuri periculi causa mentis tripidatio."

67 Reiffenstuel, I, 40, n. 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google reputation for a person in good standing, or of social position and remunerative occupation.

The other condition is that fear be unjustly threatened or inflicted. Unjust would be a fear excited by private authority, or by one not entitled to threaten an evil in order to obtain consent. We should likewise consider a fear unjustly threatened if there were no proportion between the greatness of the evil threatened and the reason for which it is threatened. Thus a judge might unjustly threaten one to force him to marry a certain person for futile reasons, or threaten one so that he would give up a position because of political disagreement.

This remark leads to another observation made by canonists. The connection between the evil threatened and the special act which is to be extorted by the threat, is expressed by the disjunctive formula: either — or; either death or marriage; — in other words, the evil must be threatened ad hoc, for that very purpose, and no other.[68] Lastly, as the term "incussus" seems to imply, the fear must come from outside, ab extrinseco, or, as it is also termed, from a causa libera, i. e., an agency existing outside the one who suffers fear, and not from a natural phenomenon such as lightning or shipwreck.

Now an act performed under the influence of fear, thus described, or inspired by fear, is not necessarily invalid, because it may still be truly voluntary, though, under a certain aspect (secundum quid), it is involuntary. For there is in the intellect the knowledge of an end, and that end is wished for, along with what is chosen as a necessary means to it. In this respect, such actions are, in themselves, truly and properly called voluntary. On the other hand, these same acts are performed against the inclination of the will and with reluctance; and although the person cannot say, "I will not," yet he could truly say, "I would I could not." Hence, actions performed under the influence of fear are in a certain respect involuntary [69] and, according to our Code, give the victim the right to have the act rescinded. However, on account of possible hallucinations, and for the sake of the public welfare, a legal procedure must be followed. The first step will be to gather proofs in the form of affidavits; the next, to secure a lawyer, unless the person is able to act as his own lawyer. Then the judge of the defendant, or in other words, the competent judge [70] — actor sequitur forum rei — must be sought.

68 Cf. S. Th., I–II, q. 6, a. 6; Hill, Ethics, 8 ed., pp. 51 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A judge may of his own accord proceed against one who has threatened another unjustly, for such conduct is detrimental to the public welfare. As soon as the judge is morally convinced that evil has been unjustly threatened, he may cite the injured party, even though the latter would wish to escape a trial. It is left to the prudent and conscientious judgment of the judge to proceed further, unless the validity of a marriage is at stake.

The same legal benefit is granted to one who suffers from another's deceit (dolus), which is called a connivance to cheat or deceive another, who thereby suffers injury. This occurs especially in matters of contract, wherein the law takes it for granted that every transaction is fair and honest.[71] Whether deceit is committed by hiding the truth (calliditas) or telling a lie (fallacia), or by some machination employing both words and deeds, is immaterial. But it is important to ascertain whether 69 This will be further explained in Book IV; cfr. cc. 1684–1689.

70 Cfr. X, II, 14 de dolo; Dig. IV, 3 de dolo malo.

71 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., III, 164.

72 Reiffenstuel, II, 14, n.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the deceit practiced is the cause of one's acting in such a way; for if the dolus is only concomitant, and not the impulsive cause of the act, the benefit of law (writ of deceit) cannot be invoked.

Deceit generally causes error, and therefore the following canon speaks of error. Error is a state of mind in which one approves falsehood for truth. It differs from ignorance, which is a lack of due knowledge. The Code distinguishes between a mistake regarding the substance of a thing, and one which concerns a quality as a condition sine qua non. The former would be the case if one bought brass for gold, a pearl of glass for a jewel, or if he married Anna instead of Mary, whom he had intended to marry.[78] An essential or sine qua non condition (this clause evidently refers to matrimonial law), would be a quality inherent in a woman by which alone she is known to the wooer, and on account of which alone he wishes to marry her (for instance, she is the first-born daughter of his friend). Such an essential condition might also occur in buying a registered steer of a certain stock. Now if the would-be groom or the buyer is in error or deceived, no matter by whom, the marriage or purchase is void, because the essential consent is wanting by reason of a false object presented to which the intention was not directed.

The circumstances which render an object less desirable may, however, be purely accidental, as when the person married is not as peaceful or as rich as pretended and believed before marriage. Such accidental errors do not render the act null and void, because consent, at least in persons acting reasonably, is not directed exclusively to such accidents.

78 This may occur in the case of twins or other persons resembling each other very closely.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But marriage is a peculiar affair, which shall be treated more fully in its proper place. The Code says that in matters of contract room is left for rescinding the act. Here especially enters the writ of deceit, which is granted also by the civil law.

It is then in the power of the plaintiff to approach the judge either to obtain damages or to put in a claim for annullment of the act performed under deceit, and the judge will have to decide whether he is competent to give a verdict in the case.[74] That the procedure must be legal is required by the public welfare, which demands equity as well as order and justice.

CONSENT OR ADVICE TO BE ASKED BY THE SUPERIOR

CAN. 105

Cum ius statuit Superiorem ad agendum indigere consensu vel consilio aliquarum personarum:

1.° Si consensus exigatur, Superior contra earundem votum invalide agit; si consilium tantum, per verba, ex. gr.: de consilio consultorum, vel audito Capitulo, parocho, etc., satis est ad valide agendum ut Superior illas personas audiat; quamvis autem nulla obligatione teneatur ad eorum votum, etsi concors, accedendi, multum tamen, si plures audiendae sint personae, concordibus earundem suffragiis deferat, nec ab eisdem, sine praevalenti ratione, suo iudicio aestimanda, discedat;

2.° Si requiratur consensus vel consilium non unius tantum vel alterius personae, sed plurium simul, eae personae legitime convocentur, salvo praescripto can. 162, § 4, et mentem suam manifestent; Superior autem pro sua prudentia ac negotiorum gravitate potest eas

74 Cfr. cc. 1679–1683, which correspond to the actio erroris.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

adigere ad iusiurandum de secreto servando praestandum;

3.° Omnes de consensu vel consilio requisiti debent ea qua par est reverentia, fide ac sinceritate sententiam suam aperire.

The general rule, says Engel,[75] is that every important matter should be treated by the superior (prelate) either with the consent or with the advice of his chapter.

Such advice, though it does not bind the superior, is not to be looked upon as superfluous. For by counsel, observes the same author, hasty and foolish acts are prevented, and several pairs of eyes see more than one. This rule, of course, applies especially to cathedral and religious chapters, where the bonum privatum must cede to the bonum commune. Which cases require consent or advice is stated in the law. We merely observe that, unless expressly provided in the Code, advice only, not consent must be asked.[76]

The next number treats of convocation required in case several persons must be asked at the same time. This is the case with our diocesan consultors, who, therefore, must be called together for a meeting whenever their consent or counsel is demanded by law. For though our consultors do not as yet, like the diocesan chapter, form an ecclesiastical corporation, they take the place of such in the government of the diocese, and, besides, constitute among themselves,[77] a "coetus," which is the meaning of "plures simul."

Of course, if all the consultors should accidentally be present, for instance, at a diocesan meeting or clerical 75 Cfr. ad X, III, t, 10, n. 1, de his quae fiunt a praelatis sine consensu capituli; Engel, III, 10, n. 1. Reg. S. Bened., which, however, speaks only of advice, not consent.

76 Cfr. Can. 427.

77 Cfr. Can. 162 § 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

retreat or on some festive occasion,[78] the bishop may make use of that opportunity and consult them there and then, but not in the presence of others, i. e., not in such a way that others may hear the counsel and the consultors thereby perhaps be compromised or hindered in their free speech.

Whether a matter is of sufficient importance to require secrecy, is left to the judgment of the superior.

PRECEDENCE

Precedence, first and above all, means priority in rank or dignity, and this, in turn, is chiefly, though not exclusively, based upon the authority or power one enjoys over another. Hence the relation between superior and inferior, between maioritas and obedientia, as defined in the Decretals (I, 33). Similarly, our Code establishes jurisdiction as the primary rule of distinction.[79]

CAN. 106

Circa praecedentiam inter varias personas seu physicas seu morales, serventur normae quae sequuntur, salvis normis specialibus quae suis in locis traduntur:

1.° Qui alius personam gerit, ex eadem obtinet praecedentiam; sed qui in Conciliis alliisque similibus conventibus procuratorio nomine intersunt, sedent post illos eiusdem gradus qui intersunt nomine proprio;

2.° Cui est auctoritas in personas sive physicas sive morales, eidem ius est praecedentiae supra illas;

3.° Inter diversas personas ecclesiasticas quarum nulla habeat in alias auctoritatem: qui ad gradum potiorem pertinent, praecedunt eis qui sunt inferioris

78 Cfr. Can. 162 § 4. K.-R., I, 431 f.
79 Cfr. c. 15, X, I, 33; v. Scherer,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gradus; inter eiusdem gradus personas sed non eiusdem ordinis, qui altiorem ordinem tenet, praecedit iis qui in inferiore sunt positi; si denique ad eundem gradum pertineant eundemque ordinem habeant, praecedit qui prius est promotus ad gradum; si eodem tempore promoti sint, senior ordinatione, nisi iunior ordinatus fuerit a Romano Pontifice; et si eodem tempore ordinem receperint, senior aetate;

4.° In praecedentia diversitas ritus non attenditur;

5.° Inter varias personas morales eiusdem speciei et gradus, illa praecedit quae est in pacifica quasi-possessione praecedentiae et, si de hoc non constet, quae prius in loco, ubi quaestio oritur, instituta est; inter sodales vero alicuius collegii, ius praecedentiae determinetur ex propriis legitimis constitutionibus; secus ex legitima consuetudine; qua deficiente, ex praescripto iuris communis;

6. Loci Ordinarii est in sua dioecesi statuere praecedentias inter suos subditos, ratione habita principiorum iuris communis, legitimarum dioecesis consuetudinum et munerum ipsis commissorum; et omnes de praecedentia controversias, etiam inter exemptos, quatenus ii collegialiter cum aliis procedant, componere in casibus urgentioribus, remota omni appellatione in suspensivo, sed sine praeiudicio iuris uniuscuiusque;

7.° Circa personas quae ad Domum pontificalem pertinent, praecedentia moderanda est secundum peculiaria privilegia, regulas et traditiones eiusdem pontificiae Domus.

This question of precedence may come up at a future council just as it did at the Vatican Council,[80] where prece-80 Cf. Granderath-Kirch, Gesch. des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, I, p. 391 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dence was established as follows: (1) Cardinals according to their titles, episcopal, presbyterial, diaconal; (2) Patriarchs; (3) Primates, but only by a special grant of the Pope; (4) Archbishops according to the time of their promotion; (5) Bishops in the same way; (6) Superiors general of religious orders with solemn vows.[81] Procurators were excluded from both a consultative and a decisive vote, just as they are now under the new Code.[82] To plenary councils no procurators are admitted, except coadjutors or auxiliary bishops,[83] who, therefore, will have to take their seats after the ordinaries who are personally present. Since the general rule is that precedence must be determined according to the rank of the person represented, an apostolic legate precedes all others, provided he be a cardinal.

This is the principle of distinction regarding rank or precedence. However, it may happen that many are present of equal authority, wherefore, to avoid unpleasant contention, the following rules are to be enforced:

It may happen, not only in conciliar meetings, but also on any festal occasion, that this "crux magistrorum ceremoniarum" (the question of precedence) may arise. Our canon furnishes the solution. We will add only a few remarks. Cardinals always have precedence over all other dignitaries except an apostolic legate. They rank according as they are Cardinal bishops, priests, or deacons, and are followed by the Patriarchs, the residential archbishops and bishops,[84] titular archbishops and titular bishops, who have no "authority," properly speaking.

81 Concerning the Council of Trent, to which procurators of the German bishops were admitted, ib. p. 108 ff.; Concilium Trid., 1901, I, 202, 349, 368 etc.; can. 224, § 2.

82 Cfr. can. 282.

83 But in his own territory the diocesan bishop precedes even archbishops — with the exception of his Metropolitan — and all other bishops. Can. 347.

84 This rule was observed at the Vatican Council; Granderath-Kirch, l. c., I, p. 392.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Among those of equal rank, e. g., bishops, the one who has been promoted earlier to the episcopal rank precedes the one whose promotion occurred later. Notice the term promotion, for it means the publication of the bishop's name in Consistory, not the date of his election or consecration.[85]

The next step in deciding the question of precedence between two prelates of equal rank, order, and promotion, is to ascertain the date of their ordination. Now ordination, according to our Code,[86] includes the conferring of the tonsure, wherefore the date of clerical initiation decides seniority. One case, however, is excepted, viz., if one is ordained by the Roman Pontiff.[87] But the term "Roman Pontiff" is here to be interpreted strictly, wherefore ordination by the Cardinal Vicar of Rome or another Cardinal does not involve that privilege. A special delegation, however, given by the Pope to ordain a cleric in his name would have the same effect as ordination performed by the Pontiff himself.[88] Finally the last hypothesis is clear enough, viz., if two were equal in rank, order, promotion, time of ordination, then the natural age would have to decide.

Hence Latin and Oriental bishops or priests are equal, ceteris paribus.

The rule of precedence among religious is settled in the section on religious, can. 491, but since this bone of contention has always troubled the house of God, as we know from innumerable decisions of the S. C. EE. et RR., several pontifical Constitutions[88] have been issued

85 Can. 350.

86 Can. 950; cfr. c. 12, X, I, 11 de temp. ord.; Bened. XIV, "In postremo," Oct. 20, 1756 (Bull., Prati, t. III, 388 ff.).

87 "In postremo," § 19 (p. 398).

88 Pius V, "Divina," Aug. 17, 1567; Greg. XIII, "Exposcit," July 25, 1583. Cfr. the Gloss ad c. 1, 6°, III, 13; c. m. 6°, v, 6; Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 33, n. 2 (vol. I, p. 380).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

on this matter, which we shall quote in their proper place.

The first clause of n. 5 is taken from "Exposcit" of Gregory XIII, July 25, 1583. There the question was settled concerning the Mendicant Orders in the way now prescribed for all. If a Mendicant Order could prove its quasi-possession,[89] that is, undisturbed and uncontested precedence for a time at least sufficient for prescription, it was supposed to have a just title thereto. If no such proof could be furnished, the historical fact of being founded in a place earlier than a competitor was to settle the question. This is still the rule concerning corporations of the same kind. It also applies to corporations of the same rank. A cathedral is of higher rank than a collegiate chapter, a distinguished chapter higher than a non-distinguished.[90] A clerical order enjoys precedence over a non-clerical one, etc.[91] Corporations which have their own constitutions must consult these, or else custom and the common law, especially the present paragraph, and others treating the question of precedence.

This latter ruling is very wise because apt to maintain order and decorum on solemn occasions, without prejudice to the rights of religious.

During procession, the decision of the Ordinary must be obeyed, and only after the function is over, have those who think they are wronged a right to defend their claim, first before the bishop, and then before the S. C. Relig.

The rules under § 7, concerning the Papal Household

89 It is called quasi-possession because of the nature of right, which is not corporeal; vide Reiffenstuel, II, 12, n. 143 ff.

90 Cfr. can. 391, § 2; can. 408; can. 491.

91 If men strike each other with the staffs of their banners and crosses — and we read of such instances in genuine records — the decorum is gone.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or Famiglia Pontificia are contained in the Caeremoniale of the papal palace and do not enter into our present purpose. Precedence, like etiquette, belongs to every well regulated government, and not even a thorough-going democrat has a right to ridicule it, for it is based on human nature and the dictates of right reason.

CAN. 107

Ex divina institutione sunt in Ecclesia clerici a laicis distincti, licet non omnes clerici sint divinae institutionis; utrique autem possunt esse religiosi.

After treating generally of the members of the Church who are such by baptism, and of the different physical and moral persons who may exist within the Church, the Code draws the line of demarcation between clergy and laity. This distinction, as pointed out above, is based upon the nature of the Church, which, because of its divine and therefore legal and necessary existence, has a constitution of its own, neither made nor to be changed by men, at least in its essential features. One essential feature of this constitution is the hierarchy in the broad sense, involving a distinction between clergy and laity.

The term clergy is derived from the Greek κλῆρος, (Latin sors), a lot.[92] According to St. Jerome, clerics are so called because they are called into the lot of the Lord, or because the Lord is their portion, or because they are chosen by lot. Therefore every clergyman may in a particular sense be called a servant of God. That the clergy, distinguished into its hierarchic orders, has gradually grown into a minutely arranged system, is owing to 92 Cfr. c. 5, C. 12, q. 1; c. 7, ib. (incerti auctoris, saec. XI).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

circumstances of necessity and natural development, excepting, of course, the divinely ordained distinction between bishops, priests, and deacons.

The word laity is derived from λαός (plebs), people, in which sense it occurs in the epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians.[93] Hence this organisation or distinction can claim divine institution.

[93] C. 40; cf. Bruders-Villa, La Costituzione della Chiesa, 1906; German: Die Verfassung der Kirche in Ehrhard's Kirch. Forschungen, 1904, IV.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART I

THE CLERGY

SECTION I

THE CLERGY IN GENERAL[1]

CAN. 108

§ 1. Qui divinis ministeriis per primam saltem tonsuram mancipati sunt, clerici dicuntur.

§ 2. Non sunt omnes in eodem gradu, sed inter eos sacra hierarchia est in qua alii aliis subordinantur.

§ 3. Ex divina institutione sacra hierarchia ratione ordinis constat Episcopis, presbyteris et ministris; ratione iurisdictionis, pontificatu supremo et episcopatu subordinato; ex Ecclesiae autem institutione alii quoque gradus accessere.

In connection with the custom of cutting the hair of those who were to be servants (mancipati, serfs, slaves) of the Church, tonsure occurs as early as the fifth century.[1] It may be defined as a rite whereby a Christian (Catholic) is constituted in the clerical state and made fit to receive minor orders.[2] Hence tonsure [3] can be con-

1 Cf. Coustant, l. c., p. 73; Martène, De Antiquis Eccl. Ritibus, l. i, c. 8, art. 7 (ed. Antwerp, 1736, t. II, 40 ff.); Conc. Agath., an. 506, c. 19. Mancipia were serfs or a higher grade of slaves; cfr. Cod. Just., XI, 63.

2 Cfr. Pont. Rom., De Clerico Faciendo; Lämmer, K.-R., p. 81.

3 Cfr. Conc. Trid., Sess. 23, c. 4, De Ref.— The difference between the Scottish and Roman tonsure

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ferred only on such as are validly baptized and confirmed and ask for it of their own free will and without deceit. Tonsure is not enumerated among the minor orders, nor is it considered an order at all.[4]

Those, then, who have received the tonsure are called clerics — i. e., men bound to the sacred ministry. As that ministry has various functions, necessitating the exercise of various powers, which are distributed by degrees, it follows that there must be a sacred authority ruling over the whole ministry. This sacred authority is the hierarchy, an organization by virtue of which clerics are subordinate to one another and enjoy ecclesiastical power in various degrees.

Three orders are of divine origin: the episcopate, the priesthood, and the ministry [5] or diaconate, taking it in the sense of the Church. The words episcopi, presbyteri, and diaconi occur in the pastoral letters of St. Paul as well as in the Acts of the Apostles. But we do not meet with a fixed terminology until St. Ignatius of Antioch, and even after that there is a certain vagueness in the use of sacerdotes and episcopi, the terms being often employed synonymously.[6] This fact, however, does not prove that the functions or powers of the two orders were considered to be identical.

Besides these three, other minor ranks were introduced at an early date, owing to the manifold needs of the Church and the increased occupations of the clergy. From the beginning of the second to the middle of the third century there was an almost continual develop-caused quite a controversy in France and England up to the beginning of the VIIIth century.

4 This is now sententia communis, although Fagnani held the opposite opinion; ad c. 11, X, I, 14, n. 43 ff.; cf. v. Scherer, I, 313.

5 Conc. Trid., Sess. 2, 3, can. 6, De sacr. ord.

6 Cf. Bruders, Die Verfassung der Kirche, passim (we are using the Italian translation by Villa).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ment of lower functions, some of which disappeared later, but most of which have survived to our own day. While the cantores, exceptores, and fossores are no longer among the orders proper, the subdeacons (hypodiaconoi), the acolytes, exorcists, lectors, and janitors (ostiarii) have retained their position as clerics. Since the eleventh century,[7] subdeaconship has even entered the ranks of the ordines maiores, while the four others are styled ordines minores.[8] These latter, though a complement of the diaconate, are of purely human origin.

The supreme pontificate and the episcopate are of divine origin, though they are distinct one from the other by reason of their jurisdictional institution. The supreme pontificate, which is an office not only of honor, but of jurisdiction in the proper sense,[9] comprises the legislative, judiciary, and coercive power in their full and unlimited extent, as far as required by the purpose of the Church. Therefore the jurisdiction of the Pope is coextensive with the Church itself, and comprises all members of the same, whatever their rank or condition, as well as all those objects which fall under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Therefore the jurisdiction of the Sovereign Pontiff is called plena et suprema.

However, the power of the bishops, though subject to and dependent upon, this supreme jurisdiction of the Pope, is really ordinary,[10] i. e., given by virtue of the episcopal office, radically or aptitudinaliter by consecration, fully and expeditely by confirmation or promotion.

7 Cfr. c. 11, Dist. 32 (Alex. II.); c. 9, X, I, 14.

8 Cf. Wieland, Die Entwicklung der sog. Ordines Minores (Röm. Quartalschrift) 1897. The theological question whether all the orders are distinct does not touch the canonist. Cfr. St. Thomas, Suppl., q. 36, art. 5; q. 37, art. 2; Bened. XIV, "In postremo," Oct. 20, 1756, § 10 ff. (Bull., t. III, p. 391 ff.); Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, 1917, p. 93.

9 Conc. Vatic., De Eccl., c. 1–3.

10 Conc. Vatic., De Eccl., c. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Whether this jurisdiction is given to the bishop immediately by the Pope or by God Himself through the medium of his Vicar on earth, is a question which may agitate a speculatively inclined theologian, but does not excite the canonist. The more common opinion is the one mentioned first, because it is certain that no bishop is constituted without the consent and confirmation of the Holy See; and hence we may say that all jurisdiction in the Church comes immediately from the Pope.[11] Since, however, the episcopal jurisdiction is an ordinary one, it cannot be set aside by the Supreme Pontiff, as if he could rule the Church by his vicars, or restrict the episcopal jurisdiction by undue reservations.[12] No such power is included in the papal sovereignty, for the simple reason that the episcopate is established by God, and forms part and parcel of the divine organism of the Church. On the other hand, subordination of the episcopal jurisdiction to that of the supreme head is a necessary requirement of unity of faith and government. An illustration is furnished by the Oriental Church.

Canon 108 says, lastly, that the other degrees existing among the clergy are of (purely) human institution. Concerning the orders and the potestas ordinis given by ordination, we have said enough. There are eight of them, now permanently fixed. As to the degrees of jurisdiction, introduced in course of time, they are especially the following: cardinals, patriarchs, primates, metropolitans, and other prelates endowed with jurisdiction in foro externo. All these will occur again.

11 Cfr. Mazzella, De Rel. et Ecc., ed. 5, p. 786, whose historical arguments, however, are not cogent, as it is hardly possible to prove that, in the first ten centuries, all the bishops received their jurisdiction from the Pope. Wernz, Jus. Dec., II, n. 737, calls the old opinion "antiquated."

12 Aichner, l. c., § 99.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 109

Qui in ecclesiasticam hierarchiam cooptantur, non ex populi vel potestatis saecularis consensu aut vocatione adleguntur; sed in gradibus potestatis ordinis constituuntur sacra ordinatione; in supremo pontificatu, ipsomet iure divino, adimpleta conditione legitimae electionis eiusdemque acceptationis; in reliquis gradibus iurisdictionis, canonica missione.

This canon, the first clause of which is taken from the dogmatic canons of the Council of Trent,[18] is directed against certain innovations which cropped out throughout the history of the Church, but were introduced especially by the so-called reformers of the sixteenth century. The "consent of the people" was the favorite cry of Arnold of Brescia and his followers, in the twelfth century. It was repeated by Wiclif and Huss, Calvin and Zwingli. Against these the Council of Trent declared it as an article of faith that the people have no voice in the choice of ministers. The consent of the civil power was favored by Luther, and partly also by Zwingli at the Council of Zurich. Both demands are excluded by the very organization of the Church and its nature as a societas inaequalis.

The next clause establishes the human agency by which the papal power is conferred, i. e., legitimate election accepted by the person elected. On this subject more shall be said in its proper place. The reason for the law here laid down is that the papal power is supreme, and there is no superior who could either ratify election to it or accept the person elected.

18 Conc. Trid., Sess. 23, can. 4, De Eccl. Hierarchia et Ordinatione; those chosen in the way here condemned, are called "robbers and thieves." (John 10, 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The "missio canonica" is necessary for all who are inferior to the Pope. For as the Lord sent his Apostles,[14] so in turn they sent others to exercise their spiritual power with authority, and without such credentials no one has authority in the Church. Formerly (up to the twelfth century) the missio canonica was believed to be included in ordination, but now that absolute ordination is possible, a distinct missio canonica, by which jurisdiction is conferred, is always required.[15]

CAN. 110

Quamvis Praelati titulo, honoris causa, a Sede Apostolica etiam nonnulli clerici donentur sine ulla iurisdictione, proprio tamen nomine Praelati in iure dicuntur clerici sive religiosi qui iurisdictionem ordinariam in foro externo obtinent.

The name prelate is derived from praeferre, to prefer [some one] to others. It is applied in the ninth century to abbots and abbesses,[16] and later occurs frequently in the Decretals.[17] At the Roman Curia, especially since the college of cardinals shared more largely in the government of the universal Church,—i. e., since the twelfth century,—are mentioned praelati de curia and praelati domus (employed in the personal service of the pope). Both classes constitute the Praelatura Romana, now distributed among the various congregations, tribunals, and offices, and the Famiglia Pontificia.[18] A new organization of the Prothonotaries Apostolic has been created 14 Matt. 28, 18; Rom. 10, 15.

15 Cfr. Sägmüller, K.-R., ed. I, p. 147.

16 Cfr. Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Praelatus"; Tertullian, De Corona, III, 3.

17 Cfr. cc. 41, 44, X, I, 6; c. 2, X, II, 1; c. 3, X, I, 31 etc.

18 Cfr. Phillips, Kirchenrecht, Vol. VI, 297 ff; Hinschius, K.-R., I, 375 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by Pius X. The Bull "Inter multiplices," of Feb. 21, 1905, determines the rights and privileges of the four classes of prothonotaries,[19] but does not touch the domestic prelates, nor the private chamberlains residing in or outside of Rome.[20] All these are honorary prelates.

The Code says that prelates in the proper sense are such only as enjoy jurisdiction in foro externo. Forum in the primitive sense meant a market-place, where wares were exposed for sale. There were many such fora in ancient Rome. The term was also used to designate a judgment place, or court, on account of the publicity given to trials, and in this sense was transferred to the power of the judge, or rather to his competency.[21] From these two significations it is easy to construe the meaning of forum externum, which is nothing else but the power of jurisdiction in matters concerning the public order of the Church. This power is manifested in the exercise of the legislative, judiciary, and coercive function, especially in the infliction of censures and vindictive penalties, as will be seen in the fifth book.[22]

19 Cfr. Amer. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 32, p. 612 ff.

20 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., Vol. X, 510, s. v. "Monsignore;" Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 31, p. 605.

21 Cf. l. 5, Cod. Just., III, 13: "in criminali negotio rei forum accusator sequatur."

22 Cfr. Putzer, Comment., p. 24.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE I

INCARDINATION IN A DIOCESE

After describing the constituted hierarchic order of clerics who enjoy ecclesiastical power in different degrees, it is natural that the code should treat of the local [1] hierarchy, or incardination in a diocese.

The Council of Chalcedon [2] forbade so-called absolute ordinations, and hence every cleric was assigned at ordination to a specified diocese, or city, or martyr's cell, or monastery, where he had to perform his functions. Hence clerics were called incardinated in a certain church as subdeacons, deacons, or priests. Incardination in another diocese was allowed only with the permission of both bishops concerned, unless the ordinary was in the hands of enemies or otherwise impeded.[3] Litterae commendatitiae were required for receiving strange clerics or monks into dioceses and monasteries not their own.[4] In course of time, especially since the twelfth century, the old discipline was relaxed and various titles of ordination were, at least practically, admitted. But the Council of Trent [5] returned to the old discipline, and the new Code upholds its decision.

1 See the historical note under canon 216.

2 Can. 6; cfr. c. 1, dist 70; c. 1, dist. 71; c. 17, 6°, III, 4, De Praeb.

3 Cfr. c. 5, dist 71; c. 6, dist. 74.

4 Cfr. Reg. S. Bened., c. 61; c. 7, 8, dist. 71.

5 Sess. 23, c. 16, De Ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 111

§ 1. Quemlibet clericum oportet esse vel alicui dioecesi vel alicui religioni adscriptum, ita ut clerici vagi nullatenus admittantur.

§ 2. Per receptionem primae tonsurae clericus adscribitur seu, ut aiunt, incardinatur dioecesi pro cuius servitio promotus fuit.

After having stated, in can. 107, that there are two classes of persons, clerics and laymen, and that both may be religious, the Code decrees that every cleric must belong either to a diocese or to a religious order. Both dioceses and religious orders or congregations may be looked upon as corporations in the canonical sense. Every clergyman must therefore be a member of one or the other. This is necessary even from a juridical point of view. For a regulated administration requires that every subject should belong to some municipality or corporation, whose duties and obligations he shares.

A cleric becomes incardinated in a diocese or religious community at the moment when he receives the first tonsure,[6] because at that moment he enters the clerical state, which, though in abstracto it signifies the sacred ministry in general, yet in concreto means that part of the Church which is assigned for a cleric's activity. The phrase, "to the diocese to which he is promoted," includes not only the titulus servitii, but any title on which one is ordained. For § 1 simply forbids vagrant clerics.

CAN. 112

Praeter casus de quibus in can. 114, 641, § 2, ut

[6] It is called first tonsure because it presupposes the renewal of the tonsure.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clericus alienae dioecesi valide incardinetur, a suo Ordinario obtinere debet litteras ab eodem subscriptas excardinationis perpetuae et absolutae; et ab Ordinario alienae dioecesis litteras ab eodem subscriptas incardinationis pariter perpetuae et absolutae.

CAN. 113

Excardinationem vel incardinationem concedere nequit Vicarius Generalis sine mandato speciali, nec Vicarius Capitularis, nisi post annum a vacatione sedis episcopalis et cum consensu Capituli.

CAN. 114

Habetur excardinatio et incardinatio, si ab Ordinario alienae dioecesis clericus beneficium residentiale obtinuerit cum consensu sui Ordinarii in scriptis dato, vel cum licentia ab eodem in scriptis concessa e dioecesi discedendi in perpetuum.

CAN. 115

Etiam per professionem religiosam quis a propria dioecesi excardinatur, ad normam can. 585.

CAN. 116

Excardinatio fieri nequit sine iustis causis, et effectum non sortitur, nisi incardinatione secuta in alia dioecesi, cuius Ordinarius de eadem priorem Ordinarium quantocius certiorem reddat.

CAN. 117

Ad incardinationem alieni clerici Ordinarius ne deveniat, nisi:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Necessitas aut utilitas dioecesis id exigat, et salvis iuris praescriptis circa canonicum ordinationis titulum;

2.° Ex legitimo documento sibi constiterit de obtenta legitima excardinatione, et habuerit praeterea a Curia dimittente, sub secreto, si opus sit, de clerici natalibus, vita, moribus ac studiis opportuna testimonia, maxime si agatur de incardinandis clericis diversae linguae et nationis; Ordinarius autem dimittens, graviter onerata eius conscientia, advigilare debet ut testimonia sint veritati conformia;

3°. Clericus iureiurando coram eodem Ordinario eiusve delegato declaraverit se in perpetuum novae dioecesis servitio velle addici ad normam sacrorum canonum.

Many decrees[7] were issued in the course of about twenty years for the purpose of regulating the matter of excardination and incardination. They were all based on the Tridentine law and upon the Constitution "Speculatores," of Innocent XII, Nov. 4, 1694. This pontiff, a canonist of renown, determined the question of the episcopus proprius and in connection therewith, also touched the subject of excardination. According to the Constitution mentioned every layman who left the diocese where he was born or where he had a legitimate domicile, had to be excardinated by his own bishop if he wished to receive tonsure from another.[8] Our Code does not mention excardination proper, but simply says that by the first tonsure one becomes attached to the diocese for which one is to be ordained or promoted. Hence the case of laymen now no longer enters the question of excardination or incardination.

7 Cfr. A. Ap. S., II, 105; IV, 249; V, 34; VI, 182 ff.; Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 30, 293 ff.

8 Cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 536, § 3

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The new legislation may be summarized as follows:

a) Letters of excardination and incardination are required;

b) Such letters cannot be given except for just reasons;

c) Both excardination and incardination must be absolute and perpetual;

d) Excardination does not take effect until incardination has been granted.

These are the four salient points. Hence everything must be done in writing, with signature and seal. In former decrees it was required that the cleric should be minutely described as in a passport. The vicar-general needs a special mandate to issue such letters, and the vicar-capitular is allowed to grant them only after a year's vacancy. The reason for excardination must be just, and considered carefully by the Ordinary. It may be based either on necessity or utility;[9] hence a reason of either kind suffices. Necessity could be urged if there were a penuria sacerdotum, either temporary or permanent; utility, if there were need of help in diocesan institutions,— schools, seminaries, parishes of diverse languages, etc. The bishop himself is the judge about the existence of such reasons.

Excardination or incardination is absolute and perpetual if no condition is added; such a condition would be, for instance, "if you do not stay in my province," or "if you do not apply to such and such a bishop." No conditions are admitted, and if they be added, must be looked upon as non-existent. What "perpetual" means is clear; it precludes incardinating a cleric for a time only, e. g., as long as help is needed.

[9] Conc. Trid., Sess. 23, c. 16, De Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Excardination does not take effect until incardination is consummated. This is a noteworthy clause. It protects clerics against harsh measures unauthorized by law, and is simply a consequence of the law which ordains that every cleric should belong to some diocese. A bishop may dismiss a priest usque in indefinitum, but the priest continues to belong to his diocese as long as he has not been incardinated elsewhere, and, therefore, is entitled to decent support.

The bishop, however, has the right to give one written permission to take leave of absence from his diocese in perpetuum (can. 114). Permission (licentia), however, generally presupposes a demand, as the word "concessa" also implies. Wherefore, in that case, the cleric asking for such a permission has to take the consequences upon himself. As to a residential benefice, i. e., one which requires lasting residence in a strange diocese, for instance, a parish or canonical office, excardination and incardination are implied in the very grant thereof. The same is to be said concerning religious profession which is made by perpetual (either solemn or simple) vows (can. 505). For by such a vow one becomes a member of a religious body.

The oath to be given at incardination is that which is taken by touching the Gospels as a witness of one's earnest intention. The S. C. Cons. has decided that, if this oath was perchance omitted at the time of incardination, the bishop cannot therefore declare the incardination invalid.[10] This decision, we believe, is not overthrown by the Code, because the wording of can. 107, though prohibitive, is not nullifying.

[10] Jan. 31, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 34).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE II

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES OF CLERICS

If the clerical state, on account of its hierarchic power, is superior to the lay state, it follows that this superiority must be manifested by outward signs or rights. This is a dictate of reason, as the history of all civilized nations attests. Wherever there was a legally acknowledged priesthood, it enjoyed marked distinctions, not only under the Jewish theocracy, but also in the Oriental empires as well as in the Greek and Roman States.[1] The Christian priesthood and ministry could not form an exception. But it would be shooting beyond the mark if we were to assert that each and every privilege or right vindicated to the clergy in the following canons is of natural or divine law. For not only is it contrary to logic to deduce a particular conclusion from a general and vague premise, on the ground of their being of the same nature, but even scriptural and historical indications would fail to bear out such conclusions regarding some of these privileges.

We premise this in order to caution the reader against certain unproved assumptions.

The caption of our Title reads: "Rights and Privileges of Clerics." No precise distinction is made between rights and priviliges, and hence a margin is left for controversial speculation. The whole class of these rights

1 Cfr. Handbuch der Klass. Altertumswissenschaften, O. Gruppe, Griech. Mythologie, 1906, II, 1020 and passim; Wissowa, Religion und Kultus der Römer, 1902, pp. 63 ff.; 339 f.; 410 ff. Ramsay-Lanciani, Manual of Roman Antiquities, 1901, pp. 374 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is known by the general name of immunities.[2] Immunities comprise the privilegia canonis et fori, beneficium competentiae, and immunity in the strict sense. All these privileges belong to the clergy by virtue of their state, and remain as long as they are not forfeited by the loss of that state or by virtue of the penal law.

CAN. 118

Soli clerici possunt potestatem sive ordinis sive iurisdictionis ecclesiasticae et beneficia ac pensiones ecclesiasticas obtinere.

This is a strict right, not a mere privilege; a right reserved to the clergy because the divine organization of the Church enjoys the peculiarity that ecclesiastical power is granted only to those chosen by Christ. Hence whatever pertains to the hierarchical power, order, and jurisdiction can be conveyed only to such as belong to the hierarchy. Besides, since the material emoluments are granted on account of the spiritual office, which can be exercised only by hierarchical persons, ecclesiastical benefices and pensions can be obtained only by clerics. Therefore laymen, as such, cannot be ordained, as long as they have not received the first tonsure.[3] If the examples of St. Nicholas and Ambrosius are urged against this principle, we need not resort to Gratian's expedient,[4] but simply answer that their calling was divinely sanctioned, and rather forms an "exceptio quae firmat regulam," than a breach of principle. Laymen, as such, cannot obtain jurisdictional power in matters strictly spiritual or ec-

2 Cfr. X, III, 49, De Imm. Eccl., and the commentators thereon.

3 Cfr. c. 8, Dist. 61, e contra, c. 7, X, II, 26, De praescript.

4 Cfr. c. 8, Dist. 61, where he speaks of insufficient education and spiritual inferiority.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clesiastical;[5] neither can they obtain any benefice which is of a purely ecclesiastical nature; though by special concession they may be patrini of benefices,[6] or have the advowson, as the English law puts it.

THE PRIVILEGIUM CANONIS

CAN. 119

Omnes fideles debent clericis, pro diversis eorum gradibus et muneribus, reverentiam, seque sacrilegii delicto commaculant, si quando clericis realem iniuriam intulerint.

The relation existing between a superior and an inferior enjoins respect for authority and obedience on the part of the subordinate. Therefore the clergy always take precedence over the laity.

The second clause of our canon contains the so-called privilegium canonis, which dates back to the second Lateran Council, A. D. 1139. The violent acts perpetrated by Arnold of Brescia and his followers against priests and religious led the Council to repeat and summarize previous synodal acts of Rheims and Pisa in one canon; hence the name. This canon, the fifteenth of the Lateran Council,[7] decreed that "whoever maliciously lays hands on any cleric or monk, thereby incurs ipso facto excommunication, from which, except in danger of death, no bishop shall dare to absolve him, until he presents himself before the pope to await his sentence."

Our canon speaks of a sacrilege, but does not mention its penalty, which belongs to the penal Code.[8] Who are 5 C. 2, X, II, 1: "Laici ecclesiastica negotia tractare non praesumant"; c. 8, X, I, 43, De arbitris; concerning matrimonial causes cfr. Trid., 24, can. 24, De Matr.

6 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, I, p. 75.

7 Cfr. c. 29, C. 17, q. 4.

8 Cfr. c. 2343, which mitigated

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

meant by clerici is evident from can. 108, § 1, viz.: all those who have received the first tonsure, but also all religious of both sexes, even novices, as well as tertiaries who live in common and wear the religious habit, and hermits who live in common and have received the habit from the competent authority.[9]

The injury which is declared to be a sacrilege, must be real, that is, done to the cleric himself by act or deed, not in words only; thus imprisoning[10] a cleric or throwing mud at him, would be a real injury.

The action must be injurious, which implies that the offended person is justly[11] indignant at the perpetrator and that the latter was aware of the sacred character of his victim. Self-defence against a cleric is no injurious action. Though there is, according to our view at least, no specific difference between a sacrilegious act committed against a higher and one committed against a lower cleric, yet on account of the public order the penalties imposed differ according to the rank of the injured party. This is clearly stated in the penal Code.

THE PRIVILEGIUM FORI

CAN. 120

§ 1. Clerici in omnibus causis sive contentiosis sive criminalibus apud iudicem ecclesiasticum conveniri debent, nisi aliter pro locis particularibus legitime provisum fuerit.

§ 2. Patres Cardinales, Legati Sedis Apostolicae, Episcopi etiam titulares, Abbates vel Praelati nullius, supremi religionum iuris pontificii superiores, Officiales the penalty for injury done to the lower clergy (not prelates) by reserving it to the Ordinary.

9 Cfr. D'Annibale, Comment. in Ap. Sedis, 1894, p. 73.

10 Cfr. c. 1, 3, 4, 10, 24, 54, X, V, 39.

11 If a clergyman has provoked

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

maiores Romanae Curiae, ob negotia ad ipsorum munus pertinentia, apud iudicem laicum conveniri nequeunt sine venia Sedis Apostolicae; ceteri privilegio fori gaudentes, sine venia Ordinarii loci in quo causa peragitur; quam tamen licentiam Ordinarius, praesertim cum actor est laicus, ne deneget sine iusta et gravi causa, tum maxime cum controversiae inter partes componendae frustra operam dederit.

§ 3. Si nihilominus ab eo qui nullam praehabuerit veniam, conveniantur, possunt, ratione necessitatis, ad vitanda maiora mala comparere, certiore tamen facto Superiore a quo venia obtenta non fuit.

This canon contains, as it were, the ancient and modern history of the privilegium fori in a nutshell. The privilege, then, signifies that clerics in civil as well as criminal causes should be judged by an ecclesiastical, and not by a lay tribunal. It has been frequently asserted [12] that this privilege is of divine or natural law, and arguments from the Old Testament as well as from pagan customs have been brought forth in proof. However, a little historical reflection is sufficient to disprove these pretensions. For neither theory nor practice has always been uniform. Rather extensive prerogatives were granted to bishops. Constantine permitted them to have some influence in deciding between dissentient secular judges.[13] Valentinian III granted the right of deciding civil cases of the clergy who sought the episcopal tribunal; but criminal cases of clerics had to be brought before the lay judge.[14] Justinian excluded from the competency such treatment by an insult offered to the perpetrator's wife, mother, daughter or sister, he cannot be said to be justly indignant.

12 Cfr. the Commentators on X, II, 1, and X, III, 49.

13 Cf. Euseb., Vita Const., IV, 27; Cod. Theod., VI, 281.

14 Nov. 34, Am. 452; Gothofred,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of lay judges all causes of monks and nuns; and concerning the civil causes of clerics he ordained that they might be brought before the bishops, and only in case these should fail to reach a sentence should the lay judges be called upon to decide. In criminal cases the accused cleric was first to be cited before the episcopal court and then punished by the civil court.[15] With little differences the same practice was followed in the West, though here the influence of Pseudo-Isidore cannot be denied, as a glance into Gratian's Decree shows.[16] Since the ninth century the prelates and inferior clerics claimed immunity from lay courts. After the Reformation, and even more so after the French Revolution, under the influence of Rationalism, the privilegium fori was curtailed, in some instances (Austria, Bavaria, Sicily) with the consent of the Holy See by way of concordats.[17]

The latest occasion where the privilegium fori was publicly and emphatically reasserted was in the Verdesi-Briccardelli case, in which certain Cardinals were cited to appear in court, and were excused only on the ground that exemption was attached to the royal order of the Annunziata, to which they happened to belong. This incident called forth the famous Motu proprio of Pius X, "Quantavis diligentia" of Oct. 9, 1911, which caused unnecessary disturbance in more than one parliament.[18]

After this historical preliminary let us see what the Code states. It first vindicates (§ 1) the privileged court for the whole clergy as far as the term clergy extends, i. e., all those who enjoy the privilegium canonis. But it also

VI, 417; Baronius, Annal. Eccl. ad Annum 452.

15 Nov., 83, § 1; 123, c. 27.

16 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 9, 10, C, 11, q. 1 (all Pseudo-Isidorian sources); see Bachofen, Summa Juris Eccl. Pub., p. 78 ff.

17 Austrian Concordat, art. 13; Aichner, Appendix, p. 6; Nussi, Conventions, 1809, p. 193.

18 Cfr. A. Ap.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

makes an exemption, viz., for those countries or places for which special provision has been made. Such provision is made by concordats and in other ways. § 2 distinguishes between the higher and the lower clergy. The higher clergy are the cardinals, legates of the Apostolic See, bishops, praelati nullius, the superiors general of papal orders, and the higher officials of the Roman Curia. Who these officials are is not apparent either from this canon or the organization of the Roman Court, but the Prefect, the Secretary and the Subsecretary are doubtless included. The term legates most probably includes Apostolic delegates.[19]

After the enumeration of the higher officials of the Roman Court follows a comma, and then, "on account of affairs pertaining to their office." The question may arise whether this addition refers to all the persons (cardinals, legates, bishops, prelates nullius, superiors general, higher officials of the Roman Court) or to the last-named only. In the latter case the higher officials of the Roman Curia might be cited before a civil court for matters not pertaining to their office, whilst the other persons named could not be summoned at all. Can. 2341 refers the clause, "on account of affairs, etc.," without a comma, only to the higher officials of the Roman Court, and we believe there was a special reason to mention these matters in connection with the Roman officials, on account not only of the importance of the matter, but also because they belong to the papal authority, and, we might say, household. On the other hand, the privilegium fori must be vindicated to these officials to the full extent, according to § 1.

19 Cfr. can. 267. § 2.— The maiores religionum iuris pontificii superiores are Abbot Primate, abbots president, abbots, generals, and provincials of communities or congregations approved by the Holy See. Cfr. c. 488.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The next clause of § 2 treats of clerics of inferior rank, such as vicars-general, honorary prelates, pastors and their assistants, and religious. All these must first obtain permission of the Ordinary before they may licitly appear before a civil court. Here no mention is made of matter pertaining to their office. Note that religious, though exempt, must have leave from the Ordinary of the diocese, not only the permission of their own superior, who cannot, however, withhold it if the Ordinary has given his. Ordinaries are in the last clause of the same § 2 exhorted to be liberal unless they have special and weighty reasons for refusing permission.

§ 3 of canon 120 provides for cases where clerics are summoned without the necessary permission, and establishes that only in cases of necessity and when greater evils might follow if the clergy would not appear, the higher as well as inferior clergy are allowed to obey the summons of a civil court. However, from can. 2341 it is evident that the penalty of excommunication reserved to the Holy See modo speciali would be incurred if a cardinal, an Apostolic legate, a higher official of the Roman Court, or the Ordinary of the diocese would be summoned by civil authorities without the necessary permission. The same penalty would be incurred if another than the diocesan bishop, though but titular, or a prelate nullius, or a religious superior general of a papal institute would be summoned. If any of the lower ranks of the clergy would be called to court, the penalty for a cleric would be suspension, and for a layman some penalty to be determined by the Ordinary.

Now two questions of importance must be answered:

(a) Do the privilegium fori and its concomitant penalty also apply in the case where one is called as a witness only? The text ibique adesse as well as the interpretation given by Cardinal Gennari answer affirmatively.[20] We also know that this was the stand taken by the Roman Curia in the Verdesi case.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) May a custom be admitted against the privilegium fori? This may also be affirmed, as appears from the answer of Cardinal Merry del Val to the ambassador of Prussia, Mühlberg, officially [21] printed in the Osservatore Romano of Dec. 16, 1911. Whether this custom may be upheld in the U. S. is difficult to say in view of the enactments of the Second Pl. Council of Baltimore, n. 156, and the Third, n. 84. The clause inserted by the latter: "as far as it may be defended among us," seems to admit the contrary custom. Besides, there is no doubt that English customs prevail in our country, and these would point to the existence of a contrary custom.[22] Lastly, our canon does not reprobate such a custom.

PERSONAL IMMUNITY

CAN. 121

Clerici omnes a servitio militari, a muneribus et publicis civilibus officiis a statu clericali alienis immunes sunt.

This canon comprises the whole range of personal immunity which the clergy have de iure et facto enjoyed for centuries. On just what ground, or law, or custom this freedom is based, the Code does not decide. Neither has any dogmatical definition ever been given in this regard. For the text in the Decretals [23] that churches and 20 Cfr. Monitore Eccles., 1912, p. 507.

21 The Osservatore is not the official organ of the Vatican, but in this case the latter employed it to give an official answer. Cfr. Archiv f. K.-R., 1915, 297 f.; Monitore Eccles., 1911, p. 507.

22 Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 47, 312 ff.

23 c. 4, 6°, III, 20, De Immunitate.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesiastical persons and things enjoy immunity by divine right, is merely an assumption not contained in the dispositive part of the law. The Council of Trent [24] appeals to the rulers to respect the privilege, but advances no definition. The Syllabus condemns the propositions that clerical immunity originated in a grant of the civil government, and that it could and should be abolished.[25] Hence no authentic or de fide definition has been issued by the Apostolic See concerning the immunity of the clergy. What we said concerning divine law in reference to the privilegium fori applies here also.

The clergy are free from military service. That priests at least should be exempt from carrying and using arms seems very becoming and just. For their state demands charity, meekness, and forbearance, which shrink from bloodshed. Besides their high calling requires that they hold themselves aloof from the strife and turmoil of warfare. In times of war especially are they the messengers of spiritual and even corporal mercy. The sacerdotal character resembles that of the Prince of peace, whose hands were not stained with blood, whose lips spoke nought but love, even for His enemies, whose heart embraced all. We will not speak of the dangers accruing to the priestly life from the atmosphere of garrisons and trenches. If any one should trump up democracy — a term much abused but seldom rightly understood — as demanding equality of all citizens, we answer that the Athenians and the Romans were as good democrats as we moderns, and yet accorded a privileged place to their priests. True democracy does not exclude respect for the things that pertain to God, who, being the author of nature, is also the author of the democratic

24 Sess. 25, c. 20, De Ref.

25 Syllabus, n. 30, n. 32; Heiner, Der Syllabus, 1905, p. 167.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

form of government as well as of the monarchical. We have dwelt upon this point because it seemed necessary in view of present tendencies. For the day will come — and we hail it — that compulsory military service will be introduced into our republic. Why not take our little sister republic of Switzerland for a model? There, no one physically fit is exempt from military service. After having passed the medical examination and being found capable, the young man, at the age of twenty, must serve for ten weeks as a recruit of infantry, or for twelve weeks in some of the other units. After that, two or three weeks every year, when the manœuvres take place, must be spent in the military service, only those of the clergy being exempt who have received at least subdeaconship or definitively entered the religious state. Those who are exempt from service must pay the military tax. Of course military chaplains with the rank of captain are also drafted. We cannot see any damage either to the clerical state or to the country in such conditions. The little Swiss Republic, surrounded as it is by four great powers, has proved itself a noble country, ready and able to fight for liberty and democracy without deeming it necessary to disturb the ministers of religion in the possession of their time-honored immunity.[26]

Obligations or munera (sordida) are such kinds of labor as are commonly called base because performed only by physical labor, and were always looked upon as unbecoming to cultured persons; or, as Blackstone says,[27] such as are fit only for peasants or persons of servile rank. These were called services of villeinsocage. Hither belonged the pedagium (angaria), or [26] Concerning the custom of the Middle Ages in England, see Translations and Reprints, published by the University of Penn., Vol. IV, n. 3, p. 28 ff.

[27] Commentary, II, 60 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

road-repairing, the podagium, or upkeep of bridges, the ius metatus, or quartering of soldiers, etc. Such services were not demanded from the clergy.[28] But now that they are commuted into poll-taxes, it would be difficult to exempt the clergy from paying these taxes. Other taxes, on personal property especially, the clergy have to pay like the rest.

Public offices of a civil character are, e. g., the postmastership, the mayoralty, the offices of bailiff, constable, alderman, trustee, guardian, etc. The last-named two offices a cleric may assume for relations, orphans, and the poor.[29]

BENEFICIUM COMPETENTIAE

CAN. 122

Clericis qui creditoribus satisfacere coguntur, salva sint quae ad honestam sui sustentationem, prudenti ecclesiastici iudicis arbitrio, sunt necessaria, firma tamen eorundem obligatione creditoribus quamprimum satisfaciendi.

This is what is known as the privilege or benefit of the clergy in case of insolvency. Its origin is not only obscure, but also mystic, on account of the popular comparison of the clerical state with the military profession (militia coelestis — militia terrena). With this comparison in mind the commentators on the famous chapter "Odoardus" (c. 3, X, III, 23) applied to the clergy the 28 Cfr. c. 4, X, III, 49, De Imm. It is to be noted, however, that c. 7 enjoins the clergy to assist the commonwealth if the layman's help alone does not suffice. The "Great Charter" of England (1215), n. 22, reads: "A clergyman shall be fined only in proportion to his lay holdings, and not according to the extent of his ecclesiastical benefice." v. Translations and Reprints, Vol. I, n. 6, p. 10.

29 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, X, I, 37; c. 2, X, III, 50; Aichner, l. c., § 73, 1; for England see Blackstone-Cooley, I, 376.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

privileges of the imperial soldiers whose salary could not be entirely garnisheed by creditors.[80] The chapter alleged really mentions only the dictum of Pope Gregory IX, that a clergyman declaring himself insolvent should not, on that account, be excommunicated, but should give security that in case of his obtaining a better income, he would pay his debts. This is the sole basis for the simile of the "spiritual warfare or militia Christi." Nevertheless the canonists [81] clung to the interpretation and now it has been perpetuated in the new Code. Now-a-days this matter is settled by civil laws, which are no longer as rigid as were those of the Middle Ages. The meaning of the canon therefore is that a sufficient support should be left to an indebted clergyman and, especially, that his freedom should not be curtailed. But the obligation of paying his debts — the security of the Decretals — certainly remains.

LOSS OF THE CLERICAL PRIVILEGES

CAN. 123

Memoratis privilegiis clericus renuntiare nequit; sed eadem amittit, si ad statum laicalem reducatur aut privatione perpetua iuris deferendi habitum ecclesiasticum plectatur, ad normam can. 213, § 1, 2304; recuperat vero, si haec poena remittatur aut ipse rursus inter clericos admittatur.

The privileges enumerated, though cleaving to the 80 Cfr. l. 33, Cod. Just., I, 3; Nov., 123, c. 10; l. 173, Dig., 50, 17; Zipperling, Das Wesen des beneficium competentiae, 1907, p. 94 ff.

81 Cfr. Engel, III, 23, n. 1; Fagnani, ad c. cit., where he mentions the penalty imposed on a deeply indebted clergyman who was set upon a donkey and had to wear a green biretta.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clergyman, and in so far personal, belong to the clerical state, i. e., to the clergy as a class, not to the individual in the first place, and therefore they cannot be waived by private agreement, even though this be confirmed by an oath.[32] They are lost, however, by degradation, whereby a cleric is reduced to the lay state.[33] The right of wearing the clerical garb is forfeited by deposition, followed by stubborn refusal to do penance,[34] and, furthermore, by reduction to the lay state (can. 211 ff.).

Clerics in minor orders lose their privileges ipso iure according to can. 132, § 2, can. 136, § 3, can. 141, § 2, because by acts done against these canons they reduce themselves to the lay state.

32 Cfr. c. 12, X, II, 2.
33 Can. 2305; cfr. c. 14, X, V, 39, De sent. excom.
34 Can. 2304.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE III

OBLIGATIONS OF CLERICS

RELIGIOUS DUTIES

CAN. 124

Clerici debent sanctiorem prae laicis vitam interiorem et exteriorem ducere eisque virtute et recte factis in exemplum excellere.

CAN. 125

Curent locorum Ordinarii:

1.° Ut clerici omnes poenitentiae sacramento frequenter conscientiae maculas eluant;

2.° Ut iidem quotidie orationi mentali per aliquod tempus incumbant, sanctissimum Sacramentum visitent, Deiparam Virginem mariano rosario colant, conscientiam suam discutiant.

CAN. 126

Omnes sacerdotes saeculares debent tertio saltem quoque anno spiritualibus exercitiis, per tempus a proprio Ordinario determinandum, in pia aliqua religiosave domo ab eodem designata vacare; neque ab eis quisquam eximatur, nisi in casu particulari, iusta de causa ac de expressa eiusdem Ordinarii licentia.

These three canons refer to the religious life of the clergy, who in virtue of their divine calling and the sacred ministry which they exercise, are obliged to gov-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ern their conduct in accordance with these laws. The retreat master as well as the spiritual director will find ample material in the ancient sources of Canon Law [1] for fit subjects to speak on. This is not the place to enlarge upon that subject. We would merely draw attention to the fact that a retreat should not form the occasion for belittling the science and application of Canon Law or for concentrating the entire attention on the authority of the bishop. Suum cuique!

CLERICAL OBEDIENCE

CAN. 127

Omnes clerici, praesertim vero presbyteri, speciali obligatione tenentur suo quisque Ordinario reverentiam et obedientiam exhibendi.

CAN. 128

Quoties et quamdiu id, iudicio proprii Ordinarii, exigat Ecclesiae necessitas, ac nisi legitimum impedimentum excuset, suscipiendum est clericis ac fideliter implendum munus quod ipsis fuerit ab Episcopo commissum.

The Code mentions first the special obligation of paying reverence as well as obedience to the Ordinary. Reverence is due to a superior from his inferiors,[2] and consists in external marks of respect, e. g., rising in his

1 Cfr. Dist., 23–50; c. 5, C. 6, q. 1; X, III, 1; 6°, III, 1; Clem., III, 1; Trid., Sess. 22, c. 1; Sess. 23, c. 11, 13; Sess. 25, c. 1, De Ref.; Gasparri, Codex Juris Can., p. 29, enumerates 28 Apostolic Constitutions and Letters to that effect.

2 Cf. c. 3, 6, Dist. 23; c. 24, C. 7, q. 1; c. 18, C. 11, q. 11; c. 10, C. 18, q. 2; cc. 2, 7, 9, X, I, 33. See Bened. XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 6 (Bull., Prati, Vol. I, p. 137 f.), especially concerning the duty of priests to teach the catechism.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

presence and giving him the first place.[3] Other signs, e. g., kissing the Bishop's ring or hand, are more or less conventional, and depend upon local custom. Reverence, therefore, is outwardly manifested by giving precedence to the superior and showing him such signs of respect as are customary.

The obedience here inculcated is called canonical, because based upon the rules laid down by the Church. At his ordination a cleric simply promises to obey the Ordinary and his successors. The object and extent of this obedience is determined, on the one hand, by the clerical state and office, and, on the other, by the extent of the episcopal jurisdiction. The bishop is entitled to enjoin or enforce the common law which governs the clerical state and office in general. The obedience of the clergy, therefore, extends to whatever concerns their state as such, and in this matter no exemption can be claimed. The office of a cleric is partly general and partly particular. It is general in so far as it is given by virtue of the different orders — subdeaconship, deaconship, priesthood.[4] Therefore, whatever belongs to his respective office, a cleric is not at liberty to refuse to perform.

But there is another office attached to the clerical state (can. 145), which involves the exercise of ecclesiastical power in a certain station or measure. The latter is mentioned in can. 129. Canonical obedience obliges a cleric to take upon himself an office duly assigned by his Ordinary, and to discharge that office faithfully, be it that of parish priest, assistant, chaplain, teacher, etc. He is

[3] Cfr. Smith, Elements, I, p. 217.

[4] However, this binds only in general, not for a particular church. Thus, e. g., a parish priest, who is not canon of a cathedral, cannot be compelled to act as deacon or subdeacon in the cathedral church. S. C. C. Nov. 26, 1701; Aug. 19, 1702, "Auximana" (Richter, Trid., 208, n. 8). Lehmkuhl in the Linzer Quartalschrift, 1900 (Vol. 53), p. 86 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bound to do this by virtue of his ordination for and incardination in the diocese, and because the clerical state is one of labor, not leisure. Though the promise of obedience is not an oath which would constitute clerics vassals of the bishop, it partakes of the nature of religion, which links the clergyman to the legitimate power of the diocese.

From this obligation a cleric is free in two cases only: (1) if the Church does not need him, or (2) if he has a legitimate excuse.

(1) In our country, and after the great war in most other countries, there is not likely to be an oversupply of priests.

If the bishop insists upon a priest serving in his diocese, he must provide that priest with an adequate living.[5] A clergyman not provided with any ecclesiastical benefice or office in the diocese cannot be compelled to take part in processions, unless there is a legitimate custom to the contrary.[6]

(2) A legitimate excuse exempting a cleric from accepting an office would be a physical impediment, for instance, poor health; or a bodily defect which might prove a serious obstacle to his exercise of the office; or a moral obstacle, such as scrupulosity; or enmity on the part of the people; or lack of practical knowledge or prudence.[7] Where no such excuse exists, a cleric is bound to obey his bishop when the latter assigns him to a charge. He must also heed the bishop's injunctions and precepts, even in matters which are only indirectly connected with the clerical state and office. In the Constitution of Leo

5 S. C. C. Jan. 26, 1833, "Reatina" (Richter, Trid., p. 208, n. 6).

6 Richter, ib., n. 9; Bened. XIV, Inst., 31, n. 1 f.

7 Cfr. S. C. Cons., "Maxima curæ," Aug. 20, 1910.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

XIII, "Officiorum ac munerum," 1897, the clergy are admonished to submit to the Ordinary any books they may write, even on subjects of natural science and art, "in order to show an example of prompt obedience," and are forbidden to assume the editorship of newspapers and magazines without the Ordinary's permission.[8] The bishop, therefore, is entitled to demand from his clergy obedience in all licit things that pertain to his episcopal jurisdiction, in so far as required by the clerical state and office.

SCIENTIFIC EQUIPMENT OF THE CLERGY

CAN. 129

Clerici studia, praesertim sacra, recepto sacerdotio, ne intermittant; et in sacris disciplinis solidam illam doctrinam a maioribus traditam et communiter ab Ecclesia receptam sectentur, devitantes profanas vocum novitates et falsi nominis scientiam.

CAN. 130

§ 1. Expleto studiorum curriculo, sacerdotes omnes, etsi beneficium paroeciale aut canonicale consecuti, nisi ab Ordinario loci ob iustam causam fuerint exempti, examen singulis annis saltem per integrum triennium in diversis sacrarum scientiarum disciplinis, antea opportune designatis, subeant secundum modum ab eodem Ordinario determinandum.

§ 2. In collatione officiorum et beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum ratio habeatur eorum qui, ceteris paribus, in memoratis periculis magis praestiterunt.

CAN. 131

§ 1. In civitate episcopali et in singulis vicariatibus

[8] Const. cit., n. 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

foraneis saepius in anno, diebus arbitrio Ordinarii loci praestituendis, conventus habeantur, quos collationes seu conferentias vocant, de re morali et liturgica; quibus addi possunt aliae exercitationes, quas Ordinarius opportunas iudicaverit ad scientiam et pietatem clericorum promovendam.

§ 2. Si conventus haberi difficile sit, resolutae quaestiones scriptae mittantur, secundum normas ab Ordinario statuendas.

§ 3. Conventui interesse, aut, deficiente conventu, scriptam casuum solutionem mittere debent, nisi a loci Ordinario exemptionem antea expresse obtinuerint, tum omnes sacerdotes saeculares, tum religiosi licet exempti curam animarum habentes et etiam, si collatio in eorum domibus non habeatur, alii religiosi qui facultatem audiendi confessiones ab Ordinario obtinuerunt.

The Code, in insisting on knowledge or science in clerics, simply follows tradition and repeats old canons.[9] St. Paul's[10] warning to Timothy is as timely now as it was then, because faith is not gnosis, and the Church is the keeper of the depositum fidei. That stress is laid upon the sacred disciplines or studies, is as natural as to require of a physician that he study medicine and its allied sciences.

The examination prescribed in Can. 130 may be arranged in such a way that dogmatic and moral theology, canon law and Holy Scripture, liturgy and history may all be surveyed during the three years' course. That a thorough repetition of these sciences is difficult for many 9 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 38; c. 2, Dist. 49; c. 2, Dist. 36; c. 15, X, III, 1; Pius II, Const. of April 4, 1460; Leo XIII, "Plane quidem," May 20, 1885 (Desclée, 1887, II, 136 ff.).

10 I Tim. 6, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

priests employed in parish work or teaching is evident, and hence exemptions are provided for according to the prudent judgment of the bishop.

Clerical conferences are to be held (the number is stated only approximately) saepius in anno, i. e., about two or three times a year.[11] The matter for these conferences is to be taken chiefly, though not exclusively, from moral theology and liturgy. These two branches are of special importance, in as far as uniformity in the confessional and in the administration of the sacraments fosters unity of morals and discipline and palpably demonstrates that unity to the people. If conferences cannot be held for any solid, not imaginary, reason, the Code assigns a substitute, namely, the written solution of questions proposed. The matter for these questions is to be taken from the same branches and they are to be answered as often as conferences would be held. The solutions are to be sent to the Ordinary or his chancellor, and to be examined by the bishop himself or a delegate, perhaps one of the usual examiners, or any competent judge. After the examination the correct answers should be sent to the priests, while the original copy of the answers submitted may be kept in the archives.

The last paragraph mentions those who are obliged to attend the conferences or to send in solutions. Leo XIII, in his Constitution "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881, had laid down the general law concerning regulars actually employed in the care of souls, whilst the S. C. EE. et RR. had repeatedly enjoined all regulars who had received the faculty of hearing confessions to hold theological conferences in their own houses.[12] Hence the Code establishes nothing new, except in prescribing writ-

11 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Dist. 362, l. c., p. 786.

12 Cf. Bachofen, Compendium Juris Regularium, 1903, p. 262.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ten solutions. However, these must be sent in by regulars only in case no conferences are held in their monasteries. All religious, whether exempt or not, if they are actually in charge of souls, even though they be prelates, are obliged to attend these conferences, unless regular conferences are held in their convents. Hence religious who are pastors must attend in any case, other religious only in case no pastoral conferences are held in their respective communities. All this goes to show how important these conferences are considered by the legislator, and that they should not be set aside by bishops or religious.

Of course, in order to obtain the expected results, the conferences should be conducted on the basis of authority and in a manner which interests those who are bound to take part in them.

CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY

CAN. 132

§ 1. Clerici in maioribus ordinibus constituti a nuptiis arcentur et servandae castitatis obligatione ista tenentur, ut contra eandem peccantes sacrilegii quoque rei sint, salvo praescripto can. 214, § 1.

§ 2. Clerici minores possunt quidem nuptias inire, sed, nisi matrimonium fuerit nullum vi aut metu eisdem incusso, ipso iure e statu clericali decidunt.

§ 3. Coniugatus qui sine dispensatione apostolica ordines maiores, licet bona fide, suscepit, ab eorundem ordinum exercitio prohibetur.

CAN. 133

§ 1. Caveant clerici ne mulieres, de quibus suspicio

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

esse possit, apud se retineant, aut quoquo modo frequentent.

§ 2. Eisdem licet cum illis tantum mulieribus cohabitare in quibus naturale foedus nihil mali permittit suspicari, quales sunt mater, soror, amita et huiusmodi, aut a quibus spectata morum honestas, cum provectiore aetate coniuncta, omnem suspicionem amoveat.

§ 3. Iudicium an retinere vel frequentare mulieres, etiam illas in quas communiter suspicio non cadit, in peculiari aliquo casu scandalo esse possit aut incontinentiae afferre periculum, ad Ordinarium loci pertinet, cuius est clericos ab hac retentione vel frequentatione prohibere.

§ 4. Contumaces praesumuntur concubinarii.

Can. 134

Consuetudo vitae communis inter clericos laudanda et suadenda est, eaque, ubi viget, quantum fieri potest, servanda.

The last canon, though apparently but loosely connected with the subject of celibacy, has much to do with it, according to the saying of the Preacher: "Woe to him that is alone" (Ecc. 4, 10); and there is a reason why the Code has added it to the canons enforcing the law of celibacy. The Church certainly had strong reasons for establishing the law of continency for the clergy and of celibacy for those in major orders. The sublimity of the sacred ministry and its constant, almost unrelenting occupations, which admit of no family cares and troubles, originally inspired her to enact this law, which was, besides, a strong safeguard against the danger of hereditary succession to office and set up a splendid example for the laity.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:56 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Occidental Church has set a more emphatic example in this matter than the Oriental Church. Already in the fourth century, Pope Siricius (384–398) obliged priests and levites to sobriety and chastity,[13] and Leo I (440–461) extended the prohibition of marriage to the subdeacons.[14] At the time of the struggle between Church and State celibacy was attacked, but successfully defended by the popes. The Second Lateran Council established the nullity of matrimony for the higher clergy, and the Council of Trent confirmed its canons.[15]

The Oriental Church was neither uniform nor consistent in the application of celibacy. Whilst its ancient custom tallied with that of the Western Church, the enactments of the Trullan Synod (692) admitted a laxer practice, which finally prevailed.[16] Even to-day the subdeacons of the Oriental rites are allowed to marry before they receive that order and to cohabit with their wives. However, if we may believe a modern exponent of the Oriental law, a marriage contracted by a cleric after receiving subdeaconship would be invalid,[17] though as far as we are aware, the Catholic Church has never pronounced a sentence on these marriages.[18] However, priests of the Oriental rites who wish to be employed as such in the U. S. must conform to the Latin custom.[19]

(1) In the Occidental Church, therefore, every attempted marriage by a cleric who has validly received subdeaconship or any higher order, unless he be constrained by violence or fear, is null and void, not by rea-

13 Cfr. Ep. ad Himerium, n. 10 (Coustant, l. c., p. 630).

14 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 32.

15 Cfr. c. 40, C. 27, q. 1; c. 13, X, III, 1; c. 4, X, III, 3; c. 7, X, I, 21; c. un. 6°, III, 15; Conc. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 9, De Ref.

16 Cfr. Milasch-Pessič. Kirchenrecht der Abendländ. Kirche, 1905, p. 267, p. 598.

17 Milasch-Pessič, l. c.

18 Cf. Bened. XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742; "Eo quamvis," May 4, 1745 (Bull., Mechl., t. I, 361 ff; III, 145 ff.).

19 S. C. P. F. May 10, 1892; May

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

son of a supposed vow, but in virtue of positive ecclesiastical law.[20] In virtue of the obligation of perfect chastity, every morally imputable act, whether internal or external, directed against that obligation, involves a profanation of a sacred person and is, therefore, sacrilegious.

(2) Every valid marriage contracted by one in minor orders reduces the latter ipso iure to the lay state, thereby depriving him of all clerical rights and privileges and absolving him from clerical duties.[21] The Code says, "unless the marriage is null and void by reason of violence or fear." This, however, must not be presumed, but proved. Hence, though one affected by that impediment may be thoroughly persuaded of the invalidity of a marriage thus contracted, he could not continue to conduct himself as a cleric, but would have to await the final sentence of the ecclesiastical court.

(3) A married man, in order to receive higher orders licitly, now needs an Apostolic dispensation. If no dispensation was obtained, such a one, if ordained, is ipso iure debarred from the exercise of the order received. Here the Code is somewhat stricter than the old law, which permitted a married man to receive higher orders if his wife consented and the bishop sanctioned the vow of chastity to be pronounced by the wife.[22] Although the married state is not, properly speaking, an irregularity, it is an impediment to holy orders,[23] dispensation from which is reserved to the Apostolic See, and therefore the

1, 1897 (Am. Eccl. Rev., 7, 66; 18, 67).

20 S. Th., II–II, q. 88, a. 11; Heiner, K.-R., I, 233; cfr. can. 214, § 1.

21 Cc. 1–3, X, III, 3.

22 Cf. c. 5, X, III, 32; c. 6, h. t. III, 32 required profession in a religious order if the husband was made a bishop; this requisite was extended to all wives whose age might cause misgiving, and only after the age of fifty the suspicion seemed removed.

23 Can. 987, 2°.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

married and ordained man remains suspended until the Holy See has provided; otherwise he would become irregular ex capite delicti.[24]

The next canon logically determines the cohabitation of clergymen with women. St. Paul mentions the fact that the Apostles kept a woman, a "sister," about them.[25] These women were probably virgins who led a life of celibacy and administered unto the temporal needs of the clergy. They were called "virgines subintroductae" and are mentioned in the epistle of the bishops against Paul of Samosata as women of suspicious character. Therefore it is not surprising that the Council of Nicaea (325) thought it necessary to regulate the relation of clerics to their female relatives. Besides those mentioned in § 2: mother, sister, aunt [26] (on either side), the Nicene canon also admits other women of good character. This was extended to the second degree of consanguinity and affinity, not by any written law, but by the canonists and doctors.[27] Our Code admits any woman whose moral character and age ward off suspicion. Concerning age the law does not determine a limit. For what is generally known as the "canonical age," no canon can be quoted. However, since twenty-four is called aetas superadulta, this might be taken as indicating the canonical age. Concerning female relatives no age is stated.

The next paragraph reserves the judgment concerning permission to retain or visit women entirely to the bishop, who, although he cannot forbid clergymen to have women housekeepers,[28] has a right to know who these

24 Can. 985, 7°.

25 Cf. I Cor. 9, 5; X, III, 2, De cohab. cleric. et mul.

26 Euseb., Hist. Eccl., VII, 30; c. 3, c. 16, Dist. 32.

27 Bened. XIV, Inst., 83, n. 6 f.

28 Cf. v. Scherer I, 372; Wernz, II, p. 298 (1. ed.); the Code allows priests to have a female housekeeper, but does not determine the canonical age.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

women are and what is their reputation. Clerics must obey the Ordinary if he should forbid them to keep or visit a certain person. One who stubbornly refuses to obey his bishop is presumed to be a concubinarian. Strictly speaking, one is contumax only if he refuses to appear before the judge who summons him. Therefore one must be properly summoned and have received the summons before he can be declared contumacious. And even if he should be declared contumax, the presumption is a simple one, not iuris et de iure.[29] But this belongs to legal procedure.

The last of the three canons recommends community life to priests, doubtless as a preservative of clerical continency. What has been said concerning the chapter on canons may suffice to prove the intention of the Church. Be it also mentioned that pastors and assistants should live in the same house.[30]

DIVINE OFFICE (BREVIARY)

CAN. 13

Clerici, in maioribus ordinibus constituti, exceptis iis de quibus in can. 213, 214, tenentur obligatione quotidie horas canonicas integre recitandi secundum proprios et probatos liturgicos libros.

The clergy are the mediators between God and men, and the office of mediator involves the duty of praying according to the example of the Apostles.[31] Prayers in common were cultivated especially by the monastic institutes, but also in churches by the clergy assigned to them. Justinian expressly inculcated that duty in his Code.[32]

29 Cf. cc. 1842 ff; 1825 ff; 2176 ff.
30 Cf. c. 476, § 5.
31 Cf. Acts 2, 15; 3, 1; 10, 9.
32 L. 42, § 10, Cod. I, 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The chapters of canons established in the eighth century practised public prayers, mostly according to the Rule of St. Benedict, in their churches. The Decretals urge the same duty upon the priests of cathedral, collegiate, and regular churches.[33] These texts prove the obligation of choir service, but are silent about the recital of prayers. The Council of Basle (1431–49) enacted that duty, but it did not establish a universal law.[34] Benedict XIV deduces the obligation of the private recitation of the divine office, incumbent upon all clergymen in higher orders, from "ancient tradition and immemorial custom," rather than from any written text, and adds that the Oriental Church has no law to that effect.[35]

The name Breviary occurs since the time of Gregory VII (1073–1085). The Roman Breviary contains the rules according to which it must be recited. It must be used by all clerics except those who have a special privilege for using a different book or a practice of at least 200 years previous to Pius V's Constitution "Quod a nobis" (July 9, 1568). Pius X by his Const. "Divino afflatu" (Nov. 1, 1911) rearranged the Psalter according to the early and traditional idea of its weekly recitation.

The obligation of reciting the Breviary privately has now become a universal written law, binding every cleric from subdeacons onward, except those who have been reduced to the lay state or are freed on account of having been ordained by force. A dispensation may be granted by the Holy See, and for a time and in particular cases also by the Ordinary.

33 Cf. cc. 1, 9, X, III, 41; c. 1, Clem. III, 14.

34 Sess. 21, c. 5; cfr. v. Scherer I, 386; Wernz, II, 273 (1. ed.); Cath. Encycl., s. v. "Breviary"; Bäumer, Geschichte des Breviers, 1895.

35 "Eo quamvis," May 4, 1745, (Bull., Mechl., 1826, III, 147, §43).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CLERICAL DRESS

CAN. 136

§ 1. Omnes clerici decentem habitum ecclesiasticum, secundum legitimas locorum consuetudines et Ordinarii loci praescripta, deferant, tonsuram seu coronam clericalem, nisi recepti populorum mores aliter ferant, gestent, et capillorum simplicem cultum adhibeant.

§ 2. Annulo ne utantur, nisi id ipsis a iure aut apostolico privilegio sit concessum.

§ 3. Clerici minores qui propria auctoritate sine legitima causa habitum ecclesiasticum et tonsuram dimiserint, nec, ab Ordinario moniti, sese intra mensem emendaverint, ipso iure e statu clericali decidunt.

A distinct clerical garb, used by the clergy outside of the sanctuary, was introduced about the sixth century. It originally consisted of the old Roman dress: a tunic and a long white undergarment with or without sleeves. In course of time many councils and synods passed enactments on the subject, the last being the Tridentine Council, which decreed that the clergy should wear a dress proper to their state, in order to show by the decency of their outward habit the probity of their interior conduct.[86] Sixtus V styled that dress vestis talaris or cassock.[87] The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore enacted into positive law what may be called the legitimate custom of this country, the wearing in public or on the street of a coat of black or sombre color, reaching to the knees, with a Roman collar. Religious, too, are expected to conform to this custom.[88] The tonsure is not prescribed 86 Cfr. c. 15, X, III, 1; c. 2, Clem. III, 1; Conc. Trid., Sess. 14, c. 6, De Ref.

87 "Cum sacrosanctam," Jan. 9, 1589, § 2; cfr. Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 26.

88 Acta et Decreta, n. 77.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in our country. Concerning the hair, the old canons, in warning against unbecoming vanity, used the phrase "comam ne [clerici] nutriant." [39] The new Code is silent as to beards and wigs, and hence this matter is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary or to a council.[40]

Rings, either with or without gems, are permitted only to those whom the law or an Apostolic privilege has endowed with the right of wearing them. Hence only cardinals, bishops, and blessed abbots are allowed to wear them at Holy Mass,[41] while prothonotaries non participantes, doctors, and abbates non benedicti are not allowed to wear them at Mass.[42]

The last paragraph deals with those in minor orders who doff the clerical dress and tonsure and refuse to obey the injunction of the bishop to reassume them within a month. This is a modified repetition of the decretal of Pius IX, published A. D. 1860.

OCCUPATIONS AND AMUSEMENTS FORBIDDEN TO THE CLERGY

CAN. 137

A fideiubendo, etiam de bonis propriis, clericus prohibetur, inconsulto loci Ordinario.

The ancient civil law as well as the Decretals forbade the clergy to give bail,[43] but made some exceptions in favor of fellow-clerics and their own churches, as well as 39 Cfr. c. 22, Dist. 23; c. 7, X, III, 1.

40 Formerly the wearing of a wig required an Apostolic indult; cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 184, n. 12; Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 9.

41 Cf. c. 811, §2.

42 S. R. C. Feb. 13, 1625 (Barbosa, Apost. Dec., p. 26); Pius X, "Inter multiplices," Feb. 27, 1905, n. 4, 27, 28, 31, 47–49.

43 Nov. 123, c. 6; c. 1, X, III, 22; Engel, III, 22, n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for their own property and person. The Code doubtless must be given a stricter interpretation because of the general terms in which it forbids the practice. Hence every kind of bail, "whereby a man obliges himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to pay a certain sum of money to another on an appointed day," [44] is forbidden except with the permission of the bishop. This condition must also be observed if a clergyman would give bail on his personal, patrimonial or parsimonial property. This ruling may seem harsh, but cases brought before the Roman Curia prompted a severer course in order to protect the clerical state from slanders and insinuations which are never so rife as when a clergyman makes mistakes in money matters. This and the following canons are all inspired by the twofold purpose of safeguarding the decorum of the clerical state and preserving its members from troublesome distraction which might impede their fruitful activity in the sacred ministry. Hence:

CAN. 138

Clerici ab iis omnibus quae statum suum dedecent, prorsus abstineant; indecoras artes ne exerceant; aleatoriis ludis, pecunia exposita, ne vacent; arma ne gestent, nisi quando iusta timendi causa subsit; venationi ne indulgeant, clamorosam autem nunquam exerceant; tabernas aliaque similia loca sine necessitate aut alia iusta causa ab Ordinario loci probata ne ingrediantur.

The principle previously stated is here announced in set terms, whereupon five occupations are specified which are more or less unbecoming to the clerical state. These [44] Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, 340.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google occupations comprise all professions or arts which, in the common estimation of the people, are exercised only by a low class of men or involve a degradation of the clerical state. Such are especially the profession of actors and the trade of saloon or innkeepers, butchers and executioners.[45] Games of hazard, if connected with staking of money, are prohibited. But moderate card playing, chess, billiard or tenpins is not forbidden if no scandal — of course pharisaical scandal cannot always be avoided — is given and no excess in time or money involved.[46]

The carrying of arms, fire arms as well as others, is forbidden also in the Decretals.[47] But we remember that, about ten years ago, when there was a morbid agitation against the clergy in Italy, and especially in Rome, many priests received license from the Pretor to carry a revolver. This was purely a means of self-defence; hence the very reasonable clause in the new Code.

Hunting and the chase are distinguished; the former is not entirely forbidden, but should not be indulged in. Indulgere implies frequent repetition. Hence, occasional hunting without dogs, or only one dog, and without a great apparatus, may be permitted if no dangerous consequences are to be feared. But the chase, i. e., clamorous hunting with dogs, hawks, and falcons for the pursuit of large game, bears, deer, foxes, etc., is forbidden.[48]

Saloons and similar places must be avoided by clerics.[49] On that point we believe that in our country the necessary precautions are not wanting. Neither are the saloons, at least many of them, in the U. S., places where 45 Cfr. cc. 1–3, Dist. 34; c. 1, Dist. 35; c. 1, X, III, 50; c. 1, Clem. III, 1.

46 C. 1, X, III, 50; Conc. Balt. II, n. 754.

47 C. 2, X, III, 1.

48 Cfr. X, V, 24, De clerico venatore.

49 Cfr. c. 2, Dist. 44; c. 15, X, III, 1; Conc. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 12, De Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clergymen should be found for purposes of amusement. The bishop might proceed against a clergyman who would not heed the prohibition of frequenting saloons after a paternal and peremptory admonition.[50] But on the other hand it is not commendable to decree suspensio ipso facto incurrenda for transgressors of this rule, because that penalty should be meted out only in grievous cases, lest it lose its effectiveness. A canon of the IVth Lateran Council forbids drinking bouts and drinking at command,[51] a practice which resembles our so-called "treating,"—a fertile source of drunkenness.

Can. 139

§ 1. Ea etiam quae, licet non indecora, a clericali tamen statu aliena sunt, vitent.

§ 2. Sine apostolico indultu medicinam vel chirurgiam ne exerceant; tabelliones seu publicos notarios, nisi in Curia ecclesiastica, ne agant; officia publica, quae exercitium laicalis iurisdictionis vel administrationis secumferunt, ne assumant.

§ 3. Sine licentia sui Ordinarii ne ineant gestiones bonorum ad laicos pertinentium aut officia saecularia quae secumferunt onus reddendarum rationum; procuratoris aut advocati munus ne exerceant, nisi in tribunali ecclesiastico, aut in civili quando agitur de causa propria aut suae ecclesiae; in laicali iudicio criminali, gravem personalem poenam prosequente, nullam partem habeant, ne testimonium quidem sine necessitate ferentes.

§ 4. Senatorum aut oratorum legibus ferendis, quos

50 Aichner, l. c., § 72, 2.

51 C. 14, X, III, 1 to which Vallensis (Paratitla, III, 1, n. 7) remarks that some aequales haustus might be permitted in honor of prince or country, if drunkenness is avoided.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

deputatos vocant, munus ne sollicitent neve acceptent sine licentia Sanctae Sedis in locis ubi pontificia prohibitio intercesserit; idem ne attentent aliis in locis sine licentia tum sui Ordinarii, tum Ordinarii loci in quo electio facienda est.

The principle stated in the first paragraph is based on St. Paul's exhortation to Timothy: "No man, being a soldier to God, entangleth himself with secular business." [52] Secular business affairs are apt to distract a priest from the one necessary occupation, the sacred ministry. Hence the prohibition of offices which, in themselves, are not incompatible with the dignity of the clerical state — who would venture to say, e. g., that a senatorship is degrading? — yet, because of their unwholesome effect upon the priestly office, should be accepted only in obedience to the Church.

The professions or occupations forbidden to clerics in can. 139 as "foreign to the clerical state" may be divided into two classes: such as require an Apostolic indult and such as merely demand the consent of the Ordinary.

An Apostolic indult is required for the practice of medicine, and the Code makes no distinction between medicine and surgery as to the strict necessity of obtaining the papal permission. Hence no matter whether a cleric wishes to practice simple medicine or surgery (formerly called medicine "cum adustione et incisione" [53]) he needs an Apostolic indult. There can be no doubt that the so-called Kneipp doctors and other "naturopaths" fall under this prohibition, [54] because the law is aimed at the exercise of the medical profession as such and intended to safeguard the honor of real physi-

52 II Tim. 2, 4.

53 Cfr. c. 19, X, V, 12, on account of the danger of irregularity.

54 Cfr. Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. III, n. 82; Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, c. 10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cians against usurpers and bunglers. At the same time it must be observed that exercere implies a habitual exercise; hence giving a dose of quinine or other drug occasionally would not be exercising the medical profession.

The question may arise, Whom does the law require to ask for an Apostolic indult? The answer is: all who partake of the clerical state; hence also lay brothers and sisters, unless they merely act as assistants to physicians in giving medicine or at an operation. If they practice medicine of their own accord and on their own responsibility, they need an Apostolic indult.[55]

What about oblates of religious communities? These, though partaking in spiritual favors, are not religious, and hence no clerics in the proper sense, supposing, of course, that they have not received either tonsure or orders. Therefore they may exercise medicine or surgery without an indult.

Another profession which clerics may not adopt without Apostolic permission is that of notaries public. It was forbidden[56] to the clergy in higher orders by Innocent III, and this prohibition is now extended to all clerics, and consequently also to religious. The Code does not except those who act as notaries in favor of their own churches or monasteries if cases are taken to the civil court.[57] Only in ecclesiastical courts are clerics allowed to act as notaries public.

A third prohibition refers to public offices which involve civil jurisdiction or administration, e. g., those of judges and administrative functionaries, mayors, governors, etc.[58] This law includes senators and deputies in 55 Cfr. Bachofen, Compendium Juris Reg., p. 150 f.

56 C. 8, X, III, 50.

57 Engel (III, 50, n. 5) and other canonists admit an exception.

58 Cfr. c. 4, X, III, 50: "iustitiarius principis . . . iurisdictiones saeculares."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Italy, where Catholics are expressly forbidden by the Holy See to solicit or accept such offices.

All these occupations, then, in order to be licitly assumed by a cleric, require an Apostolic indult. The fact that the clause "sine apostolico indultu" is placed at the head of § 2 proves that the legislator wishes to include all the offices that follow.

§ 3 enumerates the offices for the exercise of which on the part of a cleric the permission of the Ordinary is required. Note that the text says "sui," not "loci Ordinarii." The Ordinary of exempt religious is their superior, not the bishop of the diocese.

(1) Clerics may not be managers of business affairs or of properties which belong to laymen or necessitate the rendering of an account to civil authorities. To this class of affairs belongs the guardianship of orphans and widows,[59] which a cleric cannot undertake without the permission of his bishop or superior. Forbidden to clerics on the same score are the offices of president, director, treasurer, secretary of banks, even though these be of a charitable or social type (rural or farmers' banks, etc.).[60]

(2) A cleric is not allowed, furthermore, to act as procurator or by proxy in another's name by special mandate, or as attorney, unless for himself or in defence of his church.[61] We may safely extend "propria causa" to his next relatives, who because of blood relationship may be considered as one person with him.[62]

(3) In criminal cases which imply either capital punishment or confinement in a penitentiary — which punishment generally entails infamy — a cleric is not allowed

59 Cfr. c. 2, X, III, 50.
60 S. C. Consist., Nov. 18, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 910).
61 C. 2, X, III, 50; S. C. C., Aug. 4, 1883, Nullius Cluniac.
62 Aichner, § 73.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to act as a witness, unless called by legitimate authority (the prosecuting attorney or judge), which would be a case of necessity. But even in such cases it is commendable to ask the Ordinary's permission if time permits.

(4) The last case which requires the permission of the Ordinary is the solicitation and acceptance of the offices of senators and deputies. There is not much danger in our country that clergymen will be elected to Congress; but if one wished to become a candidate, he would need the permission of his own Ordinary as well as that of the Ordinary of the district — if this were located in a different diocese — for which he sought to be elected.

AMUSEMENTS

CAN. 140

Spectaculis, choreis et pompis quae eos dedecent, vel quibus clericos interesse scandalo sit, praesertim in publicis theatris, ne intersint.

Unbecoming to the clergy are all shows which offend against the divine or the natural law, or detract from the honor and respect due to the Church and her ministers.[63]

The term spectacula comprises all kinds of mimic representations, either masked or not, by professional actors, likewise gladiatorial contests, bullfights and prize-fights. Concerning this last-named kind one might be tempted to condemn them as immoral, yet it would be impossible to prove their immorality from the viewpoint of natural law. Hence we are not ready to pronounce them simply unbecoming.[64] Of course a bishop might forbid his 63 Cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 10, 11 f.; Inst., 37; 76.

64 The point of immorality would only arise from the danger to life, which no one is allowed to expose; however, properly conducted prize-fights does not necessarily involve risk of life, as statistics show.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clergy to attend prize-fights if he were persuaded that the majority of his flock strongly opposed them.

Choreae are balls and dances. The well-known decree of March 31, 1916, is pertinent to the subject; but the Code uses more general terms, although we would not assert that said decree is now ineffective.[65] That clergymen would take an active part in dances or arrange such, although it may have happened in bygone days,[66] is, we believe, no longer to be feared.

Pompae are festivities celebrated with much ado and display, with eating, drinking, and musical programmes; for instance, at weddings or other occasions of a purely worldly character.[67] If such affairs take place in public theatres,[68] the clergy have an added reason for keeping away. Theatres are now often turned into moving-picture shows, many of which are of a low type, injurious to eyes and nerves and destructive of moral and physical health. Of course theatrical representations by school-children, college students, or members of a parish are not affected by the Code. But the holy seasons of Advent and Lent and the ember days should be respected by the latter class.

CAN. 141

§ 1. Saecularem militiam ne capessant voluntarii,

65 Cf. A. Ap. S., VIII, 147 f. Card. Gasparri in his notes also refers to that decree (p. 35, n. 2). The dispositive part of said decree reads: "All clergymen, secular as well as regular, are strictly forbidden to promote or favor dances or balls, even if these should be held to help and support a good and pious cause or for any other purpose; besides all the clergy are prohibited to attend such dances if arranged by laymen." But dances in general, in which the clergy take neither the initiative nor a passive part, are not forbidden, even if given for a charitable or religious purpose by lay people. This is the tenor of the text, and nothing more.

66 Cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 10, 14.

67 Cfr. cc. 14, 15, X, III, 1; c. 3, Dist. 23.

68 Cfr. c. 12, X, III, 1 (theatres in churches); Conc. Trid., Sess. 22, c. 1 De Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nisi cum sui Ordinarii licentia, ut citius liberi evadant, id fecerint; neve intestinis bellis et ordinis publici perturbationibus opem quoquo modo ferant.

§ 2. Clericus minor qui contra praescriptum § 1 sponte sua militiae nomen dederit, ipso iure e statu clericali decidit.

The first clause of the first paragraph and the second paragraph treat the same subject, viz.: volunteering for military service, which now-a-days is mostly done by enlisting in the army or navy. Some countries permit clerical students to escape further service by volunteering for one year. If a cleric in minor or major orders should wish to choose this course, he must first obtain the permission of his Ordinary. A cleric in minor orders who voluntarily enlists against the prescription of § 1, forfeits the clerical state.[69]

To participate in internal troubles (revolutions, etc.) is strictly forbidden to the clergy. Leo XIII advised the Spanish clergy not to allow themselves to be wholly absorbed by party spirit lest they might seem to care more for human than for heavenly things.[70] As to political activity in the U. S., which a clergyman might be called upon to take up, a time may come when the freedom of our schools will require the clergy to exert political influence. The social question, too, is becoming a "burning" problem in public life. In any combat for principles the direction of political action will rest, first and above all, with the hierarchy. Uniform procedure, firm and un-

69 Can. 188, 6.— Decidere a statu clericali, it seems to us, involves a radical and absolute loss of that state, wherefore the reassuming of the clerical garb, which formerly (cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioesc., XII, 3, 1) could be performed privately, is no longer sufficient.

70 "Cum multa," Dec. 8, 1882; "Postquam catholici," Dec. 10, 1894; S. C. P. F., Instr. of Nov. 23, 1845, n. 7; S. C. C., Jul. 12, 1900.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

flinching, will lend great strength to the cause of the Church. But moderation and loyalty must always be combined with firmness, and the clergy will usually be safe if they follow the guidance of the hierarchy.

In purely political issues arising between parties the clergy are free, and the bishop cannot compel them to follow his opinion, much less forbid them to vote. For the right of voting is, radically at least, an inborn right, inherent in a citizen by the fact of his belonging to the State. And the State we hold to be of natural or divine origin. Hence the clergy, remaining citizens though clerics, cannot be deprived of that natural right by any authority, except by way of penalty.

However, we would not deny ecclesiastical authorities the right to forbid the clergy to vote in some particular case which involves great disturbance to state or diocese.[71] But this only by way of exception. And what we have said concerning the clergy in general, must fully be applied to religious, for that mystic mors civilis has now ceased in most countries.

NEGOTIATIO PROHIBITA

CAN. 142

Prohibentur clerici per se vel per alios negotiationem aut mercaturam exercere sive in propriam sive in aliorum utilitatem.

This is the negotiatio prohibita, the forbidden commercial trading, which was proscribed by many synodal acts. That in the beginning of the Church the "Apostolic 71 Leo XIII, "Cum multa"; Heiner, l. c., I, 229, justly remarks that the bishops are empowered to see to it that the clergy do not, on account of political activity, neglect their clerical duties or transgress the bounds of Christian charity and truthfulness.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

laborers" were such not only in the spiritual but also in the material sense, like St. Paul the tentmaker, was but natural. Later on, some clerics supported themselves on their patrimony, whereas others had to work for a living either in the fields, or at a trade, or in some other way. In the third century some bishops devoted so much time to their worldly affairs that complaints were heard, and the Council of Elvira (ca. 300) issued a special decree (can. 19) on the subject.[72] The Christian emperors forbade the clergy to engage in trading throughout the Roman empire.[73] Diocesan synods and provincial councils prohibited clerical participation in agricultural trades and businesses of a purely commercial character.[74] Nevertheless, says Benedict XIV, some clergymen are moved by such insane avarice that, not in their own name, but under the cloak of an assumed name —"sub alieni nominis velamine"— setting aside all fear of God, they engage in forbidden occupations.[75] Hence the Church has never ceased to admonish clerics to hold aloof from business and trading.

What, precisely, is meant by negotiatio and mercatura? These terms are generally understood to mean habitual buying and selling for the sake of gain —"turpis lucri gratia." Hence, according to the teaching of canonists, a cleric is not forbidden to sell stock or produce grown on his own farm. He may even buy cattle (feeders), fatten and sell them or their offspring in the market. But to purchase or rent land in order to raise wheat or corn for the sole purpose of selling it would be negotiatio

72 Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, I, 51.

73 Cfr. Heiner, l. c., I, 227.

74 Cfr. cc. 9 ff., Dist. 88; c. 16, X, III, 1; c. 6, X, III, 50; Conc. Trid., Sess. 22, c. 1, De Ref.

75 "Apostolicae Servitutis," Feb. 25, 1741, §1 (Bull., Prati, I, 38).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

illicita.[76] Now-a-days it is not forbidden for a cleric to lend money at the usual rate of interest.

An important part of our commercial life is taken by stock companies, which offer shares, stocks and bonds in every shape and form, as the advertisements prove ad nauseam. Some of these companies are solidly established and in a flourishing condition. Is a clergyman allowed to buy their stocks? We see no wrong in this, if the shares are bought with the sole object of getting the dividends.[77] But to buy for the sake of speculation is forbidden. It is also forbidden for a cleric to be a director of such a company, because this would entail a worldly and perhaps distracting occupation, not to speak of the financial risk. Gambling is most detestable in a clergyman, and one who has grown rich by such illicit means should be avoided by his fellows.[78]

The Code appears very strict, to judge from the wording, "sive in propriam sive in aliorum utilitatem." However, we believe our interpretation is borne out by the common teaching of canonists. For the words "negotiatio and mercatura" must be taken in their proper sense, and what the authors allow does not fall under trading or business, strictly interpreted. However, there can be no doubt that clerics are forbidden to trade or transact business in the proper sense by giving their money to others that these may traffic with it for the advantage of the real owner.

76 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Appell. 162 (p. 262). Of course a cleric is not allowed to sell wine, oil, or other products at retail. Heiner, l. c.

77 Sanguineti, Juris Eccl. Institut., 1890, p. 148 f; Buvée, Le Commerce, les Opérations de Bourse et le Clergé, in the Revue Canonique, Feb., 1899.

78 Bened. XIV, "Apost. Servitutis," l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ABSENCE FROM THE DIOCESE

CAN. 143

Clerici, licet beneficium aut officium residentiale non habeant, a sua tamen dioecesi per notabile tempus sine licentia saltem praesumpta Ordinarii proprii ne discedant.

CAN. 144

Qui cum licentia sui Ordinarii in aliam dioecesim transierit, suae dioecesi manens incardinatus, revocari potest, iusta de causa et naturali aequitate servata; et etiam Ordinarius alienae dioecesis potest ex iusta causa eidem denegare licentiam ulterioris commorationis in proprio territorio, nisi beneficium eidem contulerit.

In point of residence, as we shall see further on, the law deals separately with different ranks of the clergy. Canon 143 merely states the fact that the duty of residence is connected with certain offices or benefices, and that every secular cleric belongs to a determined diocese by incardination. Being ordained for that diocese, he is supposed to have some kind of work assigned to him or at least to be at the disposition of the Ordinary under whose jurisdiction he lives. A protracted absence from the diocese would, as it were, withdraw him from that jurisdiction, and hence an Ordinary is entitled to know his clerics' whereabouts.

What "notabile tempus" means may be inferred from a comparison of clerical residence with quasi-domicile. A quasi-domicile, as we have seen, is constituted by a stay of about six or seven months in one place. A "considerable time" for the absence of a cleric from his diocese would, therefore, be less than six months. On the whole, this term is very elastic according to the comparison implied therein. But we believe four or five months would be a "considerable time."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A presumed or probable permission is had when the Ordinary knows of a clergyman's absence and does not recall him, for then the latter may legitimately assume that the bishop is willing to prolong his furlough. As long as a cleric remains within the limits of his diocese, he needs no permission.

Canon 144, the last of Title III, deals with the recall of clerics to their own diocese. For such a recall there must be a just reason, and natural equity must be observed (naturali aequitate servata). Equity here can mean nothing else but justice or fairness in determining conflicting claims. The bishop of the diocese whence the clergyman is to be recalled, might wish to retain him because of his usefulness, and hence a conflict might arise between the two bishops, which must be settled by compensation or mutual agreement.

An Ordinary may, if there be a just reason, order an outside cleric to leave his diocese, unless, indeed, he has conferred an ecclesiastical benefice on him, which would be tantamount to incardination.[79]

[79] Cfr. can. 114.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IV

ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES

After a cleric has been incardinated in a diocese and endowed with clerical rights and duties, he may and should be given an ecclesiastical office. For the clerical state is not merely a speculative state, as it were, of idle onlookers, but one with determined functions, which vary according to the various hierarchical degrees, but all tend to the realization of the end for which the Church was founded. The Church, therefore, is entitled to prescribe the manner in which clerics are to be appointed to the offices established, either divinely or humanly, within her pale.

Hence the first chapter of Title IV treats of the nature and provision of ecclesiastical offices.

CAN. 145

§ 1. Officium ecclesiasticum lato sensu est quodlibet munus quod in spiritualem finem legitime exercetur; stricto autem sensu est munus ordinatione sive divina sive ecclesiastica stabiliter constitutum, ad normam sacrorum canonum conferendum, aliquam saltem secumferens participationem ecclesiasticae potestatis sive ordinis sive iurisdictionis.

§ 2. In iure officium ecclesiasticum accipitur stricto sensu, nisi aliud ex contextu sermonis appareat.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 146

De beneficialibus officiis in specie, praeter canones qui sequuntur, custodiantur insuper praescripta can. 1409 seqq.

What canon 145 says of an ecclesiastical office in the wider sense, may be illustrated by a consideration of certain offices which are no longer exclusively clerical, v. g., those of fossores, hermeneutae, cantores, and deaconesses. The latter, in the first two centuries, formed a distinct category or class of ecclesiastics, though without any hierarchical or liturgical distinction.[1] The offices of grave-digger, interpreter, and chanter were enumerated among the clerical orders, but gradually sank to lay rank.[2] Nevertheless, if singers perform their task with a spiritual intention, and not for gain or vanity, they may be said to exercise an ecclesiastical office. The same holds true of janitors and organists. Laymen, according to St. Peter, may be a "holy priesthood who offer up spiritual sacrifices"[3] in the Church, and thus act as functionaries of the Church at large.

However, the divine and human organization of the Church contains a special class of persons for the performance of strictly ecclesiastical offices. Three characteristics single out these functions properly called ecclesiastical: (1) They are established by divine or ecclesiastical law; (2) they must be conferred according to the rules laid down by the Church; (3) they must communicate some sort of ecclesiastical power.

(1) The Divine Law, as stated above,[4] singles out

1 Cfr. Wieland, Die Genetische Entwicklung der sog. Ordines Minores, 1897, p. 60 ff.

2 Ib., p. 165 f.; p. 170 ff.

3 I Pet. 2, 5.

4 Can. 108, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishops, priests, and ministers; human law (or rather ecclesiastical custom) has introduced other offices, partly of higher, partly of lower rank.

(2) The rules according to which one may hold an ecclesiastical office can only emanate from that power which confers the rights inherent in that office. And since these rights are of a spiritual nature, the power which confers them is the spiritual society established by Christ, or the Church. Hence to her must belong the right to establish the mode and means by which a man may obtain an ecclesiastical office.[5] But it must be remembered that the Church employs human factors and instruments in conveying ecclesiastical offices. Though, e. g., the supreme pontificate and the episcopate are of divine origin, yet the manner in which these offices are conferred has been determined gradually by human agencies, and historical facts must not be set aside for the sake of a preconceived idea. All that is necessary is to hold fast to the principle involved.

(3) An ecclesiastical office must convey ecclesiastical power. This may be in the hierarchy of order, and thus we have the episcopate, the priesthood, and the ministry (i. e., the higher orders of deaconship and subdeaconship as well as the four minor orders, with tonsure as a stepping stone); or it may be in the hierarchy of jurisdiction, which is supreme and ordinary in the Sovereign Pontiff, but dependent in the episcopate. Between these two there are different shades of jurisdiction, which the lumen maius has variously distributed. Every ecclesiastical office involves some jurisdiction, though its real and full nature appears only when exercised in foro externo. The term "ecclesiastical office" is generally to be taken

[5] Conc. Trid., Sess. 23, De Eccl. Hierch. et Ord., cc. 4, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in its proper sense as denoting ecclesiastical power.

The next canon (146) touches the beneficiary or material element of ecclesiastical offices. Those who serve the altar are entitled to partake of the oblations made for the benefit of the altar.[6] This fact led canonists to say that an ecclesiastical office entails "the right to receive a definite share of the ecclesiastical revenues."[7] The terms "office" and "benefice" were looked upon as correlative and therefore used promiscuously.[8] The Code, however, justly speaks of the office in directo, and of the benefice in obliquo, treating the latter as an ecclesiastical thing (res) in the third book. But it adds that ecclesiastical benefices fall under the rules governing ecclesiastical offices, the reason for which is evident from the mutual relation of the two.

6 I Cor. 9, 13.
7 Cf. Aichner, l. c., §76, 1.
8 Cfr. c. 9, C. 1, q. 3; c. 1, X, V, 26; c. 15, 6°, I, 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

APPOINTMENT TO ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES

CAN. 147

§ 1. Officium ecclesiasticum nequit sine provisione canonica valide obtineri.

§ 2. Nomine canonicae provisionis venit concessio officii ecclesiastici a competente auctoritate ecclesiastica ad normam sacrorum canonum facta.

CAN. 148

§ 1. Provisio officii ecclesiastici fit per liberam collationem a legitimo superiore, vel per eius institutionem, si praecesserit praesentatio a patrono aut nominatio, vel per eius confirmationem aut admissionem, si praecesserit electio aut postulatio, vel tandem per simplicem electionem et electi acceptationem, si electio non egeat confirmatione.

§ 2. De officiorum provisione per institutionem serventur praescripta can. 1448–1471.

CAN. 149

Electi, postulati, praesentati vel nominati a quibusvis personis ad ecclesiastica officia ne confirmentur, admittantur, instituantur a Superiore infra Romanum Pontificem, nisi antea fuerint a proprio Ordinario idonei reperti, etiam per examen, si id ius vel officii ratio postulet aut Ordinarius opportunum iudicaverit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 150

§ 1. Provisio officii de iure non vacantis ad normam can. 183, § 1, est ipso facto irrita, nec subsequente vacatione convalescit.

§ 2. Nec promissio eiusdem officii, quicunque id promiserit, ullum parit iuridicum effectum.

CAN. 151

Officium de iure vacans quod forte adhuc ab aliquo illegitime possidetur, conferri potest, dummodo rite secundum sacros canones declaratum fuerit eam possessionem non esse legitimam, et de hac declaratione mentio fiat in litteris collationis.

These five canons define in logical succession canonical appointment, its various modes, and some necessary requisites, and also touch upon vacancy. That no one can obtain an ecclesiastical office without canonical appointment follows from the necessity of the missio canonica and the fact that the Church is an organization.

(1) Appointment implies three elements: (a) the granting or conferring of an ecclesiastical office, (b) by competent authority, and (c) according to canon law.

The manner in which an ecclesiastical office may be conferred is: by free collation, investiture, confirmation or admission.

Collatio libera, i. e., a free appointment is made when he who appoints has the right not only to appoint but also to designate the person of the appointee. Thus the bishops of the U. S. are empowered to designate pastors and confer parishes on them.

Investiture or collatio necessaria takes place when the clergyman to be appointed is designated by a third person,— either presented by a patron (jus patronatus) or nominated by one who enjoys that privilege, as, for instance, the King of Spain or the Emperor of Austria.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Confirmation or ratification follows election, properly so-called, which takes place when a chapter enjoys the right of electing the prelate.

Admission, finally, is attached to postulation, which is a substitute for election when the person to be appointed suffers from a canonical impediment.[1]

The collatio libera confers full title to an office, or as the canonists say, jus in re — which means that the appointee holds a title to the office in question and may enter upon it at any time. In other words, he only needs to be installed (introductio corporalis). An equally valid title is conferred by investiture, confirmation, and admission; that is to say, one invested, confirmed, or admitted receives the jus in re, whilst before these three acts he had either a mere jus ad rem, as by presentation, nomination, or election, or no right at all, as in the case of postulation.

(2) The competent authority in conferring major ecclesiastical offices (prelacies) is the Sovereign Pontiff; lower offices may be bestowed by the Ordinary.[2] This is the general rule, which will be further explained when we come to treat of various offices.

(3) An ecclesiastical appointment must be made according to canon law. Now the law, as will be seen under the respective headings, has set up certain rules to be observed in making appointments. Of these some touch the office itself, others the act of conferring it, and again others the necessary requisites in the candidate. As to the latter, the Code lays them down under

1 Cf. c. 16, § 2, 6°, III, 4; cc. 11, 12, X, I, 6; c. 3, X, I, 5; X, III, 7.

2 Wernz, Jus Decret., II, n. 291, p. 397, ed. 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google each office, and hence we refer to the respective canons.

But the Code mentions expressly one condition of the office to be conferred, viz., that it must be vacant. Vacancy may be caused by resignation, privation, removal, transfer and lapse of time (can. 183, § 1), and may be either de facto, or de jure only, or de jure et facto.[3] An office is vacant de facto when no one actually holds or fills it, although some one has a lawful claim to it, e. g., a bishop exiled from his see. An office is vacant de jure if, as stated above, according to can. 183, § 1, an intruder is in actual, though illegal, possession thereof. An office is vacant both de facto and de jure if no one holds or claims it.

An office not vacant de jure cannot be conferred; and if it is conferred, the appointment is null and void because against the law. Even if the office becomes vacant before the illegal appointee has taken possession, the appointment is null because made at a date when there was no vacancy. In consequence all acts, examinations or concursus performed in the interval would have to be repeated.

An office vacant not de facto but de jure can be validly conferred after a declaratory sentence to the effect that there is a de jure vacancy, provided mention is made of that declaration in the letter of appointment.

A brief but important paragraph is § 2 of canon 150, which precludes the so-called expectativae. These were introduced towards the close of the Middle Ages, and were nothing else but a practical conclusion from the right of the Pope as supreme collator of all benefices.[4]

[3] Cf. Engel, III, 8, No. 2; Maschat-Giraldi, Institutiones Canonicae, III, 18, n. 1; cfr. cc. 1, 2, 6, X, III, 8; cc. 18, 28, 6°, III, 4.

[4] Cfr. c. 2, X, III, 8; c. 4, X, III, 24; Wernz, II, n. 315 (p. 420, ed. 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The popes sometimes granted letters or rescripts to clergymen declaring that the bearer was entitled to a benefice — for the office they usually cared but little — as soon as it would become vacant. The possessor of such a letter, given at first in the form of preces, then as mandates (monitoriae and even praeceptoriae), could lay claim to a benefice as soon as it became vacant, but had to wait (expectare) until it really was vacant.[5] Abuses arose in connection with these letters, and the rights of bishops and abbeys were much hampered, wherefore the Council of Trent set proper limits to these expectativae, admitting them only in case of coadjutors to bishops and abbots.[6] The new Code denies all juridical effect to any such promise, no matter by whom made, including, we suppose, the Pope himself, as far as he intends to bind himself by such laws.

Finally, certain conditions are attached to the act of appointment, but these are not here specified in general. Some are mentioned in connection with special modes of appointment. It may not be amiss to state the general conditions as described by canonists.[7]

(a) The appointment must be made freely, deliberately, and absolutely, i. e., not extorted by fear or violence, or by attaching conditions to the office which its character does not imply and the appointer has no right to demand.

(b) An ecclesiastical office must be conferred gratis, otherwise it savors of simony, which would nullify the act. Chancellor's fees for expediting the document are, however, permitted.

(c) The appointment must be made publicly. The 5 Cfr. v. Scherer, I, 283; Sägmüller, p. 272.

6 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 19; Sess. 25, c. 7, De Ref.

7 Cfr. Garzia, De Re Beneficiaria, P. VIII, c. I, n. 1; cc. 8, 9, 34; Wernz, II, n. 323 (p. 437, ed. 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

new Code prescribes, in addition, that it must be made in writing.[8]

(d) It must be made within the time determined by the Code for the office in question.

ART. I

FREE APPOINTMENT (LIBERA COLLATIO)

What is meant by free appointment has been explained above, both as to the designation of the person and the conferring of the office (collatio tituli). The present article doubtless treats of minor offices, which have no jurisdiction in foro externo, unless we include the office of vicar-general in the number of offices liberae collationis, which is admissible.

CAN. 152

Loci Ordinarius ius habet providendi officiis ecclesiasticis in proprio territorio, nisi aliud probetur; hac tamen potestate caret Vicarius Generalis sine mandato speciali.

The bishop or Ordinary of the diocese, according to the general rule, has the right to confer all the ecclesiastical offices in his diocese, except those which the law exempts from his power, or unless his right is contested and the claim proved.

(a) Exempt from this power by law are cathedral and collegiate chapters and the first dignitaries;[9] concerning canonicates the bishop must proceed in harmony with his chapter.

(b) The bishop's right may be limited by incorporation

[8] Cfr. cc. 392, 394, § 2.

[9] Cf. cc. 392, 394 § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and juspatronatus, which however must be proved by those who claim that right, as shall be seen in its proper place. Incorporation for forty years would create a prescription in favor of the corporation.[10] As to the juspatronatus, what is necessary for our country to note on this subject will be said later.

The above-mentioned cases excepted, the Ordinary is free in choosing his vicar-general and other officials of the diocese,[11] appointing consultors, rural deans, pastors, assistants and rectors.[12]

The vicar-general needs a special mandate to fill offices which the Ordinary is entitled to fill. The mandate must be given ad hoc, i. e., for the purpose of making the appointment. This means a special commission for each individual appointment, because each appointment is a separate juridical act which has no connection with any other. Therefore a general commission to appoint to ecclesiastical offices would not be valid. Besides the mandatarius must follow strictly the terms of the mandate, else he would act invalidly.[13]

REQUISITES OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICE HOLDERS

CAN. 153

§ 1. Ad vacans officium promovendus debet esse clericus, iis qualitatibus praeditus, quae a iure communi vel particulari aut a lege fundationis ad idem officium requiruntur.

§ 2. Assumatur, omnibus perpensis, magis idoneus sine ulla personarum acceptione.

§ 3. Cum provisus caret qualitatibus requisitis, pro-

10 Cf. X, II, 26, and Engel h. t. n. 33.

11 Cf. can. 366, § 2; can. 373.

12 Cf. can. 424; can. 446, §2; can. 455, §1; can. 476, §3; can. 480, § 1.

13 Cfr. the commentators on X, I, 38, De procuratoribus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

visio est nulla, si ita cautum sit iure communi vel particulari aut lege fundationis; secus est valida, sed per sententiam a legitimo Superiore irritari potest.

CAN. 154

Officia quae curam animarum sive in foro externo sive in interno secumferunt, clericis nondum sacerdotio initiatis conferri valide nequeunt.

Regarding the common law, our Code deals with the requisites for the single offices in connection with these. Note that no criminal, defamed, or censured ecclesiastic can be appointed to an office.[14] A particular law would be that the appointee must belong to a certain nation or family, or to the nobility, which played an important part in German cathedral chapters. The law of foundation is generally laid down in the founder's last will and testament, which the Church regards as sacred.

A brief remark on the "magis idoneus." The Code almost studiously avoids the terms "dignior" and "dignus," formerly used, and chooses the more flexible but also more juridical expression idoneus, which certainly is more in keeping with laws that deal with external qualities rather than internal. One is fit, just as one is worthy, if he lacks none of the qualifications prescribed by law. The fitter (magis idoneus) of two candidates is he who possesses these qualifications in a more conspicuous degree.[15] But the law inculcates the duty of appointing the fitter candidate only by way of admonition, not prohibition, and, moreover, adds: "omnibus perpen-

14 Cfr. c. 7, X, I, 6; c. 4, X, I, 14; c. 4, X, V, 1; cc. 7, 9, X, V, 27; Wernz, II, n. 298 (p. 404, ed. 1).

15 Cfr. Smith, Elements, I, n. 372, p. 169; Wernz, II, n. 309 (p. 414, ed. 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sis." Therefore the judgment rests with the Ordinary, who must consider the place, time, and circumstances of the office as well as the qualifications of the clergyman to be appointed. Sometimes a good business manager is needed, sometimes an orator, sometimes an ascetic. One parish needs a democratic leader, another a more aristocratic one. If the bishop looks at the appointment merely from the point of view of necessity and utility, without sentiment, he may make a mistake but certainly will not commit a sin or breach of the law.

TIME OF APPOINTMENT

CAN. 155

Officiorum provisio cui nullus terminus fuit speciali lege praescriptus, nunquam differatur ultra sex menses utiles ab habita notitia vacationis, firmo praescripto can. 458.

The date is definitely fixed for higher offices as well as for offices jurispatronatus; but for minor offices of free appointment the time of six months was generally prescribed.[16] The Code employs the term utiles, which is analogous to tempus utile,[17] and implies that if the bishop should ignore the vacancy, or be prevented by a reasonable cause from making an appointment, the six months are to be counted from the time when he was free to act. In can. 458 the Ordinary is admonished to appoint permanent pastors, but allowed to put a vacant parish in charge of an administrator if this appears to him more prudent in consideration of the circumstances.

16 Cfr. cc. 2, 5 12, X, III, 8; c. un. Clem. I, 5.

17 Cfr. can. 35.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INCOMPATIBLE OFFICES

When the rule of the Council of Chalcedon that every cleric should be ordained and assigned to a definite church or service was abandoned, avarice and ambition and the evils attendant upon an incontinent clergy caused serious abuses in the shape of the holding of several ecclesiastical offices by the same person. The third and fourth Lateran Councils [18] sought to remedy this unlawful practice, but the cumulatio beneficiorum flourished again during and after the "Babylonian captivity," until the Council of Trent [19] enacted wholesome reform laws and subsequent pontiffs enforced them.[20] The purpose which inspired the prohibition of holding two or more offices was twofold: — to counteract avarice and ambition and to provide efficacious and worthy ministers. The Code considers this last mentioned reason, and for the rest merely reënforces the Tridentine law.

CAN. 156

§ 1. Nemini conferantur duo officia incompatibilia.

§ 2. Sunt incompatibilia officia quae una simul ab eodem adimpleri nequeunt.

§ 3. Firmo praescripto can. 188, n. 3, concessio alterius officii a Sede Apostolica facta non valet, nisi in supplici libello mentio prioris incompatibilis habeatur, aut clausula derogatoria adiiciatur.

The law exempts no one, not even learned and deserving ecclesiastics,[21] from the general prohibition. Besides 18 Cfr. c. 3, X, III, 4; cc. 5, 28, X, III, 5; but "sublimes et litteratae personae" were exempt from the enforcement of c. 28.

19 Sess. 7, c. 4; Sess. 24, c. 17 De Ref.

20 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 8 ff.; Wernz, II, n. 318 (p. 426 ed. 1).

21 Cfr. c. 28, X, III, 5. The Trid. Council, however, excepted no one, not even Cardinals. Sess. 24, c. 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Code says, "nemini . . . conferantur," which means that it is forbidden to confer, and not only to hold, incompatible offices.

Incompatible are such offices as exclude the possibility of doing justice to both. For instance, (a) offices which require personal residence, such as bishopries, canonries, parishes;[22] (b) offices which, though they do not require personal residence, are of the same nature and attached to the same church, chapel, or altar; for instance, chaplancies or simple canonries[23] (called beneficia uniformia sub eodem tecto);[24] (c) a religious cannot be prior of one monastery and abbot of another.[25]

Offices which require neither residence nor service in the same church are compatible if one is not sufficient for the decent support of a cleric.[26]

§ 3 adverts to a possible dispensation. This the Holy See alone can grant. However, if a petition were sent to Rome to obtain, for instance, two parishes, and it would not mention the fact of the petitioner already being in the possession of one parish, the rescript would be ipso jure invalid,[27] for the legislator is not supposed to act against his own law, unless he makes special mention of the exception, as by the clause, ex certa scientia, or de plenitudine potestatis, or etiamsi de illis specialis, specifica, individualis mentio sit facienda, or similar ones.[28] The mere clause motu proprio[29] would not have this effect.

Can. 188, n. 3, refers to tacit resignation implied in the 22 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 17; cfr. Richter, p. 376 ff.

23 Trid., Sess. 7, c. 4, De Ref.; Richter, p. 50 ff.; Engel, III, 5, n. 68.

24 Cfr. c. 28, X, III, 5; c. 9, X, III, 8.

25 S. C. C. 23 Febr., 1715 (Richter, l. c., p. 50, n. 9).

26 Cfr. Richter, l. c., p. 50 ff.

27 Cfr. c. 23, 6°, I, 4; c. 2, Clem. I, 9.

28 Barbosa, Tract. Var., cl. 43; cl. 59.

29 Cfr. Can. 46.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google acceptance and possession of an incompatible office. Therefore, even if a papal rescript provided with the necessary clause would have been granted to hold two offices, if these offices were incompatible, one would have to be resigned and vacated.

CAN. 157

Officium vacans per renuntiationem vel per sententiam privationis nequit ab Ordinario, qui renuntiationem acceptavit aut sententiam tulit, valide conferri suis aut resignantis familiaribus, consanguineis vel affinibus usque ad secundum gradum inclusive.

This canon is a repetition of two Constitutions[30] of Pius IV and Pius V, and rests, though not verbatim, upon the prohibition of the Council of Trent,[31] which says that every shadow of hereditary succession in ecclesiastical offices is odious: — an effective blow against nepotism.

Familiares are such as serve one actually and dependently and belong to one's household and live at one's expense.[32] Consanguinei would be nephews and first cousins, while affines could only be spoken of in case of a once married clergyman. Upon none of these, either his own or those of the resignatarius, may the Ordinary confer an office made vacant by resignation or a sentence of privation. Neither may he admit any of the persons mentioned to a concursus.

The juspatronatus is not touched by this canon, nor are the familiars and relatives of the vicar-general debarred,[33] unless, of course, it was he who accepted the 30 Pius IV, "Cupientes," Oct. 11, 1560, § 1; Pius V, "Quanta Ecclesia," Apr. 1, 1568, § 5.

31 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 7, De Ref.; cfr. cc. 7, 10, 11, X, I, 17, De filiis presbyt.

32 Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 122, well says: "ut actu inserviat et ut veluti commensalis vivat expensis domini."

33 Reiffenstuel, I, 9, n. 118 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google resignation or passed the sentence of privation, for the canon speaks of the Ordinary.

Can. 158

Qui, alius neglegentiam vel impotentiam supplens, officium confert, nullam inde potestatem acquirit in nominatum; sed huius iuridicus status perinde constituitur, ac si provisio ad ordinariam iuris normam peracta fuisset.

This canon supposes the right of devolution brought into exercise either by negligence or inability of conferring the office at the time prescribed by law. In such cases the decretals [34] permitted the interference of the metropolitan if a suffragan bishop failed to make an appointment within six months. Our Code [35] admits the metropolitan's interposition only in the case of an office to which advowson is attached, or juspatronatus. Speaking, however, of inability the present canon seems to take a wider range which may extend to the case of a vicar-general conferring an office by special mandate. Yet even this must be excluded, for the juridical position would not be altered even if the vicar-general were allowed to interfere. The canon, therefore, must be limited to the right of devolution. This, says the law, does not create any juridical change in the status of the person who has received an office in this extraordinary way. The reason is that if a superior supplements the negligence or inability of the lawful appointer, his right cannot be stretched beyond what is expressly and explicitly permitted by law, which admits the appointment but gives no further jurisdiction.[36]

34 Cfr. X, III, 10, De supplenda negligentia praelat.

35 Cfr. Can. 274, 1°.

36 Reiffenstuel, 1, 10, n. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 159

Cuiuslibet officii provisio scripto consignetur.

Every appointment must be delivered in writing either by the Ordinary or by his chancellor, and, of course, properly signed and sealed with the diocesan seal.

ART. II

ELECTION

CAN. 160

Romani Pontificis electio unice regitur const. Pii X Vacante Sede Apostolica, 25 Dec. 1904; in aliis electionibus ecclesiasticis serventur praescripta canonum qui sequuntur, et peculiaria, si qua sint, pro singulis officiis legitime statuta.

I. ELECTION OF A POPE

The historical evolution of the process of electing a Pope shows various phases.

(1) Up to the time of Nicholas I (1059–1061) not only the clergy but also the senate and people of Rome had a share in the election, whilst the emperor claimed the right of ratifying it.[87]

(2) Nicholas II endeavored to reduce the undue influence of senate and people. He reserved the right of electing the Pope chiefly to the clergy of the titular or cardinal churches of Rome, but did not entirely exclude the emperor. His decree[88] expressly emphasizes "the honor and reverence due to the King."

87 Cfr. Mansi, Coll. Conc., XIV, 479; Bachofen, Summa Juris Eccles. Publ., 1910, p. 82 f.

88 C. 1, Dist. 23.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(3) The decretals of Alexander III (1159–81) went further, and Gregory X (1271–76) finally reserved the right of electing the Pope to the Cardinals of the Roman Church. The so-called "Veto" or "jus exclusivae, which the monarchs of Austria, France, and Spain arrogated to themselves and by means of which they excluded candidates unacceptable to them through the agency of one of their cardinals, was definitively abrogated by Pius X.[39]

The question whether the Pope can legally designate his own successor is controverted. Technically, there is no doubt that the Pope has this right, because the mode of election now in vogue is merely a human (ecclesiastical) law, by which the supreme lawgiver is not bound. Practically and morally speaking, however, such a right is not to be vindicated except in a very extraordinary and urgent case. The Pope, being a human being, might be too strongly inclined towards his family, and through nepotism the papacy might be in danger of becoming hereditary. Besides, the Pope is morally bound to respect the jus quæsitum of the cardinals, which would be illusory if the Pope could set it aside at his pleasure. Felix III (526–30) nominated his successor, but this extraordinary act was prompted by peculiar circumstances.[40]

At present the law concerning the election of a Pope is as follows:

1. The only authorized electors are the cardinals, who must have received at least deaconship, unless permitted by a special Apostolic indult to remain in lower orders. Even censured cardinals enjoy a vote in the conclave, but not such as have been deposed or have resigned their

[39] A. Ap. S., t. v. p. 252; Acta Pii X, 1908, III, 289 ff.

[40] Tueb. Quartalschrift, 1903, p. 91 ff., Wernz II, p. 651 (1 ed.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dignity with the consent of the Pope. Absent cardinals must be invited by the Dean of the Sacred College or by another cardinal and admitted to the conclave as long as no election has taken place.

2. Concerning eligibility, the Constitution of Pius X merely admonishes the electors to choose one whom they deem fit. Since the end of the fourteenth century only cardinals, and since Hadrian VI (1523), only Italian cardinals have been elected.

3. The voting takes place by scrutiny, which may be performed only within the conclave. The latter point, however, no longer affects the validity of the election.

Quasi-inspiration, compromise, and accessus seem to be excluded, as the Constitution makes no mention of these. The election is completed only when two-thirds of the votes or suffrages, cast secretly and according to the scheduled forms, fall on the same person. The vote of the elected cardinal may not be counted. It is evident that generally more than one scrutiny is required. The ballots must be burned.

4. A purchased election would probably be valid, but those guilty of that crime (simony) incur excommunication latae sententiae. The same penalty falls upon those who in any way admit the abrogated "veto."

5. The cardinals may, during the vacancy of the Apostolic See, discuss probable candidates and their fitness for the office. This is called the tractatus praevius.

2. ELECTION OF BISHOPS

During the first ten centuries election in the proper sense was effected by the concurring suffrages and cooperation of the clergy and the people. Often sovereigns exercised an undue influence in the matter, especially after an exaggerated feudal system had created the so-called investiture with ring and crozier, which abuse was rectified by the Treaty of Worms (1122). Later on the corporate chapters of the cathedral churches legally exercised the right of electing the bishop.[41] The rule that all provisions belong to the Holy See (known as Regula II of the Apostolic Chancery) was never received outside of Italy, but remained a dead letter, like most of the other rules (with the exception of III) of the same chancery.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A modification had naturally to take place when Protestantism severed many rulers and countries from the Church. The jus praesentandi granted to some sovereigns naturally ceased after their defection, and though a certain interference was still exercised, contra fas jusque, the diocesan clergy and neighboring bishops, under the supervision of the Holy See, took an important part in episcopal appointments. This happened especially in Ireland,[42] where the ius commendandi in course of time almost became a ius nominandi. Rome was careful to keep the right of appointing bishops within its proper limits. Still the right of commending candidates was acknowledged in Great Britain and the United States, and the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (tit. II, n. 15) sanctioned the mode of selecting three candidates as dignissimus, dignior, dignus, respectively, at a meeting of the consultors and irremovable rectors of the diocese. This terna was revised by the bishops of the respective province and the final decision given by the Propaganda and, of late, by the S. C. of the Consistory. A new method was ushered in — ad experimenti instar — by a decree of the S. C. Cons. of July 25, 1916. It is difficult 41 C. 35, Dist. 63 (Lat. II, c. 28); cc. 21, 36, 42, 51, 56, X, 1, 6; c. 3, X, II, 12.

42 Eccles. Review, 1917 (56), p. 227.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to describe this mode by a proper term, but we may call it a proposal for future appointments.

The decree may be summarized as follows:

1. The so-called candidates, whose names may be proposed, must enjoy certain qualities. They should be of mature age, but not too old, experienced in the practical administration of temporal and spiritual affairs, of sound Catholic doctrine,— which means that they must not be suspected of Modernism, especially,— of more than ordinary learning, faithfully devoted to the Holy See, of good conduct and piety, of sound manners and health. Their family affairs should also be examined (art. 2).

2. All bishops are called upon to send to their metropolitan the names of one or two priests, either of their own diocese or outside of it, whom they regard as possible candidates for a future choice. This should be done in Lent, every two years, beginning with 1917 (art. 1). In order that the bishops may be properly informed as to the character of the candidates, they should informally and secretly ask their consultors and irremovable rectors — a reminiscence of the old method. They are, however, in no wise bound to accept or follow the information thus obtained (art. 2 ff.). The metropolitan follows the same procedure in his archdiocese, and ultimately draws up an alphabetical list of the names received from all the bishops of the province (art. 5).

3. The bishops meet with their metropolitan after Easter, at a convenient place and time, without attracting the attention of outsiders. To their meeting no other ecclesiastic is admitted. One of the bishops (the youngest or the ablest) acts as secretary. After having taken the oath of secrecy, the bishops enter into a moderate (moderate, we suppose, as to time and spirit) discussion concerning the candidates proposed. Then they proceed to balloting, in alphabetical order, the white ballot signifying "yes," and the black one "no," and a neutral color "I abstain" (art. 12). The metropolitan and the secretary act as tellers. More than one vote may be taken. After a result has been obtained, the minutes of the discussion and the result of the balloting are drawn up in form of a document by the secretary, who reads the same to his fellow prelates and has a copy made, which must be sent to the Apostolic Delegate, by whom it is forwarded to the Consistorial Congregation (art. 15 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This, in substance, is the decree regulating the "proposal" of names, which are to be kept on record in Rome as well as in the secret archives of the metropolitan, at least as long as there is no danger of divulgation. The decree says nothing of the right of bishops, nothing about postulatio, nothing as to when a meeting should be called in case the metropolitan see is vacant.

The juridical effect of the "proposal" or the ius nominandi seu commendandi, as once in vogue in the United States and still customary in Ireland, England, and Canada, is not to create a ius ad rem, but merely, as it were, a processus informativus, serving as a basis to the Holy See for the appointment of suitable candidates to vacant bishoprics.

Quite naturally the question arises: Does this decree still hold good after the Code has gone into force? We believe it does, since the Code alludes to "peculiaria," where lawfully established. Besides, it is not probable that the framers of the decree of 1916 knew nothing of the present Code, which was then in its final shape, so far as the regulations concerning the election of bishops was concerned. But we may be allowed to express the hope that this decree will be changed or abolished if the experiment should prove unsatisfactory.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Other ecclesiastical elections which fall under the present article, are those held in religious communities, especially of exempt orders, who elect their prelates or superiors.

TIME AND CONVOCATION

CAN. 161

Si cui collegio sit ius eligendi ad vacans officium, electio, nisi aliud iure cautum fuerit, nunquam differatur ultra trimestre utile computandum ab habita notitia vacationis officii; quo termino inutiliter elapso, Superior ecclesiasticus, cui ius confirmandae electionis vel ius providendi successive competit, officio vacanti libere provideat.

CAN. 162

§ 1. Salvis peculiaribus constitutionibus vel consuetudinibus, collegii praeses, statuto modo, loco ac tempore electoribus convenienti, convocet omnes de collegio; et convocatio, quando personalis esse debet, valet, si fiat vel in loco domicilii aut quasi-domicilii vel in loco commorationis.

§ 2. Si quis ex vocandis neglectus et ideo absens fuerit, electio valet, sed ad eius instantiam debet, probata praeteritione et absentia, a competente Superiore irritari, etiam secuta confirmatione, dummodo iuridice constet recursum saltem intra triduum ab habita notitia electionis fuisse transmissum.

§ 3. Quod si plures quam tertia pars electorum neglecti fuerint, electio est ipso iure nulla.

§ 4. Defectus convocationis non obstat, si praetermissi nihilominus interfuerint.

§ 5. Si agatur de electione ad officium quod electus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ad vitam retinet, convocatio electorum ante officii vacationem nullum habet iuridicum effectum.

Canon 161 establishes the trimestre utile within which the election must be held. What utile means has been explained.[43] The Code adds that the three months' period must be observed unless the law provides otherwise, and law here means the common law, not constitution or custom. Hence the general law requires that an election be held within three months, unless, of course, some unforeseen impediment should arise,[44] for which the utile tempus is granted. If the legitimate electors fail to meet within that time, or can not agree upon a candidate, — for election certainly involves a result, not mere fruitless scrutinies — then the one who is entitled to ratify the election, or to fill the vacant office by way of devolution, should make the appointment. This is the case, for instance, if a cathedral chapter allows the tempus utile to elapse.[45] But it also applies to religious communities, and the common law admits their constitutions only in so far as they do not conflict with the present canon. Hence privileges granting an extension of time must now be considered to be without effect.[46] Wherefore, for instance, in certain Benedictine Congregations which grant the right of ratification to the Abbot President, the latter would be entitled to appoint, positis ponendis, a candidate of his own.

Canon 162 treats:

(1) Of the preliminary act of convocation, which concerns the mode, place, and time of the election.

(a) The possible mode, in the juridical sense, would 43 Cf. can. 35; can. 155.

44 C. 41, X, I, 6.
45 Can. 432, § 2.
46 Can. 507. The Franciscans enjoy such a privilege; cfr. Piat. Mont, Prael. Juris Reg., 2nd ed., I, 518; Bachofen, Compendium Juris Reg., p. 190.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be twofold, viz., scrutiny and compromise, quasi-inspiratio being excluded. Scrutiny is the usual way of electing by votes. Compromise is admitted by the Code and determined in c. 172 f. But the term "modus" may also be taken in a wider sense, as signifying the way in which to proceed in the election, as far as not determined by law; v. g., mass and other solemnities, written or printed ballots, etc.

(b) The place for holding elections is not determined. According to the old law, episcopal elections should take place in the cathedral.[47] For religious the whole convent is reputed to be a proper place; not even an interdicted place is excluded.[48]

(c) The time is to be determined by the head of the collegiate body. Any time of the day may be chosen, and it is proper that the Missa de Spiritu Sancto precede the act.[49]

(2) Convocation or summons must be served to all who belong to the body which is to elect. Therefore

(a) All absent members must be summoned in such a way that, considering the ordinary means of communication, the summons is apt to reach them wherever they may be. Hence if the summons is directed to one's domicile or quasi-domicile, or actual stopping-place (e. g., in vacation time), this is sufficient. If the letter is lost on the way, or miscarries, this accident has no juridical effect. But it is advisable to have the letters registered, for the receipt would serve as a proof that summons has been duly made. Distance is a very immaterial point now-a-days. Besides, the Constitutions may provide for different emergencies.

(b) Summons must be sent also to such as are under

47 C. 28, X, I, 6.
48 Cfr. Bachofen, Compendium Juris Reg., p. 189.
49 Ibid., p. 195.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google censure, unless they are excommunicati vitandi,[50] or have been legally deprived of their vote before the summons was sent.

(c) The reason why all have a right to be summoned lies not only in the chapter-rights, of which that of having a voice in the election of superiors is the most prominent, but also in the danger of nullifying the election. For if only one member is absent by reason of not having been called, the election may be declared null and void. However, the one who feels himself slighted, in order to nullify the election, must furnish a twofold proof: first, that his absence was caused by not being summoned, and secondly, that he has put in his claim within three days from the date of the election. If the first proof cannot be furnished, the latter has no value. Hence the secretary of the chapter should keep a copy of the summons, with receipts for the registered letters sent out. The members should be called together in capitulo, and care be taken that all are present. If one is absent legitimately (i. e., not through his own fault), he is entitled to a personal summons; but if he knows of the convocation from another source, and that source can be proved, he is not entitled to remonstrate. The proof that he appealed within three days can easily be upset if the president keeps the minutes and records.

(d) That more than one-third of the electors of any corporate body should be neglected in the case of an election is not probable, but should it happen, the election is null and void, and another must take place. To proceed to that, a comparison between the members entitled to the vote and the members neglected must be made, and if it is proved that the summons were not sent, the minority

[50] C. 23, X, II, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has the right to ask for another election. However, if they were present at the election, even though they did not vote, the election is valid, for summoning is only a means of calling together, not the purpose of election.

(e) Paragraph 5 speaks of an office for life, and enacts that any meeting of the members entitled to take part in an election held before the vacancy of the incumbent produces no juridical effect. Such a preliminary meeting or consultation about possible candidates savors of disrespect for the present incumbent, opens the way to criticism and insubordination, and is forbidden to the cardinals under penalty of excommunication.[51] From such a meeting the so-called tractatus praevius differs toto caelo. This is a meeting held in certain congregations immediately before the election of a superior, in order to discuss the qualifications of probable candidates. Our Code is silent on this subject, and we believe that the advisability of holding such tractatus praevii depends much on circumstances. In a monastery with many expositi such a preliminary discernment may accelerate an election and remove misgivings. Besides, it may bring out faults and mistakes of the former government which ought to be corrected.[52]

THE ELECTORS (VOX ACTIVA)

CAN. 163

Convocatione legitime secuta, ius eligendi pertinet ad eos qui praesentes sunt die in convocatione statuto, exclusa facultate ferendi suffragia non solum per epi-

51 Cfr. "Vacante Sede Apostolica," n. 80; c. 2, Dist. 79.

52 At Einsiedeln in Switzerland they hold a so-called Murr-Kapitel, in which everyone is allowed to criticize what displeased him under the preceding régime.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

stolam, sed etiam per procuratorem, nisi lege peculiari aliud caveatur.

The Decretals as well as the Tridentine Council,[53] and several decisions of the Roman Curia, had forbidden voting by proxy, the common opinion of canonists also voting by letter.[54] Now the Code establishes the general law that only those actually present are allowed to vote, but voting by proxy or letter is permitted where a special law to that effect has been made by the collegiate body. Such a law may be contained in the Constitutions approved by the Holy See. Custom, however, is inadmissible in this matter because the Code speaks of laws enacted in a special manner. Where voting by proxy or letter is allowed, care must be taken that the secrecy of the vote be kept intact.

CAN. 164

Etsi quis plures ob titulos ius habeat ferendi nomine proprio suffragii, non potest nisi unicum ferre.

CAN. 165

Nullus collegio extraneus admitti potest ad suffragium, salvis privilegiis legitime quaesitis; secus, electio est ipso facto nulla.

CAN. 166

Si laici contra canonicam libertatem electioni ecclesiasticae quoquo modo sese immiscuerint, electio ipso iure invalida est.

If laymen interfere in any way with canonical liberty

[53] Cfr. c. 42, X, I, 6; Sess. 25, c. 6, De Reg.

[54] Benedict XV, "Dei providentis arcano," May 1, 1917; Acta Ap. Sedis, Vol. IX, pp. 529 ff.; cfr.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in an ecclesiastical election, the election is ipso iure null and void.

Canon 164 precludes the casting of several votes by the same person, though he may technically have the right to more than one vote, for instance, as canon and dignitary, consultor and irremovable rector.

Can. 165 says that one who does not belong to the collegiate body, or is not a member of the chapter which has the right of election, may by custom or privilege be permitted to cast a vote,[55] provided he is himself a cleric. Unless custom or privilege — and both must be proved — warrant such a participation, no one who does not belong to the body of electors has a right to interfere, and if the chapter should consent to such interference, the election would be null and void.

Much less, says Can. 166, may a layman, no matter under what pretext, even though he be the patron of the monastery[56] or church, be admitted to the election. And election here means not only the casting of the votes, but whatever belongs thereto. An exception, if such it be, may be made in favor of a layman's being present at the holy Mass, to pray for a good choice.

CAN. 167

§ 1. Nequeunt suffragium ferre:

1.° Incapaces actus humani;

2.° Impuberes;

3.° Censura vel infamia iuris affecti, post sententiam tamen declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam;

4.° Qui sectae hereticae vel schismaticae nomen dederunt vel publice adhaeserunt;

55 Cfr. c. 8, X, I, 4; c. 50, X, I, 6.

56 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 63 (Had.); c. 51, X, I, 6. (Cluny had admitted a layman, but was reprimanded by Greg. IX: "in dispendium ecclesiasticae libertatis"), c. 56, X, I, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° Carentes voce activa sive ob legitimam iudicis sententiam sive ex iure communi aut particulari.

§ 2. Si quis ex praedictis admittatur, eius suffragium est nullum, sed electio valet, nisi constet, eo dempto, electum non retulisse requisitum suffragiorum numerum, aut nisi scienter admissus fuerit excommunicatus per sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam.

Impuberes are all under the age of fourteen.[57] Those who are "incapable of [eliciting] a human act" are generally called insane, although the authors[58] exclude from voting only such as have no control over themselves at all habitually, not such as have a lucid moment (lucidum intervallum) at the time when they cast their vote.

By censure is understood any excommunication, suspension or personal interdict which has been inflicted either by the law itself for a grievous external fault and hence needs only to be declared to be incurred, or a penalty inflicted by legitimate ecclesiastical authority for a crime which, though not censurable in law, was imposed by the judge in the form of a sententia condemnatoria. Concerning the first kind, note that a declaratory sentence starts at the moment of the perpetration of the crime[59] for which it was inflicted, whilst a condemnatory sentence must be formally pronounced in order to take effect. Hence if one had committed a crime deserving of censure by a declaratory sentence, even though he would be declared guilty only at or after the election, his vote would be null and void. The same holds good concerning infamia juris, which is in law established for certain enormous crimes,[60] as well as with regard to heretics and 57 Cfr. can. 88, § 2; c. 32, X, I, 6.

58 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 166.

59 Cfr. can. 2232, § 2.

60 Such as heresy and apostasy, also crimes of a gross nature com-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

schismatics. The term nomen dare means to enroll one's name on the official list of members of a non-Catholic sect, e. g., by taking a pew in a sectarian church, but one could not be said to have "given his name" if he merely contributed to a collection.

Those who are deprived of an active voice in an election may be so deprived either by the sentence of an ecclesiastical judge (Ordinary, Pope, Abbot), or by reason of the law stating that penalty. Such are secularized and apostatized religious.[61] The particular law sometimes inflicts that penalty, e. g., when the Constitutions of an order declare that religious who own property against the will of their superior,[62] or who reveal the secrets of the chapter, lose the right to vote. Here the Code does not require either a declaratory or a condemnatory sentence. Hence such religious are ipso iure deprived of the vote. However, since either the fact of the perpetrated crime, or the penalty, may not be known to the electors, the president should formally exclude such members, or formally pardon them for the purpose of casting their vote.

Here we may explain the meaning of the absolutio imparted at the beginning of an election. This is little more than a mere ceremony and does not render those excluded from the right of voting under our canon capable of voting, but is intended ad cautelam, as the canonists say, i. e., in order that the election, if no essential feature is omitted, may take effect, and hence may not be frivolously attacked. For if it would take away the effects of penalties, these would be a mere mockery.[63]

The last paragraph (§ 2) says that the vote cast by mitted by clergymen in sacris, such as sodomy, adultery, bestiality; cfr. can. 2314, § 1, n. 2; can. 2359, § 2.

61 Cfr. can. 639 f.; can. 2385; by a sentence of the judge cfr. cc. 2331, 2336, 2342, 2360, 2368, 2389.

62 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 2, De Regg.

63 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Praelatus Regularis," n. 73.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

one incapable of voting does not render the election itself null and void, except in two cases: if the invalid vote were decisive, and if the electors would knowingly admit an excommunicated member. The first case is a rather difficult one. The secrecy of the ballot box, as now in use, seems to preclude an investigation. It is probably for this reason that the canon says, "si constat," i. e., if it is evident. The fact might be evident to the tellers, whose statement in that case would be sufficient to nullify the election. The other case is more palpable, for the law requires a knowledge on the part of at least some of the electors of the fact of excommunication. If an excommunicated person were present in the room and could not be decently removed, the electors would have to protest against his presence and also state that his vote would not count.[64] The tellers could then simply throw it out.

CAN. 168

Si quis ex electoribus praesens in domo sit in qua fit electio, sed electioni ob infirmam valetudinem interesse nequeat, suffragium eius scriptum a scrutatoribus exquiratur, nisi aliter particularibus legibus vel legitimis consuetudinibus fuerit constitutum.

This rule, of course, applies only when the sick person is in a normal mental condition; otherwise there is not only no obligation to obtain his vote, but by reason of can. 167, § 1, n. 1, he is excluded from voting.

CAN. 169

§ 1. Suffragium est nullum, nisi fuerit:

1.° Liberum; et ideo invalidum est suffragium, si

64 Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 169.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

elector metu gravi aut dolo, directe vel indirecte, adactus fuerit ad eligendam certam personam aut plures disiunctive;

2.° Secretum, certum, absolutum, determinatum.

§ 2. Conditiones ante electionem suffragio appositae tanquam non adiectae censentur.

CAN. 170

Suffragium sibimetipso nemo valide dare potest.

The first essential requisite of a vote is (a) that it be given freely. Hence if a voter is influenced, either directly, i. e., at the election itself, or indirectly, i. e., before the election but for the purpose of electing a certain person, no matter whether this influence was exercised by insiders or outsiders, through grievous fear[65] or deceit, i. e., bribery, or false representations, his vote is ipso iure null and void.[66] Undue influence of senior upon junior members would not invalidate the vote, but might endanger its liberty, so that the tellers would be obliged to reject the ballots.

(b) A vote must furthermore be secret, because of the probable consequences of partisanship, enmity, preference, and other evils. Hence the Decretals as well as the Council of Trent insist upon secrecy,[67] and all precautions must be taken that no one's vote is ever revealed. For this reason the names of the candidates as well as those of the electors should be printed and distributed. No mark should be put on the ballots, and no showing them to others is permitted.

(c) A vote must, in the third place, be certain, i. e., cast for a determined person. It would be uncertain if

65 Cfr. can. 2205, § 2.
66 Cfr. cc. 14, 43, X, I, 6.
67 Cfr. c. 42, X, I, 6; Trid., Sess. 25, c. 6, De Regg.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

written thus: "I elect the one who has the most votes." Absolute is the opposite of conditional. A conditional vote would be: "I elect N. if he accepts." A vote is determined if the candidate cannot be mistaken and it spells almost the same as certain.

Any stipulation made before the election is null and void; hence no "capitulatio," as was sometimes done before papal elections, and no promise may be made, or if made, it need and should not be kept after the election.

BALLOTING

CAN. 171

§ 1. Ante electionem per secreta suffragia deputentur, nisi iam propriis statutis deputati sint, e gremio collegii duo saltem scrutatores, qui una cum praeside, si et ipse e gremio collegii sit, iusiurandum interponant de munere fideliter implendo ac de secreto servando circa acta in comitiis, etiam expleta electione.

§ 2. Scrutatores curent ut suffragia secreto, diligenter, singillatim et servato praecedentiae ordine ab unoquoque electore ferantur; collectisque ad ultimum suffragiis, coram praeside electionis, secundum formam propriis constitutionibus vel legitimis consuetudinibus statutam, inspiciant an suffragiorum numerus respondeat numero electorum, suffragia ipsa scrutentur palamque faciant quot quisque retulerit.

§ 3. Si numerus suffragiorum superet numerum eligentium, nihil est actum.

§ 4. Suffragia statim, peracto unoquoque scrutinio, vel post sessionem, si in eadem sessione habeantur plura scrutinia, comburantur.

§ 5. Omnia electionis acta ab eo, qui actuarii munere fungitur, accurate describantur, et saltem ab eo-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dem actuario, praeside ac scrutatoribus subscripta, in collegii tabulario diligenter asserventur.

Unless otherwise provided for in the statutes of the respective corporation, at least two tellers, who are members of the chapter, must be appointed by secret suffrage immediately before the election. These tellers, as well as the presiding officer (if he belongs to the chapter), must take an oath that they will faithfully fulfill their duty and keep the proceedings secret even after the election.

The tellers must see to it that each elector votes secretly, singly, and according to the order of precedence. After the votes have been collected the tellers shall, in the presence of the presiding officer, count them according to the constitutions and customs proper to the chapter, to see whether the number of the ballots corresponds with that of the electors; and then ascertain and announce the result.

If the number of votes cast exceeds that of the voters the election is void.

The ballots must be burnt after each scrutiny, or at least after each session, if several ballots were take in one one session.

The minutes of the election must be accurately taken down in writing by the secretary, who together with the presiding officer and the tellers must sign the record, which is to be carefully preserved in the archives of the chapter.

This important canon embodies the famous chapter 42 of the Decretals of Gregory IX (I, 6), which has been elaborately explained by the commentators. However, the new law modifies and simplifies the procedure. Thus, only two tellers are required, but these must be members of the chapter which elects a superior. They must be chosen by secret ballot, unless the statutes determine who are to serve as tellers, for instance, the two seniors, or the two juniors, or the two oldest definitors. The tellers must be chosen immediately before the election. Their function consists in watching that the voting takes place according to law: secreto, i. e., so that no one can perceive in any way, or by any sign, to whom another gives his vote. This can best be accomplished by using printed ballots and folding them in such a way that the name does not appear. The folded ballots are cast into a chalice or urn in presence of the tellers. Diligenter formerly meant that the tellers had to urge the electors to give their vote to a worthy candidate and with holy zeal. This was necessary when the electors had to inquire and put down the names of those for whom the vote was cast.[68] Now-a-days diligenter may be taken as an exhortation to the electors to vote conscientiously and so as not to delay the election. Singillatim means that the electors should vote one after another, not two or three at the same time, which might furnish an opportunity for fraud. Hence the order of precedence is prescribed, which says that the senior member of the community should vote first. Seniority is to be taken according to the date of profession in religious bodies, or the date of appointment or choice in chapters or boards of diocesan consultors. However, if the Constitution of an order or congregation prescribes that the junior members should cast their vote first, this rule must be observed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After all have cast their vote, the tellers, in the presence of the presiding officer, should first compare the number of votes cast with the total number of those who were entitled to vote. If there are fifty lawful electors present and fifty-one votes are cast, the election is null and void and another ballot must be taken. When the number of votes cast tallies with that of the voters present, the ballots must be opened (unfolded) and examined as to their validity, which may be affected by the vote itself, by the person who cast it, or the one for whom it is cast.

[68] Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 128.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) Every ballot must be cast according to can. 169, and hence uncertain, conditional, and undetermined votes are not counted.

(b) The person who has cast the vote may be incapable of voting, which would make his vote null and void; but this defect should be decided before the balloting, although such an invalid vote may be rejected after the election if its invalidity was not discovered before.

(c) The person for whom the vote is cast may suffer from an impediment which renders him incapable of accepting the election, at least without a dispensation. If the impediment is such that a dispensation may be obtained, the person thus affected must be postulated (can. 180) and the phrase "I postulate" be used in the vote or ballot. Otherwise the vote is invalid. The impediments which may arise in the case of religious are stated in can. 504 of our Code, where the Constitutions of each religious congregation are enforced and, besides, the following conditions laid down: that no one is eligible who has not been in the order at least ten years from the date of simple profession and who is not of legitimate birth;[69] that, to be elected superior general or abbess, a candidate must be forty years of age, whilst to be elected provincial or abbot or guardian, etc., the age of thirty

[69] Regula juris 87 in 6°: "infamibus portae non pateant dignitatum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

suffices. The Constitutions of some orders lay down other and stricter conditions for the respective offices.

Under the old law heretics and apostates, forgers of apostolic documents,[70] persons guilty of sodomy,[71] those who from ambition consent to their election before the result is published,[72] and those who used simonical means were excluded.[73] The Code does not mention these disqualifications, but it would be neither against the law nor superfluous to insert them in the Constitutions.

The result of an election is to be made public by the tellers, together or singly announcing how many votes each candidate has received.

Summarizing the new law governing elections we may lay down the following as its essential points:

(1) Two tellers secretly elected from the members of the body;

(2) Oath taken by the tellers;

(3) Duty of tellers respecting the casting of the votes;

(4) Collecting of the votes;

(5) Examination as to the number of votes and voters;

(6) Inspection of the ballots;

(7) Publication of the result.

The rest of the text (§§ 4 & 5) is plain enough. It is not so evident, to us at least, why no oath is required from the presiding officer if he does not belong to the gremium collegii. Of course, we understand why he cannot strictly be obliged to take the oath, for he does not belong to the chapter and therefore the chapter has no authority to demand an oath of him. However, the supreme legislator could oblige such a one to take the oath of secrecy because the presiding officer at an ecclesiastical election acts in the

70 C. 7, X, V, 20.

71 Pius V, "Horrendum," Aug. 30, 1568.

72 C. 46, X, I, 6.

73 C. 27, X, V, 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

name of the Church. And we believe it would be very opportune to put him under oath because strict secrecy is very important in an election, and although he is bound by the professional secret, yet the religious act of taking an oath would add weight to the natural obligation.

The oath itself may be taken upon the Holy Gospels, which is the usual form, or without the Gospel Book, by simply swearing in the name of God.

COMPROMISE

CAN. 172

§ 1. Electio, nisi aliud iure caveatur, fieri etiam potest per compromissum, si nempe electores, unanimi et scripto consensu, in unum vel plures idoneos sive de gremio sive extraneos ius eligendi pro ea vice transferant, qui nomine omnium ex recepta facultate eligant.

§ 2. Si agatur de clericali collegio, compromissarii debent esse sacerdotes, secus electio est invalida.

§ 3. Compromissarii debent pro validitate electionis conditiones compromisso appositas, quae non sint contra ius commune, observare; si nullae conditiones additae fuerint, servandum ipsis est ius commune circa electiones; conditiones autem contra ius pro non appositis habeantur.

§ 4. Si ab electoribus in unam tantum compromissum fuerit personam, haec nequit seipsam eligere; si plures designati fuerint compromissarii, nemo ex iis proprio consensu potest accedere reliquis ipsum eligentibus ut electionem sui compleat.

This canon provides that an election, unless otherwise

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google provided by law, may take place "by compromise, i.e., the electors may, by unanimous written consent, bestow the right of electing upon one or several fit persons, who may be either members of the chapter or outsiders, and who, by virtue of the faculty received, perform the election in the name of all.

In clerical chapters the compromissarii must be priests, otherwise the election is invalid.

The compromissarii, in order to elect validly, must observe the conditions laid down in the compromise, as far as these do not contravene the common law; if no conditions are mentioned, the common law concerning elections must be followed.

If there is only one compromissarius, he may not elect himself; if there are several, none of them may add his vote to the votes cast for himself in order to be elected.

The Code, following the Decretals,[74] admits the form of compromise and sets up several rules for it.

The first rule is that the compromise must be made by unanimous consent, because an election touches all and must therefore be approved by all.[75] The consent must be given in writing (formerly this was not required), and therefore all the electors must sign their names to the compromise. The electors may choose either from their own (chapter) or outside, i. e., such who would not have a right to vote, as in the example referred to in the previous note concerning nuns appointing the bishop as their compromissarius.

The second rule, although not especially stated, is that the compromissarii must be clergymen,[76] and if the electing body is of the clerical order, the Code says they must be priests. What is meant by clerical order or community

74 Cf. c. 42, X, I, 6; in c. 8 ib.
75 Reg. juris 29 in 6°.
76 Cf. c. 8, X, I, 41, de arbitris, c. 2, XII, 1 de judic.; can. 166.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is stated in can. 488, § 4, where a clerical order is defined as one, most of whose members are priests. A lay order, e. g., is that of the Christian Brothers, who may choose brothers of another community, or even of a different order, as compromissarii.

The third rule touches a conditional compromise, which is sometimes called limited, or a compromise with restrictions, as, for instance, if the electors agree to elect one of the members of their own community,[77] or to employ the advice of certain persons,[78] to elect within a specified time. If the condition added militates against the common law which determines the fitness of persons or the mode of election, no attention must be paid to it. But the compromissarii must follow the common rules of election and, of course, observe the trimestre.

The fourth rule excludes electing oneself. If only one compromissarius is chosen he cannot elect himself. But there may be several compromissarii, an example of which is stated in the Decretals[79]: Seven were compromissarii to elect a dean of the chapter; three chose one of the seven and the other three chose another, who was not one of the seven. Pope Innocent decided that the former was elected if he consented to his election and there was no canonical impediment. Under the new Code this is impossible, because the candidate would not be allowed to accede to the votes given for him. But if four votes of the seven, not counting that of the elected candidate, would fall upon the same person, that person would be legitimately elected. Thus, also, in the case of three compromissarii casting two votes for the third compromissarius, the latter would be elected if there were no obstacle to invalidate his election.

77 Cf. cc. 32 f., X, I, 6.
78 Cf. c. 52, X, I, 6.
79 C. 33, X, I, 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 173

Cessat compromissum et ius eligendi redit ad compromittentes:

1.° Revocatione a collegio facta, re integra;

2.° Non secuta aut non servata aliqua conditione compromisso apposita;

3.° Electione absoluta, si fuerit nulla.

Canon 173 decides when the compromise may be repeated, and when it ceases. The lawful electors may recall the compromise as long as it has not taken a legal turn (re integra). The legal turn has commenced, according to the old law,[80] which is not changed in this regard, when the compromissarii have repaired to a separate place or room and begun to treat of the person to be elected.

The right of electing returns to the original electors:

a) If any condition is not fulfilled by the compromissarii, for instance, if the time set for the election elapses [81] or if an unfit (indignus) candidate is elected. The non-observance of any reasonable condition which is not against the common law, deprives the compromissarii of the right of election, which consequently returns to the legitimate electors, not to the superior, because the Code explicitly says: "ius eligendi redit ad compromittentes."

b) If the compromissarii have made an election, but this is void for any reason, e. g., the unfitness of the candidate elected, the right of electing returns to the original electors.

The question may arise whether religious communities

80 C. 30, X, I, 6.

81 C. 37, 6°, I, 6; but the canon states that the right of electing passes to the superior, as the canonists taught; cfr. Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 93, and others, but this is rejected by the new Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may employ the compromise. The answer is yes, because the Code admits it in general terms. Hence, if the Constitutions contain nothing to the contrary, a religious community may elect a superior by compromise.

THE NUMBER OF VOTES REQUIRED

CAN. 174

Is electus habeatur et a collegii praeside proclametur, qui requisitum suffragiorum numerum retulerit, ad normam can. 101, § 1, n. 1.

The one who has received the number of votes required under can. 101, § 1, n. 1, is elected and must be proclaimed by the presiding officer.

The canon referred to states that an absolute majority of votes is required to carry an election.

EFFECT OF THE ELECTION

CAN. 175

Electio illico intimanda est electo, qui debet saltem intra octiduum utile a recepta intimatione manifestare utrum electioni consentiat, an eidem renuntiet; secus omne ius ex electione quaesitum amittit.

The result of an election must be immediately made known to the one elected, who is obliged within eight days (utiles from the date of notice) to signify his intention of accepting or not accepting the election. If he fails to do this, he forfeits every right acquired by the election.

Now-a-days the means of communication are so swift and convenient that the result of an election may be made known to the one elected more rapidly than in former times, wherefore the Code uses the term illico, without,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

however, determining its exact meaning. Formerly intimation was to be made quam citius,[82] which was interpreted as meaning eight days from the date of election.[83]

Of course, the notice of election should be sent immediately to the person elected, because illico means without delay, and from the spot or place where the election was held. Formerly the person elected was given one month for deliberation,[84] now he is given only eight days. Still the new law leaves some margin, in as far as the eight days are utiles or equitable. Therefore if an unforeseen impediment, over which a man has no control (e. g., sickness or delay of trains) would arise, this delay would not affect the right acquired by election. But if malice or negligence caused a delay, the right accruing from election would be ipso iure forfeited.

Can. 176

§ 1. Si electus renuntiaverit, omne ius ex electione quaesitum amittit, etsi renuntiationis eum postea poeniteat; sed rursus eligi potest; collegium autem intra mensem a cognita renuntiatione ad novam electionem procedere debet.

§ 2. Acceptatione electionis electus, si confirmatione non egeat, plenum ius statim obtinet; secus, non acquirit nisi ius ad rem.

§ 3. Ante acceptatam confirmationem ipsi praetextu electionis non licet sese immiscere administrationi officii sive in spiritualibus sive in temporalibus, et actus ab eo forte positi nulli sunt.

Every man is free to accept or refuse an election. Religious are no exception. Hence not even the superior

82 C. 6, 6°, I, 6.
83 C. 16, 6°, I, 6, § Caeterum.
84 Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can compel a religious to accept an election, because the freedom to refuse office has not been taken away by profession.[85] But once having refused, he has lost his rights, nor can they be regained by a change of mind. Therefore, when an elected person refuses to accept, the electors must proceed to another election. At this second election the one who was first elected, but refused, and subsequently changed his mind, may again be elected.

Paragraph 2 mentions the right following acceptation. This right is either in re or ad rem. A right in re creates the faculty and power to dispose of a thing as one's own; thus a proprietor may do with his property as he pleases, unless the law intervenes. A ius ad rem is a right which creates a claim to a thing, or causes it to become one's own (ut res fiat sua), though he does not yet have it in his hands nor can dispose of it freely. One elected to office obtains a ius ad rem if the election needs ratification by a superior. But if the very act of election and acceptation puts him in possession of the office or prelacy, he has a ius in re, or an unimpeached right to administer the office.

§ 3 explains what one who has been elected and accepted, cannot do if the election requires confirmation. Since he is not yet the proprietor or possessor of the office, he cannot interfere with its spiritual or temporal administration, and consequently, even if he has been administrator ad tempus or procurator, he has to abstain from acts of jurisdiction. However, we believe that common acts of buying and selling and administrative routine affairs, provided nothing is done detrimental to the church or community, may be performed by such administrators-elect.[86] But strictly legal acts, such as appointment to

[85] Engel, I, 6, n, 46.

[86] Cf. Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 47; Engel, I, 6, n. 51, who even makes some allowance for provinces remote from Rome.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google offices or presentation to parishes, and acts of jurisdiction, such as giving faculties for hearing confessions, inflicting ecclesiastical censures, absolutions and dispensations, would be of no juridical effect (actus ab eis forte positi nulli sunt).

CAN. 177

§ 1. Electus, si electio confirmatione indigeat, saltem intra octiduum a die acceptatae electionis confirmationem a competente Superiore petere per se vel per alium debet; secus omni iure privatur, nisi probaverit se a petenda confirmatione iusto impedimento fuisse detentum.

§ 2. Superior, si electum repererit idoneum, et electio ad normam iuris fuerit peracta, nequit confirmationem denegare.

§ 3. Confirmatio in scriptis dari debet.

§ 4. Recepta confirmatione, electus obtinet plenum ius in officio, nisi aliud in iure caveatur.

This canon states the necessity of ratification, which is evident because the legitimate superior's power cannot be set aside. Ratification must be sought under penalty of forfeiting the rights accruing from election. Under the Decretals [87] this penalty was so severe that it rendered a person incapable of obtaining any office in future. This is abolished by the new Code. If the elect can prove, by at least one trustworthy eyewitness, or other lawful proof, e. g., the testimony of a physician, that he was prevented from asking ratification, the rights acquired by the election remain intact.

The competent superior, from whom ratification must be demanded, is the one next in authority.[88] Thus a pro-

87 C. 17, X, I, 6; c. 5, 6°, I, 6; Engel, I, 6, n. 51.

88 Engel, I, 6, n. 50.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vincial would have to ask the general's confirmation; bishops are confirmed by the Holy See. Religious orders and congregations mostly state in their constitutions who has the right of confirming elections.[89] Superiors of diocesan institutions are ratified by the respective Ordinary.[90] The Code says (§ 2) that a superior is not at liberty to refuse ratification arbitrarily. This does not apply to the Supreme Pontiff, who, unless bound by a concordat, may, even without reason, refuse to confirm the elect.[91] Other superiors are obliged to ratify the election if the person elected is fit and the election was valid, because an election and its acceptance produce a right.[92]

Ratification, which must be given in writing (§ 3), creates a full right to the office, unless consecration or benediction is required to enable one to exercise pontifical functions. Abbots regular, in order to be allowed the exercise of pontifical functions, must be blessed by the diocesan bishop within three months from the date of their election.[93]

DEVOLUTION

CAN. 178

Si electio intra praescriptum tempus peracta non fuerit, aut collegium iure eligendi privetur in poenam, libera officii provisio ad eum Superiorem devolvitur, a quo confirmanda esset electio vel cui ius providendi successive competit.

If an election was not performed within the term prescribed, or if the electors were legitimately deprived of the right of election, the right to appoint one to the vacant office devolves on the superior who would otherwise ratify 89 These Constitutions are admitted by the Code, can. 507, §1.

90 Can. 506, § 4.
91 Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 28.
92 C. 3, X, I, 6.
93 Can. 625; cf. cc. 325, 964, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the election, or on the one who is next as to the right of appointment.

The time prescribed in can. 161 is three months from the date when notice was given of the vacancy.[94] Therefore the electoral college loses the right of election after said term has expired. It may, moreover, forfeit the right by electing one unfit for the office, or by setting aside the substantial form required by law.[95] In such cases the right of election devolves either on the superior who has the right of ratifying the election, which is the case in religious communities, or on the superior who is called upon to supply the negligence of an inferior, as happens in cathedral chapters.[96] The case may arise that one who is elected suffers from a hidden impediment, for instance, illegitimacy unknown to the electors, or at least to the majority of them. Is such a one allowed to accept the election? If he can decline it without defamation or losing his reputation, he is bound to do so. But if he is reasonably afraid of losing his good name, or if the church or community would suffer by his refusal, he is allowed to accept, but should ask secretly for a dispensation.[97]

ART III

POSTULATION

CAN. 179

§ 1. Si electioni illius quem electores aptiorem putent ac praeferant, impedimentum obest, super quo dispensari possit ac soleat, suis ipsi suffragiis eum possunt, nisi aliud iure caveatur, a competente Superiore

94 Cc. 7, 41, X, I, 6.
95 C. 18, 6°, I, 6.
96 Cf. cc. 315, X, I, 10; cc. 2, 12, X, III, 8; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 16, De Ref.; c. 18, 6°, I, 6, reserves that right to the Roman Pontiff with regard to cathedral chapters.
97 Engel, I, 6, n. 45.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

postulare, etsi agatur de officio, pro quo electus confirmatione non egeat.

§ 2. Compromissarii postulare nequeunt, nisi id in mandato aut compromisso fuerit expressum.

CAN. 180

§ 1. Ut postulatio vim habeat, pro ea stet oportet maior suffragiorum pars, imo, si cum electione concurrat, saltem duae tertiae partes requiruntur.

§ 2. Suffragium pro postulatione exprimi debet per verbum: postulo, aut aequivalens; formula: eligo vel postulo, aut aequipollens, valet pro electione, si impedimentum non exsistat, secus pro postulatione.

CAN. 181

§ 1. Postulatio saltem intra octiduum mitti debet ad Superiorem ad quem pertinet electionem confirmare, si facultatem habeat ab impedimento dispensandi; secus ad Romanum Pontificem aut ad alium habentem facultatem.

§ 2. Si intra praescriptum tempus postulatio missa non fuerit, ipso facto nulla evadit et electores pro ea vice privantur iure eligendi aut postulandi, nisi probent se a mittenda postulatione iusto detentos fuisse impedimento.

§ 3. Per postulationem nullum ius postulato acquiritur et Superiori licet eandem repellere.

§ 4. Praesentatam Superiori postulationem electores revocare non possunt, nisi Superiore consentiente.

CAN. 182

§ 1. Reiecta a Superiore postulatione, ius eligendi ad collegium redit, nisi electores scienter illum postula-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verint qui tali detinetur impedimento in quo nequeat aut non soleat dispensari; tunc enim provisio ad Superiorem pertinet.

§ 2. Quod si postulatio admissa fuerit, id significetur postulato, qui respondere debet ad normam can. 175.

§ 3. Si eam acceptet, plenum ius in officio eidem statim acquiritur.

These four canons treat of what is called postulation, i. e., "a petition directed to the competent superior or dignitary."[98] This is styled postulatio solemnis or proper, to distinguish it from simple postulation, which, according to all authors, takes place when an inferior, say a religious or clergyman of another diocese, is to be elected to a higher office in a monastery or diocese not his own. We are not concerned so much about the bishops of our country, as about religious communities, although it is evident that a bishop of one diocese should be postulated, not elected, for another diocese, because, as the authors say, a spiritual tie between the bishop and his diocese induces a mystic marriage, which can be dissolved only by the Roman Pontiff.[99] But this is not the case with a religious, who is, for instance, elected abbot or superior of another monastery, or even bishop of a diocese. In the first case, viz., if he is elected to another monastery than that of his profession, he needs only the permission of his immediate superior and must be of the same religious order. If he is elected bishop of a diocese, he needs no permission but that of his superior, because it is he who is entitled to give permission to leave the monastery.[100] Hence there

[98] Engel, I, 5, n. 1.

[99] C, 4, X, I, 7, de translatione Episcopi.

[100] Cc. 27, 36, 6°, I, 6; c. 1, Clem. I, 3; a religious not abbot.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is not the faintest idea of postulation in the proper sense to be perceived in the Decretals. Such a religious, if he is endowed with the necessary permission either before (conditionally) or after election is simply elected, not postulated.

But what about an abbas regiminis ac benedictus? May he be elected or must he be postulated if called to govern another monastery? Some authors [101] insist vehemently upon the spiritual marriage between an abbot and his monastery and maintain that in such a case postulation is required. However, the text quoted in 6° does not favor that opinion, and the sententia communis is against it.[102] Neither can we see much difference between perpetual and temporary abbots as to the spiritual relation between superior and monastery or understand how the blessing contributes to the spiritual tie. Hence, as long as no better reasons are brought forward, we cling to the old law and to the sententia communis which tells us that abbots can be elected in the strict sense.

Postulation in the proper sense is required if the person elected suffers from an ecclesiastical impediment, for instance, of age or lack of the necessary number of years in the order,[103] or illegitimate birth. In such cases the competent superior to be asked for a dispensation is the Apostolic See, unless the necessary faculty has been imparted to the superior general of an order or to an Apostolic legate.[104]

The next canon (180) states the requisites of postulation. The first is that an absolute majority of the votes

101 Molitor, Religiosi Juris Capita Selecta, 1909, p. 450.

102 Thus Passerini, De Electione, c. 24, n. 38; Engel, I, 5, n. 9; Reiffenstuel, I, 5, n. 6; Wernz, l. c., II, n. 394; Aichner, § 82, 2.

103 Cf. can. 504; can. 507, § 3, admits postulation only in extraordinary cases, but insinuates nothing as to the necessity of postulating abbots.

104 C. 36, X, 6°, I, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cast is required for postulation in general. However, if a portion of the electors should wish to elect, e. g., a person without an impediment, while another prefers a candidate with an impediment, the postulantes must form two-thirds of the electoral college,[105] and the formula used should simply be, "ego postulo," not "eligo et postulo," because such a formula is uncertain.[106] The Code, however, admits the term "eligo vel postulo" in case the candidate suffers from no canonical impediment.

Canon 181 mentions the time within which postulation must be presented to the superior and the effects which it produces. As to the former the Code is explicit. Concerning the latter, it must be remembered that the admission of postulation is a mere favor on the part of the superior, who, therefore, if he is supreme (i. e., the Sovereign Pontiff) needs to give no reason for rejecting the postulation, whereas an inferior does. This is precisely what § 3 says. It follows that mere postulation, until fully admitted, creates no right whatever to the office, because, as stated, the admission of postulation is a favor.[107] Another consequence is that postulation depends upon the admission of the superior and creates no right for the postulatus, but consists in this that postulants may change their mind as long as postulation is not as yet in the hands of the superior.[108] But once it has reached the superior, postulation can no longer be changed, lest the superior would be derided. Of course, if the superior consents to a change, postulation may be changed or turned into election.

The last canon (182) speaks of rejection and admission

105 C. 40, X, I, 6.

106 C. un. 6°, I, 5.

107 Reiffenstuel (I, 5, n. 72) is inclined, but certainly not logically or canonically, to hold that there is an obligation of admitting postulation if the public welfare or utility are at stake.

108 C. 4, X, I, 5; Engel, h. t., n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of postulation. If postulation is rejected, for whatever reason, the electors regain their right of again electing or postulating. However, if they have knowingly postulated one afflicted with a canonically indispensable impediment, the postulants have, for the time being (not for future elections) forfeited the right of election, and the superior to whom the postulation was directed is free to appoint a person of his own choice.[109] Admission of postulation creates the same right as election and confirmation together, i. e., admission produces a ius in re, provided the postulatus gives his consent within eight days from the date of the notice received of the admitted postulation. The acceptance must be intimated to the postulants as well as to the superior who admitted the postulation, although the right to the office or prelacy takes full effect from the moment one accepts. Hence, whatever pertains to administration and jurisdiction he may now perform, but if consecration or benediction is needed, he cannot exercise pontifical rights.

A last question to be solved concerns titular bishops. Must they be postulated? The Decretals [110] seem to favor the assumption that, although they have no flock and no clergy, such bishops are bound to their titular church, and hence need a special dispensation to transfer them to a residential cathedral church. It follows that titular bishops cannot properly be elected, but must be postulated. This, however, must and cannot be applied to titular abbots, much less to such as enjoy only the privilege of pontificals.

109 Cc. 1–3, X, I, 5.

110 Cf. Reiffenstuel, I, 5, n. 40 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

LOSS OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES

CAN. 183

§ 1. Amittitur officium ecclesiasticum renuntiatione, privatione, amotione, translatione, lapsu temporis praefiniti.

§ 2. Resoluto quovis modo iure Superioris a quo fuerat concessum, officium ecclesiasticum non amittitur, nisi lex aliud caveat aut nisi in concessione habeatur clausula: ad beneplacitum nostrum, vel alia aequipollens.

An ecclesiastical office is lost by resignation, privation, removal, transfer and lapse of time.

Although the superior who has made the appointment goes out of office, the appointee does not lose his office, unless otherwise provided by law or unless the grant was made with the clause: "ad beneplacitum nostrum" or a similar one.

After the legislator has stated how an office is acquired, either by free appointment or election, he now proceeds to show how it may be lost. In § 1 he completely (taxative) enumerates the ways by which an office may be lost. In § 2 he removes, as it were, a doubt concerning the tenure of office, as if it ceased in consequence of the deposition or resignation of the grantor. This, the Code says, is the case only (a) if the office was granted under a clause signifying the will of the grantor

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to confer it "ad beneplacitum nostrum," or "durante nostro pontificatu," or (b) if the law itself states that the office ceases with the superior's authority; thus, e. g., the Roman Congregations and tribunals enjoy only a limited power during the vacancy of the Holy See,[1] the jurisdiction of the vicar-general ceases with the cessation of his Ordinary's office,[2] etc. Otherwise an office is supposed to be given permanently or not to be revoked by the cessation of the grantor's office, e. g., that of legate.[3] After stating this general principle, the Code treats of the several ways in which an office may be lost.

RESIGNATION

CAN. 184

Quisque sui compos potest officio ecclesiastico iusta de causa renuntiare, nisi speciali prohibitione renuntiatio sit ipsi interdicta.

CAN. 185

Renuntiatio ex metu gravi, iniuste incusso, dolo aut errore substantiali vel simoniace facta, irrita est ipso iure.

CAN. 186

Renuntiatio, ut valida sit, fieri debet a renuntiante aut scripto aut oretenus coram duobus testibus aut etiam per procuratorem speciali mandato munitum; et scriptum renuntiationis documentum in Curia deponatur.

These three canons determine the objective requisites of resignation.

1 Can. 241; Pius X, "Vacante Sede Apostolica."

2 Can. 371.

3 C. 2, 6°, I, 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The person who resigns must be in full possession of his mental faculties — compos sui — i. e., he must be able to perform a human act. Besides there must be a reason for resigning, else many might leave their charges and disturbance ensue. The valid reasons for resigning an office are stated in the Decretals,[4] as well as in the Constitution of Pius V, "Quanta Ecclesia," April 1, 1568. They are as follows:[5]

Advanced age, which may vary and should be estimated according to prudent judgment.

Sickness, bodily disease and corporal deformity which prevent one from securely, decently, and satisfactorily performing the duties connected with the pastoral office, e. g., paralysis, gout, epilepsy, etc.

Consciousness of a crime and censure with one's reputation at stake.

Deadly or lasting enmities between a pastor and a large part of his flock; to which category also scandal, even without fault, may be referred.

Receiving another office incompatible with the one already possessed.

Finally, entrance and profession in a religious order.[6]

These are the reasons admitted by law for resigning an office. Though some authors maintain that said Decretals applied only to bishops and that the Constitution of Pius V was not everywhere received,[7] the Code by requiring in general some just reason, certainly intends to apply that enactment to each and every office to be 4 C. 10, X, I, 9, of which the summary repeats them in the following verse:

"Debilis, ignarus, male conscius, irregularis, quem mala plebs adit, dans scandala cedere potest."

5 Cf. Barbosa, Ius Eccl. Univ., l. III, c. 15, nn. 99 ff (ed. Lugd., 1660, II, 279 f.).

6 Bened. XIV, "Ex quo," Jan. 14, 1747 (Bull., Prati, II, 156 ff.).

7 Engel, I, 9, n. 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

resigned But it must be added that one or the other of the reasons named would suffice.

A novice is prevented by law from resigning an office which he held before entering religion.[8]

The person who resigns must be entirely free. Hence any grievous fear inflicted by one who has no right to bring pressure upon an office-holder, would render the resignation void.[9] This does not, of course, apply to the fear threatened by the legitimate superior, e. g., a bishop who has a reason for forcing a clergyman to resign.

Physical violence, especially if exercised by laymen, would invalidate a resignation.[10] The same holds good of fraud or error, e. g., the promise of a pension or sum of money, or a fraudulent description of conditions which supposedly exist in a parish, as also any simoniacal pact, either real or verbal. All these would render a resignation invalid ipso jure.[11]

Can. 186 establishes the form in which resignation must be made; viz., either in writing or verbally in the presence of two witnesses. This is a very reasonable rule, for it not only safeguards liberty but also prevents litigation.

If the resignation is handed in by a procurator furnished with a special mandate, he must observe all the conditions of the mandate, and besides, we believe, must obey the rules established in this canon, viz., submit the resignation in writing or bring two witnesses. As long as the mandate is not expressly revoked and the repeal received by the procurator, he may proceed with the resignation.[12] The procurator may be a layman.[13]

8 Can. 568.
9 C. 5, X, I, 9; c. 4, X, I, 40.
10 C. 2, X, I, 40.
11 Bened. XIV, "In sublimi," Aug. 29, 1741 (Bull., Prati, I, 98 f.), c. 4, X, I, 35; c. 2, X, V, 3.
12 C. un. Clem. I, 4.
13 C. 1, 6°, I, 19, de procurat;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 187

§ 1. Renuntiatio generatim, ut valeat, ei fieri debet a quo est acceptanda, vel, si acceptatione non egeat, a quo clericus officium accepit vel qui eiusdem locum tenet.

§ 2. Quare si officium per confirmationem, admissionem vel institutionem collatum fuerit, renuntiatio fieri debet Superiori ad quem de iure ordinario confirmatio, admissio vel institutio spectat.

Resignation being a voluntary act, which must be accepted by a competent superior, requires that it be presented to that superior, who is the real grantor of the office. Note, however, that, although acceptance is said to be an essential part of resignation, there are cases in which it is not required. Thus the Roman Pontiff may abdicate without the consent of the College of Cardinals.[14] Besides any one may resign an office to which he has only the ius ad rem, e. g., to which he has been elected but not yet ratified. Furthermore if two contend for an office, one may waive the claim; and, lastly, a clergyman who is not a bishop may resign in order to enter a religious order.[15]

In all those cases in which acceptance is required, the resignation must be presented to the one who has conferred the office or to his representative (successor). Hence bishops (and abbots) must present their resignation to the Pope.

Minor offices are resigned into the hands of the bishop or his coadjutor, if the latter has full power,[16] of the Barbosa, Jus Eccl. Univ., l. III, n. 121 f.

14 C. I, 6°, I, 7.

15 Barbosa, l. c., III, n. 5 f.; Reiffenstuel, I, 9, n. 16 f.

16 Barbosa, l. c., n. 11.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vicar-capitular,[17] but not of the vicar-general unless he has a special mandate.[18]

§ 2 follows out the principle laid down in the preceding paragraph; for the one who actually confers the benefice is the one who ratifies the election, who admits postulation, and who confers the office. Hence neither the electors nor the postulantes, nor the lay or ecclesiastical patron who presents a candidate for an office, have the power to accept his resignation.[19]

Besides express or explicit resignation, both the old and the new law admit also a

TACIT RESIGNATION,

which is brought about and signified by a fact, especially one upon which the law itself has decreed the loss of an ecclesiastical office.

CAN. 188

Ob tacitam renuntiationem ab ipso iure admissam quaelibet officia vacant ipso facto et sine ulla declaratione, si clericus:

1.° Professionem religiosam emiserit, salvo, circa beneficia, praescripto can. 584;

2.° Intra tempus utile iure statutum vel, deficiente iure, ab Ordinario determinatum, de officio provisus illud adire neglexerit;

3.° Aliud officium ecclesiasticum cum priore incompatibile acceptaverit et eiusdem pacificam possessionem obtinuerit;

4.° A fide catholica publice defecerit;

5.° Matrimonium, etiam civile tantum, ut aiunt, contraxerit;

17 Can. 455, § 2.
18 Cf. can. 455, § 3; Barbosa, l. c.
19 Barbosa, l. c., n. 10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6.° Contra praescriptum can. 141, § 1 militiae saeculari nomen sponte dederit;

7.° Habitum ecclesiasticum propria auctoritate sine iusta causa deposuerit, nec illum, ab Ordinario monitus, intra mensem a monitione recepta resumpserit;

8.° Residentiam, qua tenetur, illegitime deseruerit et receptae Ordinarii monitioni, legitimo impedimento non detentus, intra congruum tempus ab Ordinario praefinitum, nec paruerit nec responderit.

This canon presumes resignation, to which it applies the effect which certain facts are supposed to produce under the law. This effect is vacancy of the office held, whether adduced by privation, as punishment,[20] or simply due to the incompatibility of certain offices with the newly chosen state of life or other offices. Hence

(1) By religious profession (even simple) a man forfeits all parochial offices within one year from the date of said profession, and all other offices[21] within three years.

(2) The tempus utile within which the bishop must go to his diocese is four months from the date of confirmation;[22] the parish priest has to commence his administration within the time prescribed by the Ordinary. Note the phrase "tempus utile," which implies that a legitimate impediment or ignorance of the date fixed for taking hold of the office would excuse.

(3) What incompatible offices are was said above; by the very acceptance of one such office the others become vacant.[23]

20 Really, it would be privation, but the Code presumes resignation ipso facto.

21 Can. 584; c. 4, 6°, III, 14.

22 Can. 333; can. 238, § 2; c. 14, 6°, I, 6.

23 Can. 156; c. 54, X, I, 6; c. 3, 6°, I, 16; Trid., Sess. 7, c. 4; Sess. 24, c. 17, De Ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(4) Defection from the Catholic faith, if public, deprives one of all ecclesiastical offices he may hold;[24] not, however, mere schism, if unconnected with heresy.

(5) Marriage, if contracted by a public act, either validly by such as are in minor orders only, or attempted by clerics constituted in higher orders, is tantamount to giving up office.[25] Hence from the very moment a marriage is either contracted or attempted, the offices held by a clergyman would be vacant, and restitution of the revenues derived therefrom would begin from the moment of the marriage.

(6) Enlisting in the army has been touched above.[26]

(7) Doffing the ecclesiastical garb is tantamount to resignation if ostentatious and scandalous and connected with contumacy towards the Ordinary.

(8) As to residence, the necessary explanations are given under the respective canons.[27] We only repeat that these cases, as set forth by our canon, do not really imply a resignation, but that the law supposes and presumes resignation, which therefore is an improper renunciation or legally presumed resignation.

CAN. 189

§ 1. Superiores sine iusta et proportionata causa renuntiationes ne acceptent.

§ 2. Renuntiationem Ordinarius loci intra mensem vel admittat vel reiiciat.

CAN. 190

§ 1. Officium, renuntiatione legitime facta et acce-

24 C. 9, X, V, 7.
25 C. 2, Dist. 28; cc. 10, 13, Dist. 32; cc. 1, 3, 5, X, III, 3.
26 Can. 141.
27 Can. 143 (in general); can. 338 (bishops); can. 465 (pastors).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ptata, vacat postquam renuntianti significata est acceptatio.

§ 2. Renuntians in officio permaneat donec de Superioris acceptatione certum nuntium acceperit.

CAN. 191

§ 1. Semel legitime facta renuntiatione, non datur amplius poenitentiae locus, licet renuntians possit officium ex alio titulo consequi.

§ 2. Acceptata renuntiatio tempestive nota fiat iis qui aliquod ius in officii provisionem habent.

The legislator admonishes (but under no invalidating clause) superiors not to accept a resignation without just and proportionate reason, as insisted upon by Pius V.[28] Besides, in order not to protract vacancies, acceptance must be notified within one month. With the same end in view Gregory XIII, by his Constitution "Humano vix iudicio" (Jan. 5, 1584), had prescribed that all resignations should be published within six or nine months. This Constitution is modified by the Code, which requires not publication, but notification, to be made within one month.

The effect of the notified acceptance of a resignation consists in the vacancy of the office resigned.[29] Therefore, as soon as the resignans has received official notice that his resignation is accepted, he is free from all obligations connected with the office, but also deprived of all rights, material and spiritual, pertaining thereto.[30]

The last canon on resignation states that if a resignation has once been accepted, it is not rendered invalid by 28 Cc. 1, 5, 9, 10, X, I, 9; "Quanta Ecclesia," 1568, § 3.

29 Cc. 3, 12, X, I, 9; c. 6, 6°, I, 3.

30 Barbosa, Jus Eccl. Univ., III, c. 15, nn. 148 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

regret or a change of mind on the part of the resignans, since such a step is supposed to be taken with due deliberation and for adequate reasons.[31] However, if a man who has resigned an office is again presented or elected or appointed to the same, the presentation, election, appointment or investment would constitute a new title. In that case, however, precedence and other privileges would date only from the second appointment.[32] Thus, e. g., a prelate who resigned his office and obtained it anew would hold rank of seniority only from the date of the second appointment, unless the mere order would be decisive.[33]

DEPRIVATION OF OFFICE

CAN. 192

§ 1. Privatio officii incurritur sive ipso iure, sive ex facto legitimi Superioris.

§ 2. Si agatur de officio inamovibili, Ordinarius nequit clericum eodem privare, nisi mediante processu ad normam iuris.

§ 3. Si de amovibili, privatio decerni ab Ordinario potest ex qualibet iusta causa, prudenti eius arbitrio, etiam citra delictum, naturali aequitate servata, sed certum procedendi modum sequi minime tenetur, salvo canonum praescripto circa paroecias amovibiles; privatio tamen effectum non habet, nisi postquam fuerit a Superiore intimata; et ab Ordinarii decreto datur recursus ad Sedem Apostolicam, sed in devolutivo tantum.

Deprivation is incurred either by law or by the decision of a legitimate superior. A cleric who holds an irre-

31 Cc. 3, 6, 12, X, I, 9.
32 Reiffenstuel, I, 9, n. 42.
33 This agrees with St. Benedict's Rule, ch. 29.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

movable office can be deprived of it only upon trial instituted according to law. One holding a removable office may be deprived of it by his Ordinary without having committed a crime, for any just reason. No special procedure is required in such cases unless the cleric is a removable pastor, when the Ordinary has to comply with the canonical norms. Deprivation takes effect only after the subject has been notified by his superior. From the Ordinary's decision recourse may be had to the Apostolic See, but in devolutivo only.

Deprivation is a penalty, and hence the present canon really belongs to the penal law. However, since the legislator enumerated deprivation among the modes of losing an office in can. 183, § 1, it was necessary to deal with the subject here.

§ 1 states how deprivation is brought about, viz., by law or by a judicial sentence. The law states the reasons for deprivation partly under the heading of tacit resignation (can. 188), partly in the fifth book.[84] There, too, it is stated when the judge may decree privation, and that he may inflict this penalty (for it is a vindictive penalty), for weighty reasons if the law is silent.

§ 2 and § 3 distinguish between irremovable and removable officials, and say that the former may not be deposed without an ecclesiastical trial (as described in Book IV). One holding a removable office is more easily deprived, unless that office is a pastorate, in which case the regulations laid down in the Code must be strictly followed.[85]

Of other offices one may be deprived, (a) even though he has committed no crime, (b) for a just reason, according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, who, 84 Can. 2298 ff. 85 Cf. cc. 2157–2161.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

however, (c) must follow the dictates of equity, although (d) he is not bound by any legal procedure.

As to (a), it was once generally held that only a crime (delictum publicum) could deprive a holder of his office; however, since the "welfare of the Church" came to be regarded as the "supreme law,"[86] the ancient rigor was relaxed and (b) any reason that satisfied the Ordinary was deemed sufficient to justify removal.

Which would be a sufficient reason? Comparing our Code[87] with the well-known decree "Maxima cura" (1910), we find that some of the reasons stated in the latter have been omitted. They are: serious neglect of pastoral duties, after one or two admonitions and in matters of importance, such as sick-calls, catechism class and preaching, the law of residence; disobedience to the injunctions of the Ordinary, after several admonitions, and in important matters, such as excessive familiarity with a certain person or family, cleanliness of the house of God, moderation in the exaction of taxes, etc. (pew-rent, collection). These reasons cover a large field and may enter into the Ordinary's judgment. Of course, it is evident that the other reasons stated in can. 2147, § 2 are also sufficient to remove an office holder.

Having, then, one of these reasons, the bishop is bound only by the dictates of natural equity, which means that merit and previous services to the diocese should be taken into consideration and some other office is available; for as long as a priest does not make himself culpably unworthy, he remains incardinated. Lastly, (d) in order to proceed to the act of removal the Ordinary need not employ any legal procedure (strepitus iudicii). After he has duly intimated his decision to the clergyman whom [86] S. C. Consist., "Maxima cura," Aug. 20, 1910. (A. Ap. S., II, 636).

[87] Can. 2147, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

he wishes to remove, the latter may have recourse to the Holy See,— if we mistake not to the S. C. Concilii,— but the effect of an appeal will be devolutive only, that is to say, the decision of the Ordinary holds good and the one deprived of office is really deposed and must conduct himself accordingly, i. e., neither take any part in the management of his former office nor cause trouble in the congregation or community, until a decision is given by the Roman Court.

Here the important question arises whether our so-called removable rectors in the U. S. fall under the category of those who must be removed according to cc. 2157–61, or whether they may be removed for the reasons described above and without trial. We premise that according to can. 454, § 3, all pastors ought to be irremovable, unless the bishop, compelled by special circumstances, deems it necessary to retain removable pastors. It is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, after having heard his consultors, to determine the character of the pastorate in his diocese. This premised, the answer of the S. C. Consist. of June 28, 1915, to the bishops of the United States[38] must decide our case. This answer is that removable rectors in the U. S. may be removed according to the good pleasure of the bishop, but that the latter, under the decrees of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, should not make use of this right except for weighty reasons and with due regard to the merits of his priests. The reason given for this decision is that "salus animarum suprema lex est," and that, according to the IInd and IIIrd Councils of Baltimore removable rectors are not equal to the desservants of France, but must be regarded as vicars of [38] Card. Gasparri alleges this decision, but the date needs correction.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

their Ordinaries and hence are amovibiles ad nutum.[39]

TRANSFERS

CAN. 193

§ 1. Translatio ab uno ad aliud officium ecclesiasticum ab eo tantum perfici potest, qui ius habet tum acceptandi renuntiationem, tum removendi a primo officio et promovendi ad alterum.

§ 2. Ad translationem, si de consensu clerici fiat, quaelibet iusta causa sufficit; si invito clerico, eadem fere causa requiritur idemque procedendi modus ac pro privatione, firmo praescripto can. 2162–2167, quod ad translationem attinet parochorum.

CAN. 194

§ 1. In translatione prius officium vacat cum clericus alterius possessionem canonice capit, nisi aliud a iure cautum sit vel a legitimo Superiore praescriptum.

§ 2. Reditus prioris officii translatus percipit, donec aliud occupaverit.

CAN. 195

Qui clericum ad officium elegerunt vel postulaverunt aut praesentaverunt, nequeunt eundem officio privare aut ab eo revocare seu amovere aut ad aliud transferre.

By transfer is understood an exchange of offices made with the consent of the legitimate superior. The transfer of bishops is dealt with in can. 430. Canons 193 sqq. treat of transfers in general. First mention is made of [39] A. Ap. S., 1915 (VII), p. 378ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the legitimate superior, who is entitled to transfer one from one office to another. In case of episcopal transfers the legitimate superior is the Holy See.[40] Formerly such transfers were made at synods.[41] The inferior clergy was transferred with the consent of the bishop.[42] The new Code requires that the superior who negotiates the transfer must enjoy the right of accepting resignations as well as the right of removal and promotion. Hence it is evident that, concerning minor offices, it is the bishop who is entitled to make transfers, not those who have the right of presentation (patroni) or election.

However, transfers, like resignations, should not be made without reason, because, unless there is a promotion to a better office, transfers are generally looked upon as odious and degrading. Hence § 2 justly requires a reason, but also distinguishes between voluntary and involuntary transfers. The former may be made at the express wish of the office-holder. For instance, a pastor advanced in years, or in poor health, or beset by serious troubles, may ask for a transfer to another parish, or even to the post of assistant.

Here the question arises whether parish priests may exchange places. The Code,[43] as far as we can see, touches that question only in connection with the exchange of benefices, but does not exclude an exchange of offices. Hence if made for reasons of utility or necessity, and with the consent of the Ordinary, such an exchange would be lawful.

An involuntary transfer, being odious and generally disgraceful,[44] not only requires reasons acknowledged by 40 C. 34, c. 7, q. 1 (Pseudo-Anterus); cc. 1–4, X, I, 7.

41 C. 37 (Carthag. IV), C. 27, q. 1.

42 Ibid.

43 Can. 1487 f.

44 Cf. Smith, Elements I, n. 394.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

law, but also the legal procedure prescribed in the IVth Book.[45]

Canon 194 mentions the date of vacancy, which commences from the time the other office is canonically taken possession of. The reason is that from the moment a priest holds one office, he is not supposed to hold another.[46] Hence the possessor of the former office is entitled to the revenues of the latter, until he has been actually introduced into the new office (corporalis immissio).

What canon 195 states is evident not only from the fact that patrons and electors do not actually confer the office, but also from can. 193, which supplements the latter canon.[47] This canon doubtless strikes at a custom which is not in keeping with ecclesiastical law, and therefore not to be imitated elsewhere, though in vogue, as we know, in Switzerland, where parishes in certain cantons claim the right to reelect their pastors or vote them out of office. The canon, though admitting the right of election, because this is not tantamount to conferring the office, justly rejects any interference with the removal or transfer of ecclesiastical office-holders.

[45] Can. 2162–2167; cf. c. 5, X, II, 19.

[46] C. 28, X, III, 5; c. 28, 6°, III, 4.

[47] C. 4, X, III, 38.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE V

ORDINARY AND DELEGATED POWER

Can. 196

Potestas iurisdictionis seu regiminis quae ex divina institutione est in Ecclesia, alia est fori externi, alia fori interni, seu conscientiae, sive sacramentalis sive extra-sacramentalis.

The legislator, after having stated the modes and means by which an office is acquired or lost, now turns to the natural foundation and end of every office: the power of jurisdiction. This, he says, is by divine institution twofold. For the Church, being a perfect society intended for the salvation of souls, must exercise (cfr. can. 100) a jurisdiction which chiefly looks to the welfare of society as such, and at the same time must wield a power which directly touches the realm of conscience. Thus the Apostles were endowed with spiritual power from above.[1] They as well as their successors were given the threefold power of making laws, deciding cases, and applying punishment. At the same time they also received the power of binding and loosing,[2] which is exercised in the Sacrament of Penance. Moreover, St. Paul solved cases outside a strictly speaking private or internal tribunal, yet touching the conscience of individuals, as in the case of the incestuous man of Corinth and the two blasphemers.[3] In addition, cases not necessarily connected with sacramental absolution may occur and have always occurred, e. g., the need of dispensing from vows, occult irregularities and impediments, absolving from occult censures, etc.[4] This, then, is the range of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in foro externo and in foro interno, which latter touches the conscience of individuals. The word jurisdiction is derived from ius dicendi, which means the right of taking cognizance of a case and deciding it according to law or equity.

1 Matt. 28, 18; cf. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. III, 1917, pp. 1 ff.

2 Matt. 16, 18; 18, 18; John 20, 21.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

In general, jurisdiction may be said to be "a public faculty to rule or govern others."[5] This definition covers both jurisdiction in foro externo and jurisdiction in foro interno, because, though the latter touches conscience, it is the public authority of the church which bestows that power over the consciences of the faithful.[6]

ORDINARY JURISDICTION

CAN. 197

§ 1. Potestas iurisdictionis ordinaria ea est quae ipso iure adnexa est officio; delegata, quae commissa est personae.

§ 2. Potestas ordinaria potest esse sive propria sive vicaria.

CAN. 198

§ 1. In iure nomine Ordinarii intelliguntur, nisi quis expresse excipiatur, praeter Romanum Pontifi-

3 I Cor., 5, 5; I Tim. I, 20.

4 Bouix, De Principiis Iuris Canonici, 1852, p. 524.

5 Reiffenstuel, I, 29, n. 3 (according to Pirhing): "Jurisdictio est potestas publica circa aliorum regimen seu gubernationem."

6 Berardi, Comment. in Jus Can. Univ., 1746, I, p. 12, well says that the faculties of preaching and absolving belong to the court of conscience, but the power of granting them belongs to the forum externum, because given for the public welfare.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cem, pro suo quisque territorio Episcopus residentialis, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius eorumque Vicarius Generalis, Administrator, Vicarius et Praefectus Apostolicus, itemque ii qui praedictis deficientibus interim ex iuris praescripto aut ex probatis constitutionibus succedunt in regimine, pro suis vero subditis Superiores maiores in religionibus clericalibus exemptis.

§ 2. Nomine autem Ordinarii loci seu locorum veniunt omnes recensiti, exceptis Superioribus religiosis.

The term ordinary in the Decretals[7] is an attribute of judges and means as much as official. Even archdeacons were said to enjoy ordinary jurisdiction in their respective districts.[8] But it also meant[9] the free or unhampered power of the bishops in their dioceses. Hence the term signifies a certain autonomy, but not complete independence. The root of that autonomy is the nature of the office;[10] wherefore our canon says that ordinary jurisdiction is attached to the office, not to the person; it grows out of the office as the fruit grows on the tree. By law it is attached to the office, because either of divine or human law (to which latter also belong privileges and customs)[11] certain office-holders enjoy jurisdiction in foro externo. Therefore, as soon as one is in full possession of an office, he has the power to exercise the jurisdiction appertaining to that office.

However, there is a distinction made by the Code:— ordinary power may be either proper or vicarious (propria vel vicaria). This somewhat modern distinction is not easily explained. Wernz says that jurisdiction

7 Cf. Tit. 31, lib. I.

8 Thomassin, P. I, l. II, c. 20, n. 7.

9 C. 1, X, I, 31.

10 L. 5, Dig. 2, 1 defines ordinary jurisdiction as possessed "ipso iure, non alieno beneficio."

11 Berardi, l. c., p. 19; Bouix, l. c., p. 529.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proper is that which naturally follows the existence of the Church as a perfect society and is exercised by the Church in her own name, as in her own forum (ut in foro suo), e. g., excommunication and penalties, whereas vicarious jurisdiction is that exercised by the Church in virtue of a special divine commission and in foro Dei, e. g., to declare the word of God infallibly, to remit sin, grant indulgences, solve vows, oaths, etc.[12] We must confess that we were always under the impression that the objects enumerated under vicarious power belonged to the Church as her proper domain. Where is the bishop's jurisdiction proper, and where does his vicarious power commence? If the latter signifies the so-called iurisdictio mandata, which is a delegated power for all cases (ad universitatem causarum),[13] we have delegation proper, as can. 199, § 3 plainly states. However, it may be that vicarious refers to vicar. A vicar differs from a delegate, inasfar as he takes the place of the ordinary (judge) and forms one tribunal with him, whereas a delegate is a distinct juridical person and has his own tribunal.[14] Here we have a more tangible distinction. If this is the meaning of the canon, the vicar-general would enjoy vicarious jurisdiction, whilst the bishop, within his sphere and territory, has jurisdiction proper. To assume that a bishop has but a vicarious power, derived from the pope, whose vicar he is, would offend against the divine institution of the Church.

The next canon (198) enumerates those who are comprised by the name of Ordinaries. They are: all who rule or govern a diocese or ecclesiastical district tantamount to a diocese: residential bishops, prelates nullius 12 Ius Decretal., II, p. 7 (1 ed.); Laurentius, Institut. Iuris Eccl., 1903, p. 36, n. 45, adopts the same explanation.

13 Reiffenstuel I, 29, n. 17.

14 Reiffenstuel, l. c., n. 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(sc. territorii), as well as their vicars-general; also Apostolic administrators, Apostolic vicars and prefects; the vicars-capitular or administrators during the vacancy of a see, be these such under the common law or according to approved constitutions;[15] finally, the higher superiors of exempt clerical orders of religious, i. e., the superior general, abbot primate, provincials and abbots, presidents as well as abbots of single exempt monasteries, and their legitimate locum tenentes or representatives.[16] These latter, however,— except in cases where they are at the same time prælati nullius — are not ordinarii loci, but simply Ordinaries. Hence, if a canon[17] says that a religious needs the permission of the Ordinarius, the superior of his community is understood; but if the Ordinarius loci is mentioned, the religious, though exempt, must obtain the permission from the diocesan bishop, e. g., in case of absence from a parish for some length of time.[18]

DELEGATED JURISDICTION

A delegated jurisdiction, according to can. 197, § 1, is one which has been commissioned to a person.[19] This is the cause or raison d'être of a juridiction which is not given by virtue of the office itself but accrues to a person by reason of a special commission which may be implied in the law or come directly from the competent authority (delegatio a iure, delegatio ab homine). Hence a delegated jurisdiction is not exercised in one's own name, but in the name and by commission of another.

CAN. 199

§ 1. Qui iurisdictionis potestatem habet ordina-

15 Can. 432, § 3.
16 Can. 488, 8°.
17 Cfr. can. 139, § 3.
18 Can. 465.
19 Cf. S. C. P., Nov. 8, 1882; S. O., Feb. 20, 1888.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

riam, potest eam alteri ex toto vel ex parte delegare, nisi aliud expresse iure caveatur.

§ 2. Etiam potestas iurisdictionis ab Apostolica Sede delegata subdelegari potest sive ad actum, sive etiam habitualiter, nisi electa fuerit industria personae aut subdelegatio prohibita.

§ 3. Potestas delegata ad universitatem negotiorum ab eo qui infra Romanum Pontificem habet ordinariam potestatem, potest in singulis casibus subdelegari.

§ 4. In aliis casibus potestas iurisdictionis delegata subdelegari potest tantummodo ex concessione expresse facta, sed articulum aliquem non iurisdictionalem etiam sine expressa commissione iudices delegati possunt subdelegare.

§ 5. Nulla subdelegata potestas potest iterum subdelegari, nisi id expresse concessum fuerit.

This canon treats of the relation of ordinary jurisdiction to delegation, and of the relation of the latter to subdelegation.

(1) The Pope may delegate his power of jurisdiction wholly or partially to another, except in certain matters. A bishop or Ordinary may also delegate his power to another, and our text is emphatic as to the extent of that delegation, stating that it may comprise the whole power (ex toto). Hence the former opinion of canonists,[20] that the whole jurisdiction of a bishop could not be delegated to another, because this would be tantamount to abdication, can no longer be held. Neither are any special qualifications laid down for a delegate. It used to be held that a delegatus papae had to be an ecclesiastical dignitary, e. g., a canon of a cathedral chapter, a prior 20 Cf. Reiffenstuel I, 29, n. 56; Santi-Leitner, I, 29, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conventualis (but not a prior claustralis).[21] Now, we believe, any Catholic priest in communion with the Holy See can be entrusted by the Pope with a delegation. The priestly character seems to be required, since the Code insists upon that in every instance, but we would not assert that the Sovereign Pontiff could not make an exception in favor of a cleric in minor orders, since it is acknowledged that he can delegate even laymen.[22]

(2) If the pope has chosen a delegate, either for a certain case or for all cases that may arise, this delegate may subdelegate another ecclesiastic,[23]— a layman could not be admitted in the case of subdelegation, this being the exclusive privilege of the Sovereign Pontiff,— and endow him with the delegated power, either habitually (i. e., without limit as to time or person or matter) or for a certain case. However, if the person delegated by the pope was chosen on account of qualities peculiar to himself and found in no one else, subdelegation is excluded. Whether such a personal choice was intended, must be gathered from the text of the document. As a rule, if the name of the person is placed first, and followed by that of the office or dignity, what canonists call industria personae is intended. The same holds if the writ says that the delegate must himself (ut ipse, per temetipsum) take cognizance of, and decide the case or cases for which he is appointed, or if the nature and circumstances of a case are fully known only to him, or if the matter concerns persons in high position.[24] Sometimes a writ of delegation contains a clause expressly prohibiting subdelegation.

§ 3 and § 4 mention delegates appointed by ecclesiastics

21 C. 11, 6°, I, 3; c. 2, Clem. I, 2.
22 C. 23, Dist. 63; c. 4, X, III, 8.
23 C. 62, X, II, 28.
24 Cc. 3, 43, X, I, 29; Santi-Leitner, I, 29, n. 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

inferior to the pope. Whoever is delegated for any purpose by a cardinal, or metropolitan, or bishop, or other Ordinary must first of all examine the document by which he is delegated, to ascertain whether he is to expedite affairs generally (ad universitatem negotiorum) or only a certain kind or number of cases. If he has what may be termed universal (delegated) jurisdiction (which may be the case, e. g., with coadjutor bishops), he may in turn subdelegate in particular cases,[25] for instance, one special matrimonial case, or the criminal case of a clergyman. If, however, no universal (delegated) jurisdiction has been conferred on him, the delegate needs a special and an express commission to authorize him to subdelegate others. Only incidental but not juridical acts, properly so called, may be subdelegated; thus, for instance, a delegate may, even without a special commission, entrust another clergyman with the reading or translation of documents if he needs help in that direction. But the summoning and hearing of witnesses, receiving of exceptions, interlocutory sentence, etc., are juridical acts which the delegate may not subdelegate to another except with special permission.[26]

The last paragraph prohibits subdelegation by a subdelegate, ne processus detur in infinitum.[27] Even if the original delegans would expressly permit such a subdelegation, it would not hold good in law.

INTERPRETATION OF JURISDICTION

CAN. 200

§ 1. Potestas iurisdictionis ordinaria et ad univer-

25 There is no foundation for the distinction made by Putzer (Com. in Fac. Ap., p. 38 f.) between universalitas and generalitas causarum; the Code excludes that.

26 C. 27, X, I, 29; Reiffenstuel, I, 29, n. 64 f.

27 C. 28, X, I, 29: exonerare malitiose nequeat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sitatem negotiorum delegata, late interpretanda est; alia quaelibet stricte; cui tamen delegata potestas est, ea quoque intelliguntur concessa, sine quibus eadem exerceri non posset.

§ 2. Ei, qui delegatum se asserit, incumbit onus probandae delegationis.

Ordinary and universal (delegated) jurisdiction may be interpreted broadly; all others must be interpreted strictly; however, even in delegated jurisdiction all those faculties are included without which the exercise thereof would be impossible.

Whoever claims to be delegated is obliged to prove the fact.

The difference between the two interpretations mentioned in § 1 consists in this, that ordinary and universal jurisdiction is considered favorable, whereas the other is taken to be odious; in other words, the broad interpretation is based upon one's own power, whilst the strictly delegated power depends on the consent of another, which may not be presumed. Hence if an Ordinary has doubts concerning his own power, he may nevertheless use it. But strictly delegated power must be neither extended nor restricted as to persons, number, species, or norm of procedure.[28]

That one who pretends to be a delegate must show his credentials, follows from the fact that delegation is an accident, which may not be presumed, but must be proved.[29]

28 C. 31, X I, 29; c. 1, Extrav. Comm. I, 3.

29 Reiffenstuel, I, 29, n. 52 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXTENT OF JURISDICTION

CAN. 201

§ 1. Potestas iurisdictionis potest in solos subditos directe exerceri.

§ 2. Iudicialis potestas tam ordinaria quam delegata exerceri nequit in proprium commodum aut extra territorium, salvis praescriptis can. 401, § 1, 881, § 2 et 1637.

§ 3. Nisi aliud ex rerum natura aut ex iure constet, potestatem iurisdictionis voluntariam seu non-iudicialem quis exercere potest etiam in proprium commodum, aut extra territorium exsistens, aut in subditum e territorio absentem.

The power of jurisdiction may be directly exercised only over subjects. Judicial power, ordinary as well as delegated, cannot as a rule be exercised for one's own benefit or outside of one's own territory.

It is otherwise with voluntary or non-judicial jurisdiction, which may be exercised in one's own favor outside one's territory, and on subjects absent from home.

As legislative power does not extend to such as are not subject to the community or society,[80] so judiciary power cannot be applied to those outside the jurisdiction of the judge. The limiting adverb "directly" in the text is important, especially for matrimonial cases. For although the Church does not judge those outside her own pale, she is entitled to make laws for, and judge, those who belong to her fold, and hence, while an impediment laid down by the Church may not directly bind an unbeliever or non-baptized person, yet the Catholic party is bound by the law and judgment of the Church, and conse-

80 Can. 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google quently, marriage being a bilateral contract, it cannot take place until the obstacle is removed.

The next two paragraphs suppose the distinction between contentious and voluntary jurisdiction. The former is exercised in judicial form even over such as do not seek the aid of the court (in nolentes, invitos), whereas the latter may be exercised without judiciary formalities, but only over persons who seek the benefit of jurisdiction of their own accord, e. g., absolution from censures, dispensation from irregularities and impediments, etc. Contentious or judicial jurisdiction (e. g., litigation between two office-holders) cannot be exercised by a judge, ordinary or delegated, upon his own person, because no one can judge his own case.[31] This principle does not, however, apply to the Sovereign Pontiff, because "prima sedes a nemine judicatur."[32]

Laws being territorial, and no judge having a right outside the territory allotted to him, none can exercise jurisdiction outside his district.[33] However, the Code makes two exceptions: in favor of absolution[34] and in favor of a judge who is expelled from his territory or forcibly prevented from exercising judiciary power.[35]

Voluntary jurisdiction, on the other hand, may be exercised (a) in one's own favor; thus, e. g., one who has received delegated power to dispense from fasting or abstinence may apply it to himself. Absolution from censures, however, if sacramental confession is required, must be applied by another, although a priest who has the faculty by delegation may subdelegate it to the priest who hears his confession. (b) The bishop may exercise

31 L. un. Cod. Just., III, 5; c. 18, X, II, 1.

32 Cf. 13, C. 9, q. 3.

33 C. 2, 6°, I, 2: "extra territorium ius dicenti non parebitur impune."

34 Can. 401, § 2; can. 881, § 2.

35 Can. 1637; — an example would be Clemens August of Cologne (1837).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

his ordinary or delegated power over his own subjects, even if he is hic et nunc outside his diocese, for the law does not restrict his power in this respect.[36]

Clerics who study in a seminary or university situated outside of their home diocese must apply for any dispensation needed to their own Ordinaries.

CAN. 202

§ 1. Actus potestatis iurisdictionis sive ordinariae sive delegatae collatae pro foro externo, valet quoque pro interno, non autem e converso.

§ 2. Potestas collata pro foro interno exerceri potest etiam in foro interno extra-sacramentali, nisi sacramentale exigatur.

§ 3. Si forum, pro quo potestas data est, expressum non fuerit, potestas intelligitur concessa pro utroque foro, nisi ex ipsa rei natura aliud constet.

This canon establishes the relation between the forum externum and the forum internum and hardly needs an explanation. Of the two fora the more intensive and extensive is the forum externum; and hence, though one may be absolved from censure (e. g., on account of a mixed marriage contracted against the law) in the court of conscience, he must nevertheless conduct himself like one under censure until relieved of the latter by public absolution. On the other hand, one who has received public absolution must be considered as restored to full communion. Thus, also, a marriage acknowledged to be null and void in foro interno cannot be so declared in foro externo unless external proofs are given.[37]

§ 2 states that power given for use in the court of [36] Otherwise Putzer, l. c., p. 71 f. [37] Putzer, l. c., p. 28 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conscience may be exercised outside the sacrament of penance, although this is not the usual and generally prescribed mode. Thus, e. g., dispensation from secret impediments, vows, or irregularities may be applied outside the confessional if the party concerned shrinks from confession.[38] But in cases where a dispensation can be imparted by the confessor (regular) only, confession is required.

DUTIES OF DELEGATES

CAN. 203

§ 1. Delegatus qui sive circa res sive circa personas mandati sui fines excedit, nihil agit.

§ 2. Hos tamen excessisse non intelligitur delegatus, qui alio modo ac deleganti placuerit, ea ad quae delegatus est, peragit, nisi modus ipse fuerit a delegante praescriptus tanquam conditio.

A delegate who exceeds the limit of his mandate, either concerning objects or persons, acts invalidly. But a delegate does not transgress the limit if he exercises his power in a manner (modus) other than that which would please the delegans, unless the manner of exercising the faculties conferred has been prescribed by the delegans as a condition of validity.

CAN. 204

§ 1. Quod quis Superiorem adit, inferiore praetermisso, non idcirco voluntaria suspenditur inferioris potestas, sive haec ordinaria fuerit sive delegata.

§ 2. Attamen rei ad Superiorem delatae ne se immisceat inferior, nisi ex gravi urgentique causa; et hoc in casu statim Superiorem de re moneat.

[38] Ibid., p. 27 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The voluntary jurisdiction, ordinary or delegated, of an inferior authority is by no means suspended by direct recourse to a superior. But if a case has been brought before a superior, the inferior authority shall not interfere, unless for a weighty and urgent reason, of which the superior must be promptly informed.

Whoever acts as a delegate is supposed to have received a commission or mandate, which must be observed as to all its substantial injunctions. Our Code especially mentions two limits: objects and persons. When the object or matter is mentioned expressly, e. g., a matrimonial case, the delegate has no power to decide other cases. In some countries there are special marriage courts, to whom no other cases are delegated. Again, when a certain class of persons (e. g., clerics, sisterhoods) is mentioned in the mandate, the jurisdiction of the delegate cannot be extended to other classes. If exempt religious are expressly mentioned, the non-exempt are not included.

The next paragraph bears upon procedure. Of course, it takes for granted that the essential form prescribed by common law is observed, unless expressly provided otherwise in the mandate of delegation. But there is a margin for accidental formalities; these are left to the judgment of the delegate, which may differ from that of the delegans. As in the case of rescripts, so here the intention of the delegans must be ascertained from the text.[89] When a special mode of procedure, differing from that prescribed by common law, is enjoined, this must be followed. If the mode is merely insinuated, without the clause "non aliter," or "sic neque alio modo," or "si secus fiat, irritum sit et inane," the delegatus may proceed [89] Cfr. c. 22, X, I, 3, de rescriptis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to his good pleasure, observing, however, the essential solemnities of legal procedure, if this is prescribed, or the tenor of his faculties. If no place is stated by the delegans, the place of the parties must be chosen, if it is safe.[40] If no time is fixed, the business must be finished within the tempus utile, i. e., a year from the date of delegation, with due regard, however, to the nature of the case as well as the distance of the parties.[41] The reason for keeping within the limits of the mandate is expressed in the Roman law, which states that he who does not observe them appears to do something unauthorized.[42] An analogue may be found in the case of diplomatic agents, who receive instructions of a twofold kind, some of which must be strictly followed, while others are left to their discretion.

Can. 204 speaks of recourse to a superior, e. g., from a bishop to the Apostolic See. A recourse differs from an appeal. The latter always supposes a sentence, either interlocutory or final, whilst the former does not necessarily suppose a sentence. The way to a higher superior is open at any time. But the Code says that in case of a recourse, the voluntary or non-judicial jurisdiction of an Ordinary or a delegate is not suspended. Therefore, for instance, a bishop may proceed with the investigation of, say, a matrimonial case and even pronounce a non-judicial sentence. But as soon as he is notified that the parties are having recourse to the Apostolic Delegate, or to Rome, he should stop his own procedure and not vex the higher tribunals with importune insinuations, unless the case requires it, in which eventuality information shall be welcomed by the higher authorities.

40 C. 11, 6°, I, 3; c. 13, X, I, 29, I, 29, n. 21 f.
41 C. 26, X, I, 29; Santi-Leitner,
42 L. 5, dig. 17, 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SEVERAL DELEGATES

CAN. 205

§ 1. Si plures iurisdictionem delegatam obtinuerint pro eodem negotio, et dubitetur utrum delegatio facta fuerit in solidum an collegialiter, praesumitur facta in solidum in re voluntaria, collegialiter in re iudiciali.

§ 2. Pluribus in solidum delegatis, qui antea negotium occupavit, alios ab eodem excludit, nisi aut posthac impediatur aut nolit ulterius in negotio procedere.

§ 3 Pluribus collegialiter delegatis, omnes simul pro actorum validitate in negotio expediendo procedere debent, nisi in mandato aliud cautum sit.

CAN. 206

Pluribus successive delegatis, ille negotium expedire debet cuius mandatum anterius est nec posteriore rescripto expresse abrogatum fuit.

A decretal [43] of Celestine III (1191–1198) says that the Apostolic See rather appoints several delegates than one, in order that the judgment may be solid. This may be done in such a manner that the several persons delegated are responsible in solidum, i. e., each one of them is responsible conjointly with the others for the whole thing, for instance, a payment, or a judgment, or bail,—or severally pro rata, i. e., each for his proportionate share. If they have jurisdiction in solidum, the whole jurisdiction resides in each one, and each may therefore decide the case by himself without the coöperation of the others. Again, several may be delegated as one body or quasi-

[43] C. 21, X, I, 29.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google corporation (collegialiter), and in that case all have to proceed conjointly in order to act validly.[44]

Concerning delegation in solidum, our Code says it must be presumed in voluntary or non-judicial jurisdiction, because voluntary jurisdiction does not essentially require the formalities of procedure, nor does it, generally, infringe upon the rights of others. But judiciary jurisdiction is supposed to be given to the body as such or collegialiter.[45] In the latter case, as § 3 states, all the judges have to proceed at the same time, like a jury, i. e., they must commence the trial by a simultaneous summons,[46] which is the first judicial act. This formality is so important that the defendant may refuse to appear if not all the names of the corporate judges are named in the summons.

Then again all essential judicial acts, such as the hearing of witnesses, issuing interlocutory or final sentences, must be made by all the judges in unison.

It is otherwise with the delegatio in solidum (§ 2), because in that case the one who issues the summons first is entitled to proceed to the exclusion of the others. Only in case one is prevented by sickness or some other impediment, or does not proceed within the appointed time (one year) to finish the affair, another may take his place.

When several judges have been delegated, neither in solidum nor collegialiter, but merely successive, then it depends upon the date of the rescript issued by the delegans.

If the case is of voluntary jurisdiction the rescript is presumed to be one of favor; if the case is of contentious 44 Santi-Leitner, I, 29, n. 25.

45 Cfr. cc. 2, 16, 21, 22, 23, X, I, 29; tit. 14 in 6°.

46 C. 22, X, I, 29; — unless the rescript or mandate contains the clause that in case of a legitimate impediment two may proceed without the third one; ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

jurisdiction, the rescript is presumed to be one of justice. In the former instance, consequently, the date is a dies datae, or the day when issued by the delegans; in the latter, it is the dies presentatae or date when the letters are shown to the parties interested or the execution of the rescript takes place.[47] But it is safe to say that every rescript of delegation effectively is a rescript of justice or at least one which needs an executor, and hence only the date of presentation may here be considered;[48] for the parties have a right to have the rescript "shown" to them.

CESSATION OF DELEGATED AND ORDINARY JURISDICTION

CAN. 207

§ 1. Potestas delegata exstinguitur, expleto mandato; elapso tempore aut exhausto numero casuum pro quo concessa fuit; cessante causa finali delegationis; revocatione delegantis delegato directe intimata aut renuntiatione delegati deleganti directe intimata et ab eodem acceptata; non autem resoluto iure delegantis, nisi in duobus casibus de quibus in can. 61.

§ 2. Sed potestate pro foro interno concessa, actus per inadvertentiam positus, elapso tempore vel exhausto casuum numero, validus est.

§ 3. Pluribus collegialiter delegatis, si unus deficiat, aliorum quoque delegatio exspirat, nisi aliud ex tenore delegationis constet.

CAN. 208

Ad normam can. 183, § 2, potestas ordinaria non 47 Cf. c. 8, 6°, I, 14; can. 38; can. 48.

48 C. 12, X, II, 28; c. 1, Extrav. Comm. I, 3 de electione.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exstinguitur resoluto iure concedentis officium cui adnexa est; sed cessat, amisso officio; silet, legitima appellatione interposita, nisi forte appellatio sit tantum in devolutivo, firmo praescripto can. 2264, 2284.

CAN. 209

In errore communi aut in dubio positivo et probabili sive iuris sive facti, iurisdictionem supplet Ecclesia pro foro tum externo tum interno.

In can. 207, § 1, six modes are enumerated by which delegated power ceases. These apply indiscriminately only to jurisdiction in foro externo, because § 2 of the same canon modifies two of them in regard to the court of conscience by ordaining (1) that the mandate is fulfilled if the sentence has been pronounced or the rescript has been executed,[49] because after the sentence one ceases to be judge; (2) if the time has expired, if a certain time was fixed, which commences, as said above, from the date when the documenet of delegation was presented;[50] (3) if the number of cases (for instance, twenty) is exhausted. These two latter modes of expiration do not affect the forum internum if a confessor should, by oversight, absolve in one more case than allowed, or if he should absolve beyond the time granted by the indult.[51] But since the forum internum is generally mentioned, and this comprises the confessional as well as extra-confessional application,[52] we believe we are justified in saying that any act, either in the confessional or outside of that tribunal, performed by oversight with regard to the time or 49 C. 9, X, I, 29; l. 55, dig. 42, 1; l. 1, Cod. Just. VII, 52.

50 C. 4, X, I, 29; c. 12, X, II, 28.
51 Stricter Benedict XIV, "Apostolica indulta," Aug. 5, 1744, §§ 3, 6; "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 3 (for England).
52 Can. 194.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

number of cases, is valid. Thus a dispensation executed outside the confessional, but intended for the court of conscience, would be valid even if applied by mistake beyond the specified time and number. (4) If the motive cause of a delegation ceases (e. g., an indult given for a solemn occasion, as a jubilee) the jurisdiction ceases; (5) if the delegans expressly (not only tacitly) revokes the delegation and the repeal is duly made known to the delegate. Note that the delegans may revoke a delegation at any time, even though the delegate has given the case a legal turn by summoning the parties. But the delegate who has subdelegated the whole jurisdiction to another is not entitled to revoke the subdelegation if the business had already taken a legal turn.[53] (6) If the delegate resigns (or refuses) the delegation and the resignation is accepted, the delegation ceases.

Generally speaking, no one can be compelled to be a delegate, unless the delegans has jurisdiction proper over him. Thus the Pope can compel any prelate or clergyman to accept a delegation, an Ordinary can compel any clergyman of his jurisdiction but not a clergyman of another diocese; a metropolitan cannot force one of his suffragans to accept a delegation.[54]

The first pragraph of our canon, modifying the old law,[55] says that only in two cases a delegation expires by one's going out of office. They are the cases mentioned in can. 61, viz., if a clausula to that effect had been inserted in the mandate, or if power was given to grant a favor to particular persons mentioned in the rescript, as long as the matter has not taken a legal turn.

If several delegates had been appointed collegialiter, the power of all of them ceases when one fails either by 53 C. 6, 6°, I, 14; c. 37, X, I, 29; c. 7, 6°, I, 14.

54 C. 11, X, I, 31.

55 Cc. 14, 42, X, I, 29.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google death, or accepted resignation, or by the infliction of a penalty implying the loss of ecclesiastical power.

Can. 208 speaks of the loss of ordinary power. It says (1) that even if the superior who has conferred the office to which that power is attached goes out of office by death, resignation, transfer, or privation, the power is not lost. Hence the bishops of the U. S., who are appointed by the Pope, do not lose their ordinary power by a vacancy in the Holy See. (2) The ordinary power is lost if the office itself is lost. Thus, if a bishop dies or resigns or is deprived of his office, his power ceases. (3) The power becomes quiescent or silent if an appeal is made to a higher authority or instance, provided, of course, the appeal is in suspensivo, not in devolutivo, for as the former term implies, by such an appeal the jurisdiction of the inferior is suspended.[56] If one who is excommunicated or suspended [57] has rendered a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, the sentence itself is null and void, and consequently the appeal will be of no consequence, i. e., it does not suspend the ordinary power.

Can. 209 provides for the common good and public security as well as for the tranquillity of conscience by reaffirming the well-known principle that the Church supplies the necessary jurisdiction when a common error or a positive doubt arises. Of course, the common error, to have this effect, must be accompanied by a titulus coloratus or an apparent title to the office one exercises. An intruder has no such claim.[58] But if an Ordinary or confessor were commonly but erroneously supposed to have the necessary faculties, the Church would supply the defect of real jurisdiction. The same effect is produced by a positive and probable doubt, i. e., one which 56 Concerning appeals see can. 1879 ff.

57 Can. 2264, 2284.

58 Reiffenstuel, II, 1, n. 200.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for certain reasons and circumstances inclines more to one side than to the other, in this case more to the side of the power being vested in the person whose court is sought. Whether this doubt regards the facts or the law is immaterial. A doubt regarding a fact would be whether a particular Ordinary or priest has a certain faculty; a doubt regarding the law (ius), whether the case falls under his jurisdiction. To quiet consciences the Church, out of the fulness of her power, supplies the defective jurisdiction and renders valid acts which would otherwise be invalid.

POWER OF ORDER

CAN. 210

Potestas ordinis, a legitimo Superiore ecclesiastico sive adnexa officio sive commissa personae, nequit aliis demandari, nisi id expresse fuerit iure vel indulto concessum.

This canon says that the power of order attached to an office or entrusted to a person by a legitimate superior, cannot be delegated to others, except by express permission either contained in the law or granted through an indult.

The power of order is the power imparted by ordination and is separable from that of jurisdiction. The term is here used of episcopal or pontifical power, as the priestly power and that attached to lower orders can hardly have entered the mind of the legislator.[59]

Pontifical power comprises that for which either the episcopal order is required or which can not be exercised [59] This is clearly seen from the notes of Card. Gasparri to this canon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

without the use of holy oils.[60] To this category belong the conferring of orders, confirmation and the consecration of sacred edifices [61] and utensils with chrism. These faculties belong by right to consecrated bishops. However, the power of conferring minor orders may by a special indult of the Pope be delegated to a priest. The same is true of the power of confirmation and consecrating churches.[62] By law, abbots nullius and vicars Apostolic may confer confirmation, tonsure and minor orders and consecrate altars; abbots regiminis, if blessed, may confer minor order on their own subjects.[63] Whether the power of conferring subdeaconship and deaconship may be commissioned to a priest, is uncertain. Since the pontificate of Innocent VIII (1484–1492) we do not hear of any such privilege being granted to a priest or abbot. And even the bull ascribed to that pope has been strongly assailed as to its genuineness.[64] Some defend, others attack it, but the controversy has no practical value.

60 Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 3.

61 Id., Ep. ad Engelhardtum (Bull., Prati, III, p. 445 ff.).

62 Ibid., and "Apostolicum ministerium," §§ 4, 9; De Syn. Dioec., VII, 2 f.

63 Can. 782, § 3; 957, § 2; 964.

64 Cfr. Bachofen, Compendium Juris Reg., 1903, p. 256; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, 124; Catholic Fortnightly Review, 1917, St. Louis, pp. 67 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VI

RETURN OF CLERGYMEN TO THE LAY STATE

CAN. 211

§ 1. Etsi sacra ordinatio, semel valide recepta, nunquam irrita fiat, clericus tamen maior ad statum laicalem redigitur rescripto Sanctae Sedis, decreto vel sententia ad normam can. 214, demum poena degradationis.

§ 2. Clericus minor ad statum laicalem regreditur, non solum ipso facto ob causas in iure descriptas, sed etiam sua ipsius voluntate, praemonito loci Ordinario, aut eiusdem Ordinarii decreto iusta de causa lato, si nempe Ordinarius, omnibus perpensis, prudenter iudicaverit clericum non posse cum decore status clericalis ad ordines sacros promoveri.

CAN. 212

§ 1. Qui in minoribus ordinibus constitutus ad statum laicalem quavis de causa regressus est, ut inter clericos denuo admittatur, requiritur licentia Ordinarii dioecesis cui incardinatus fuit per ordinationem, non concedenda, nisi post diligens examen super vita et moribus, et congruum, iudicio ipsius Ordinarii, experimentum.

§ 2. Clericus vero maior qui ad statum laicalem rediit, ut inter clericos denuo admittatur, indiget Sanctae Sedis licentia.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 213

§ 1. Omnes qui e clericali statu ad laicalem legitime redacti aut regressi sunt, eo ipso amittunt officia, beneficia, iura ac privilegia clericalia et vetantur in habitu ecclesiastico incedere ac tonsuram deferre.

§ 2. Clericus tamen maior obligatione coelibatus tenetur, salvo praescripto can. 214.

CAN. 214

§ 1. Clericus qui metu gravi coactus ordinem sacrum recepit nec postea, remoto metu, eandem ordinationem ratam habuit saltem tacite per ordinis exercitium, volens tamen per talem actum obligationibus clericalibus se subiicere, ad statum laicalem, legitime probata coactione et ratihabitionis defectu, sententia iudicis redigatur, sine ullis coelibatus ac horarum canonicarum obligationibus.

§ 2. Coactio autem et defectus ratihabitionis probari debent ad normam can. 1993–1998.

Although sacred ordination, once validly received, can never be annulled, a clergyman in higher orders may be reduced to the lay state by a rescript of the Holy See, by a decree or sentence issued in accordance with can. 214, or, finally, by degradation.

A cleric in minor orders is reduced to the lay state not only ipso facto for reasons stated in the law, but may also return thereto of his own accord, after having informed the Ordinary of the diocese, or by virtue of a decree issued by the same Ordinary for just reasons, if the latter upon due deliberation prudently judges that the cleric cannot be promoted to higher orders without disparagement to the clerical state.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Clerics in minor orders who have returned to the lay state, cannot be again admitted to the ranks of the clergy, unless the Ordinary of the diocese in which they were incardinated grants the necessary permission, which, however, should not be given except after a careful investigation of their life and conduct, and, if deemed opportune, upon suitable trial or test of character.

A cleric in higher orders who has returned to the lay state, may be readmitted to the ranks of the clergy only by leave of the Holy See. All those who are reduced from the clerical to the lay state thereby lose their clerical offices, benefices, rights, and privileges and are no longer allowed to wear the clerical garb and tonsure.

A cleric in higher orders remains bound by the law of celibacy, save in the case mentioned in can. 214.

A cleric who was compelled under grievous fear to receive a higher order, and has not ratified the ordination at least tacitly by the performance of an act proper to the order received, should be reduced to the lay state by a sentence of the ecclesiastical judge given after the coërcion and the defect of ratification have been duly proved; in which case he is bound neither by the obligation of celibacy nor by that of reciting the canonical hours.

The first three centuries were severe in meting out penalties to clerics. They were treated much like laymen.[1] In the fourth century a noticeable mitigation was introduced. Clerics who had committed a serious crime[2] were deposed but permitted to stay in the communion of laymen. Communio laica then meant that a cleric was reduced to the position of a layman and could

1 Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, I, 197.

2 Capital crimes were: apostasy, homicide, adultery (moechia); serious crimes: fornication, perjury, theft, absence from the diocese; cfr. Apost. Canons, 25, 61; Smith-Cheetham, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, 1880, II, 947.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

receive holy communion, but outside the bema or railing which divided the nave from the presbytery. This mitigation, which certainly occurs in the fourth century, was introduced for the reason that, as St. Basil [3] as well as the Apostolic canons say, a cleric should not be punished twice. Later synods generally combine this penance with that of being confined in a monastery with the right of lay communion. As a penalty following degradation, the reduction of clerics to the lay state is amply testified to in the Decretals.[4] But examples of dispensation from higher orders, or, more correctly, from the obligations attaching thereto, are very rare in history, at least to our knowledge. Perhaps one of the best known examples is that of King Casimir of Poland in the eleventh century,[5] but not many more examples could be adduced, unless, of course, where a trial ex metu was instituted.

The above historical note has touched upon the three reasons which may bring about a reduction to the lay state, as outlined by can. 211, § 1. The first is a rescript of the Holy See to the effect that, notwithstanding a validly received higher order (which is indelible),[6] a cleric is free from the law of celibacy, the obligation of the Breviary, and other duties. It is evident that weightier reasons are required for a dispensation from the obligations attached to deaconship than from those attached to subdeaconship. The second reason is a judicial sentence concerning the reception of a higher order from fear or coërcion, as seen under can. 204. The third reason is degradation, which comprises deposition, privation of clerical prerogatives, and reduction to the lay

3 Ad Amphiloch., c. 32.

4 C. 10, X, II, 1; c. 9, X, V, 7; c. 27, 4, V, 40.

5 Sczygielski, Aquila Polono-Benedictina, 1663, p. 94 f.

6 Trid., sess. 23, can. 4, c. 4 de ordine.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

state, and can be inflicted only for crimes stated in the law and after a duly conducted trial or confession.[7]

A cleric in minor orders may be reduced to the lay state if he does not wear the clerical dress, as stated above,[8] or if he spontaneously enlists in the army;[9] thus also a dismissed religious, especially if he has made profession by deceit.[10] But the Ordinary may pass judgment, if he finds reason for not admitting a cleric to higher orders, because minor orders were instituted precisely for the purpose of testing character, or as a kind of clerical novitiate.

Can. 212 establishes the conditions for readmission to the clerical state. Formerly a rather mild practice was defended,[11] but to-day, in order to guard against fraud and rashness, readmission is only allowed with the direct permission of the Ordinary, if the clergyman is in minor orders; if he is in higher orders, a rescript of the Holy See is necessary.[12]

Canon 213 treats of the effects of the reduction of a cleric to the lay state. They are, first and above all, the loss of all the ecclesiastical offices and benefices held by the delinquent, which therefore become vacant from the moment the rescript is received, or the sentence is uttered according to can. 1993 f., or the sentence of degradation is issued. A second effect is the loss of clerical prerogatives and the prohibition of wearing clerical distinctions, hence the privilegium fori, canonis, and immunitatis, which the so-called diaconi selvaggi (roaming deacons) in the former Neapolitan Kingdom used to claim, are lost.[13]

7 Can. 2305, 2314, 2343, 2354, 2368, 2388.
8 Can. 136, § 3.
9 Can. 141 § 2.
10 Can. 648; can. 2387.
11 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec. XII, 3, 1 ff.
12 Pontificale Rom., tit. degradatonis forma.
13 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 7, 9, X, III, 3; c. un. 6°, I, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 of can. 213 appears to us incomplete. We understand, indeed, that the law of celibacy remains after the sentence of degradation, but ceases after the sentence ex metu. But what if a rescript of the Holy See is obtained for a subdeacon? Is he bound to observe celibacy? If so, in most cases the object will not be achieved. From the recital of canonical hours all are freed, for the Code makes no distinction.

Can. 214 alludes to a case that may happen and has happened in the Greek (Coptic) Church, which permitted the ordination of infants, which, as Benedict XIV says,[14] was valid though illicit. Such ordinations are not likely to happen now-a-days. But moral coërcion — physical coërcion would exclude validity for lack of consent — may still be brought to bear, especially on devoted and timorous children, by importune entreaties, inducements or threats of ill will, displeasure and disinheritance.[15] When one submits to ordination under such influences,[16] the ceremony is valid, because the voluntariness of the consent is not simply excluded. The fear may be removed after ordination and the ordained person find himself between two horns of a dilemma: Should I exercise sacred functions or not? And if I do, do I thereby ratify my ordination? The answer lies in that apposition "volens tamen," somewhat clumsily inserted. If such a one, in exercising a sacred function, has the strict intention of complying with obligations attaching to the clerical state, he is supposed to ratify the ordination received under the pressure of fear. But if he has no such intention and performs the sacred function materially or mechanically, because he was told to do so, or for 14 "Eo quamvis tempore," May 4, 1745, § 17; "Probe te," Dec. 15, 1751, § 3; De Syn. Dioec., XII, 4, 2 f.

15 Richter, Trid., 175, n. 6; physical coaction, ibid., n. 4.

16 Can. 103, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google fear of causing a disturbance, the intention of ratifying is absent and hence the function cannot be regarded as a sign of consent or ratification. However, in case such a one performs a sacred function, the presumption is always that he means to ratify his ordination, unless he protests to some trustworthy witness. All such cases must be referred to the S. C. Sacr. If the one thus ordained wishes to be freed from the obligations attendant upon sacred orders, the S. Congregation shall refer the case to the court of the diocese to which the plaintiff belongs. In order to be free from these obligations two uniform sentences are required.[17]

17 Cfr. can. 1993–1998.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION II

THE HIERARCHY

After having explained the difference between clergy and laity and described the clerical state with its rights and duties, as well as ecclesiastical offices in general, the Code proceeds to treat of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, beginning with the Supreme Pontiff. The term hierarchy is here chiefly, though not exclusively, taken in the jurisdictional sense. However, although the Catholic Church, in its universal aspect, forms a compact and perfect society, embracing all baptized Christians, yet de facto there is also a local organization, which parcels out the Catholic world into various districts with minor divisions. Hence the Code first mentions

THE LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS

CAN. 215

§ 1. Unius supremae ecclesiasticae potestatis est provincias ecclesiasticas, dioeceses, abbatias vel praelaturas nullius, vicariatus apostolicos, praefecturas apostolicas erigere, aliter circumscribere, dividere, unire, supprimere.

§ 2. In iure nomine dioecesis venit quoque abbatia vel praelatura nullius; et nomine Episcopi, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, nisi ex natura rei vel sermonis contextu aliud constet.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 216

§ 1. Territorium cuiuslibet dioecesis dividatur in distinctas partes territoriales; unicuique autem parti sua peculiaris ecclesia cum populo determinato est assignanda, suusque peculiaris rector, tanquam proprius eiusdem pastor, est praeficiendus pro necessaria animarum cura.

§ 2. Pari modo vicariatus apostolicus et praefectura apostolica, ubi commode fieri possit, dividantur.

§ 3. Partes dioecesis de quibus in § 1, sunt paroeciae; partes vicariatus apostolici ac praefecturae apostolicae, si peculiaris rector eisdem fuerit assignatus, appellantur quasi-paroeciae.

§ 4. Non possunt sine speciali apostolico indulto constitui paroeciae pro diversitate sermonis seu nationis fidelium in eadem civitate vel territorio degentium, nec paroeciae mere familiares aut personales; ad constitutas autem quod attinet, nihil innovandum, inconsulta Apostolica Sede.

CAN. 217

§ 1. Episcopus territorium suum in regiones seu districtus, pluribus paroeciis constantes, distribuat, qui veniunt nomine vicariatus foranei, decanatus, archipresbyteratus, etc.

§ 2. Si haec distributio, ratione circumstantiarum, videatur impossibilis aut inopportuna, Episcopus consulat Sanctam Sedem, nisi ab eadem iam fuerit provisum.

The supreme ecclesiastical power alone is competent to erect, circumscribe, divide, unite or suppress ecclesiastical provinces, dioceses, abbies or prelatures nullius, Apostolic vicariates and prefectures.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Under the name of diocese the law comprises also an abbey or prelature nullius; and by the name of bishop it understands also an abbot or prelate nullius, unless the nature of the matter or the context require a different interpretation. The territory of each diocese should be distributed into districts, and to each of these assigned a special church with a determined part of the flock, over which is to be placed a local pastor, who shall take the necessary care of souls.

Similarly should be divided, wherever possible, vicariates and prefectures Apostolic.

The minor divisions of a diocese mentioned in § 1 are called parishes; the minor divisions of a vicariate or prefecture, if they have their own rectors, are called quasi-parishes.

Henceforward no parishes are to be established for faithful of diverse language or nation in the same city or territory without a special Apostolic indult. In regard to such parishes already existing, nothing is to be changed without the advice of the Holy See.

Every bishop is to divide his territory into districts, each comprising several parishes, to go by the name of foraneous vicariates, deaneries, archpresbyteries, etc. Where by reason of special circumstances such a division is impossible or infeasible, the bishop should consult the Holy See, unless the latter has already made provision.

The meaning of these canons is evident and only requires a few historical remarks.[1] When the first epoch, marked by itinerant preachers and ministers, had passed, the local organization alone remained. This extended from cities to suburbs, with areas [2] of widely dif-

1 Duchesne (tr. by McClure), Christian Worship, 1903, p. 14 ff.

2 A diocese, before Constantine, was a minor portion of a province,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ferent proportions, but the center of gravitation was the city where the bishop dwelt. It was generally held that each city should have its bishop with its own clergy. That these several bishoprics or churches formed an ecclesiastical province similar to the political provinces, cannot be proved for the first three centuries. Neither did the existing prominent churches imitate the civil divisions except in so far as there was a geographical connection. It was natural that Rome should be looked upon as the center of Christendom, as it was not only the capital of the Orbis Romanus, but also the place hallowed by the two chief Apostles and consecrated by their martyrdom. Thus the successors of St. Peter were already in the first three centuries the acknowledged metropolitans of the West, which comprised the Italian peninsula, and later Western Illyricum with Gaul, and still later the Spanish provinces. The Council of Nicæa (325), comparing Rome with the sees of Alexandria and Antioch, referred to the metropolitan organization of the former as an established fact.[3] Alexandria and Antioch in the East retained for centuries their influence over the districts which had been allotted to them. In the reign of Theodosius I (379–395), the five civil provinces of the Orient (Pontus, Asia, Thrace, and Egypt) had their ecclesiastical heads, who were later (fifth century) called patriarchs: the Orient with Antioch, Alexandria with Egypt, and Pontus, Asia, and Thrace under the newly established metropolitan of Constantinople, who, as occupant of the see of New Rome,[4] claimed the right of consecrating the bishops of these three provinces — i. e., called παροικία, parish; but after Const. a diocese signified a district or area comprising several provinces.

3 Council of Nicaea (325), c. 6 has various readings; cfr. Maassen, Gesch. d. Quellen, I, 19; c. 6, Dist. 65.

4 C. 3 Constant. I; c. 28 Chalced.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

jurisdictional, hierarchic power over them. Thus the exarchs or metropolitans of Heraclea in Thrace, of Ephesus in Asia, and Caesarea of Pontus dwindled to lower rank, whilst Jerusalem, under the intriguing Juvenal, arose after the council of Chalcedon to the rank of a patriarchate, until Islam invaded the East. In the West we hear but little of metropolitans, if we except Milan, Aquileja, and Ravenna. Spain and Gaul show few traces of true organization with the sole exception of the Vicariate of Arles, founded by Pope Zosimus (417–418), which, however, proved a failure.[5]

More effective was the organization introduced by St. Boniface, the "Apostle of Germany," who acted strictly according to regulations received from Rome. A favorite theme of Pseudo-Isidore was the introduction of Primates,[6] of whom we hear as early as the fifth century, assuming that they are identical with the vicars of the Apostolic See. Thus, besides Arles, a vicar was created at Thessalonica,[7] and St. Boniface, as metropolitan of Mayence, was Primate of Germany. Later on the Primate of Hungary succeeded in upholding that title. In England, as we know from the history of the conversion of that country, St. Gregory had intended to erect two provinces.[8] Pope Nicholas I amalgamated the see of Bremen with the archbishopric of Hamburg. From the eleventh century onward the erection of bishoprics was reserved to the Holy See,[9] so that not even the papal legates were allowed to make a change in the territorial condition of dioceses.[10]

5 Duchesne, l. c., p. 39.

6 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, Dist. 80; c. 1 f. Dist. 99.

7 Duchesne, l. c., p. 42.

8 Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church (s. a.), I, 107.

9 C. 1, Dist. 22; Dictatus Greg. VII, n. 7 (Migne 148, 407); c. 1, X, I, 7.

10 C. 2, X, I, 7; c. 4, X, I, 30; c. 4, 6°, I, 15.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The erection and delimitation of new dioceses was generally effected in forma bullae or by a document called "bull of circumscription."

In countries which maintained diplomatic relations with the Holy See, the civil government coöperated with the former in the act of circumscription as well as in the carrying these documents into effect. Where, however, there was complete separation between Church and State, the Holy See established or reëstablished dioceses by papal bull. Thus Gregory XVI, by his Constitution "Benedictus Deus," of July 17, 1834, laid down the boundaries of several dioceses and Pius IX, Jan. 24, 1868, increased the number of dioceses in the U. S. By the bull "Universalis Ecclesiae," of Oct. 1, 1850, Pius IX re-established the hierarchy in England.[11] The whole business of erecting and changing the boundaries of dioceses now lies with the S. C. Consistorialis.[12]

The new Code insists upon strict organization of dioceses proper and parishes with due regard to the distinction between dioceses and vicariates. For the latter § 2 makes allowance, "ubi commode fieri potest." But the distribution of dioceses into parishes must be enforced. For our country the passage referring to parishes of different languages is important, because in future none but English-speaking parishes can be erected without a special Apostolic indult. This law we consider very opportune because it does away with inconveniences arising from uncertain boundaries and puts the division on the basis of territory, which alone should be considered for administrative purposes. But as to carry the law into effect at once would cause difficulties, the legislator moderates the law as to the existing parishes. Par-

11 Kirchenlexikon, 2nd ed., s. v. "Circumscriptionsbullen."

12 Can. 248, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ishes for a certain number or class of families, especially of the nobility, such as exist in Spain, are unknown in America.

The Code, with some restrictions, also insists upon the erection of rural deaneries. The scope of this provision is apparent from can. 131, which urges conferences of the clergy for each rural district, as also from cc. 445 ff., which define the duty of deans to watch over the clergy of their districts.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VII

THE SUPREME POWER AND THOSE WHO PARTAKE THEREOF BY ECCLESIASTICAL LAW

CHAPTER I

THE ROMAN PONTIFF

CAN. 218

§ 1. Romanus Pontifex, Beati Petri in primatu Successor, habet non solum primatum honoris, sed supremam et plenam potestatem iurisdictionis in universam Ecclesiam tum in rebus quae ad fidem et mores, tum in iis quae ad disciplinam et regimen Ecclesiae per totum orbem diffusae pertinent.

§ 2. Haec potestas est vere episcopalis, ordinaria et immediata tum in omnes et singulas ecclesias, tum in omnes et singulos pastores et fideles, a quavis humana auctoritate independens.

CAN. 219

Romanus Pontifex, legitime electus, statim ab acceptata electione, obtinet, iure divino, plenam supremae iurisdictionis potestatem.

CAN. 220

Gravioris momenti negotia quae uni Romano Pon-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tifici reservantur sive natura sua, sive positiva lege, causae maiores appellantur.

CAN. 221

Si contingat ut Romanus Pontifex renuntiet, ad eiusdem renuntiationis validitatem non est necessaria Cardinalium aliorumve acceptatio.

The Roman Pontiff, being the successor of St. Peter, possesses not only an honorary primacy, but supreme and full power of jurisdiction in the whole Church concerning matters of faith and morals as well as of discipline and government.

This power is truly episcopal, ordinary, and immediate, extending to each and every church no less than to each and every pastor, and to all the faithful, and is independent of every human authority.

The Roman Pontiff, lawfully elected, obtains by divine right full power of supreme jurisdiction at the moment when he accepts office. All affairs of major import (causae maiores), by their nature or by positive law, are reserved to the Roman Pontiff.

If the Roman Pontiff resigns his office, the resignation is valid without its acceptance by the cardinals or any one else.

These four brief canons embody the Catholic doctrine of the Roman Pontiff, on which many volumes have been written and which is fully treated in every manual of fundamental theology. We will limit our comments to a few canonical observations.

All those who pervert the essential divine organization of the Church as a perfect society of the monarchical type, necessarily deny the power of the Roman Pontiff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The so-called democrats of the later middle ages (Marsilius, Jandunus, Wiclif, and Hus) were deliberately bent on destroying the pure notion of papal power.[1] But the Jansenists, Gallicans, and Josephinists were also far from the true idea of papal power. They gave the Supreme Pontiff the title "caput ministeriale," somewhat like a premier, or first among equals[2] (primus inter pares), but denied to him jurisdictional primacy over bishops and priests.[3] Pius VI, by the "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, condemned the doctrine of the "caput ministeriale," which meant that the supreme power was given to the Church as such, and only by and through the deference and connivance of the Church at large to the Pope. Finally the Vatican Council, summing up the traditional belief and many conciliary decisions, expressed the Catholic belief in its fourth and last session, held on July 18, 1870, which is embodied in our canon.[4]

Hence, (1) the power of the sovereign pontiff is truly a primacy of jurisdiction, which means not only inspection or direction, but legislative, judiciary, and executive power.[5]

(2) This power is supreme by reason of its dignity, because it is not derived from human authority, but is of divine origin, independent of any one in the same category.

(3) It is the plentitude of power, because it comprises all and every power needed for the attainment of the end for which the Church was founded. Therefore (a) all matters of faith and morals are subject to this power by reason of the infallible magisterium; (b)

1 Cf. Denzinger, Enchiridion, ed. 9, 1900, nn. 513, 528, 534, 589.

2 Ed. Richer, De Ecclesiastica et Politica Potestate, 1611.

3 Denzinger, l. c., nn. 1366, 1369.

4 Ibid., nn. 1667–1677 (Sess. IV, c. 3, de const. Eccl.).

5 Pius V, "Auctorem fidei," n. 5 (Denzinger, l. c., n. 1368).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the whole ecclesiastical administration belongs to it in virtue of the sacred ministerium; (c) the whole government of the Church may be claimed by the Pope by reason of the full and undivided imperium.

(4) The power of the Pope is episcopal, inasmuch as he is the supreme pastor whom the whole flock, of whatever rite or dignity, by reason of hierarchic subordination must follow and obey, and with whom all must be united.[6]

(5) The power of the Pope is immediate — a quality which naturally flows from spiritual sovereignty, but had to be specified against the Febronians,[7] who, as stated above, made the Pope the mere representative or diplomatic agent of the bishops. The supreme power accrues to the Pope not by any concession from or deference on the part of the bishops, but from Christ's promise and actual bestowal.

(6) This power, lastly, is ordinary, because supreme, full, and immediate jurisdiction is imparted through and with the office of the successor of St. Peter and rests with him as long as he holds that office, from the moment he accepts the lawfully performed election until his death or resignation. Neither for the validity of the election nor for a resignation is acceptance, confirmation, or anything else required. The reason is not far to seek. The pontificate, being supreme and immediate, requires merely an appropriate human factor or instrument in order to exist. (Election is, we might say, the remote material element, whilst the consent of the elect is materia proxima, to which is added the divine form of the primacy embodied in the Roman bishop.)

6 Vat. Conc. sess. IV, c. 3 (Denzinger, n. 1673).

7 Eybel had published a pamphlet: "What is the Pope?" against which Pius VI promulgated the Const. "Super soliditate," Nov. 28, 1786 (Denzinger, n. 1363).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The question may be asked how the phrase "iure divino" in can. 219 is to be understood. No Catholic will doubt that the primacy is of divine sanction. But why is it held by the bishop of the Roman See, and not by the bishop of Antioch or the bishop of Alexandria (founded, it is said, by St. Mark, the "spiritual son" of St. Peter)? The majority of authors, theological [8] as well as canonical, maintain that it was by "divine ordinance," by the "providence of God," by a "supernal interposition" that the Roman See was chosen to be the instrument of Peter's Primacy. The proof from tradition and common conviction, therefore, is in favor of the iure-divino connection of the Primacy with the Roman See. Yet it must be said, with an author who has written a monograph on the subject and acted as member of the Codification Commission, that no de fide definition has been issued on the subject.[9] A purely academical question [10] is, whether a Pope could be deposed if he became a heretic or schismatic. Nego suppositum.

Canon 220 mentions the causae maiores which are reserved to the Roman Pontiff. Gratian's Decree and the Decretals contain several texts which refer to the so-called causae maiores. The text of Gratian, however, is taken largely from apocryphal sources. In one place, for instance, he says, that "all greater affairs must be referred to the Holy See, divine grace thus commanding," and vindicates to the Apostolic See "ecclesiasticarum summas querelas causarum" and the condemnation of bishops.[11] Besides, appeals to the Holy See are more than once refered to. It is safe to say that, since the synod of Sardica (343), appeals to the Apostolic 8 Cf. Mazzella, De Religione et Ecclesia, 1892, p. 731 ff.

9 Msgr. Hollweck, Der Apost. Stuhl und Rom, 1895.

10 Aichner, l. c., § 25, 2.

11 C. 15, c. 24, q. 1; c. 6, 3. 3, q.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

See[12] were frequent. The canons of this synod had a peculiar fate, for in some versions they were simply attached to the canons of Nicæa, and having no special inscription or enumeration, were accepted as Nicene canons. A Latin translation containing them was circulated in Rome and Gaul, as the Codex Theatinus and others prove, whilst the African Church used copies of the Nicene Council without the canons of Sardica. When Apiarius, a priest of Sicca in Africa, appealed to Pope Zosimus, and the latter accepted the appeal by pointing to the canons of the Nicene Council, the African bishops remonstrated and denied that there were any such "Nicene canons." Both the Pope and the African bishops spoke the truth considering the state of their respective versions. But the African bishops were wrong in denying that appeals to the Holy See are permissible. For Julius I (337–352) had accepted the appeal of St. Athanasius, and the Africans themselves had sent the decrees of two of their councils to the Apostolic See.[13] Besides, it is a historical fact that questions continued to be submitted to Rome, instances of appeals being those of Himerius, Bishop of Tarragona, in 384, of Victricus, Bishop of Rouen, in 403, and of Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, in 404. The replies are embodied in the noble epistle of Siricius and Innocent on ecclesiastical discipline.[14] Besides appeals there were other causes brought before the Pope. Thus the restitution of deposed or sentenced bishops, doubtful or contested episcopal elec-

12 Cc. 10, 12, C. 2, q. 2; c. 9, C. 3, q. 6; c. 59, X, II, 28; as to the Sardican canons see Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, I, 341 f.; 539 ff.; Maassen, l. c., p. 9 f.; p. 56 ff.

13 Cf. S. Aug., Serm. 132, n. 10: "Jam enim de causa duo concilia missa sunt ad sedem apostolicam. Inde etiam rescripta venerunt; causa finita est, utinam aliquando error finiatur."

14 Coustant, Epp. RR. Pontiff., 1721; Duchesne, l. c., p. 37.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tions, the concession of coadjutors, etc. Add to this the convocation of general councils and the solution of doubts concerning articles of faith or ritual questions,[15] and especially, later, the beatification and canonization of saints, the grant of exemptions, the erection of religious orders and congregations, dispensation from and commutation of certain vows, the erection and change of higher ecclesiastical benefices, etc.

An expression in the Gloss (ad. c. x, § I, 7) deserves some attention.[16] "No one," it says, "may appeal from the decision of the Holy See to another authority." The Gallicans had invented a formula, a certain panacea, as they said, for protecting the clergy and bishops from unjust sentences pronounced by Rome. This is the famous appellatio ab abusu, an appeal from the spiritual authority to the civil government. But that formula was a mere political measure, devised to hinder the free exercise of the spiritual power in matters proper to it. It was properly dealt with by the condemnation of the so-called Gallican Articles.[17] But there were other errors contained in the Gallican tendencies, which were transplanted to Germany and Austria and other countries, even to the Republic of Switzerland. These are known as the "placetum regium" and other outcroppings of a truly autocratic system, which would submit to civil power every official communication of the Supreme Pontiff and of pastors with their flocks.[18] Therefore, quite 15 Cfr. cc. 10, 12, C. 2, q. 6; c. 10, 6°, I, 6; c. un. 6°, III, 5; c. 1, X, II, 7; c. 5, Dist. 17; c. 3, X, III, 42.

16 The verse reads: "Restituit Papa solus, deponit et ipse — Articulos solvit; synodumque facit generalem — Transfert et mutat, appellat nullus ab ipso — Dividit ac unit, eximit atque probat."

17 Innocent XI, April 11, 1682; Alexander VIII, "Inter multiplices," Aug. 4, 1690; "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794; "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, n. 6–8; cfr. Charlas, Tractatus de Libertatibus Eccl. Gallicanae, 1725, III, 1, 166 ff.

18 Syllabus n. 28; Heiner, Der

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

naturally, our Code insists on the supreme spiritual power being independent in its sphere of any human authority. And, truly, if the divinely established government were subject to temporal rulers, the mission of the Church would be jeopardized and often foiled.

In order to complete the observations made thus far, we will add some remarks on

THE PAPAL TITLES AND INSIGNIA

By the term "title" we understand not only the various nomenclatures which distinguish the Pope, but also the diverse dignities inherent in the papal office. To commence with the latter, three of which have now become merely honorary, there are

1. TITLES CONNOTING PREËMINENCE: (a) Bishop of Rome, i. e., of the diocese within a circumferenece of 40 miles of the City (with the exception of six suburbicarian bishoprics), called in Italian "comarca di Roma," over which the Cardinal Vicar presides with ordinary jurisdiction.[19]

(b) Metropolitan of the Roman Province, which at the time of Innocent III comprised the region between the two provinces of Capua and Pisa,[20] and had some significance as long as provincial councils were held in Rome.

(c) Primate of Italy and the adjoining islands, Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily (including Malta).[21]

(d) Patriarch of the Occident, in imitation of the Oriental patriarchates.[22]

Of these four titles only the first has a juridical value.

Syllabus, 1894, p. 151; Bachofen, Summa Iuris Ecc. Pub., 1910, p. 56 f.; p. 68.

19 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 3, 2.

20 C. 5, X, I, 23; v. Scherer, l. c., I, 463.

21 C. 11, Dist. 11.

22 C. 23, X, V, 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. HONORARY TITLES expressive of the office and dignity of the Sovereign Pontiff are the following:

Papa from the Greek πάππας, i. e., father, which since the fifth century is exclusively used for the pope in the West;[23]

Apostolicus, viz. Dominus, in use since the fifth century, taken from the see, called Apostolic; Pontifex Maximus, Summus.[24]

Vicarius Dei or Vicarius Christi, also Vicarius Petri, to signify the primacy and source of power, in use since the thirteenth century.[25]

Servus Servorum Dei, which dates to the time of Gregory the Great (590–604). Because the monks were called "servants of God," Gregory, a former monk, called himself "Servus Servorum Dei," against the "Universal Patriarch" of Constantinople.[26]

With these titles are in keeping the cermonies of the papal court. There is, first, the adoratio or reverence given to the Pope. At public cermonies the cardinals are supposed to kiss his foot and hand, the bishops his foot and knee, diplomatic representatives his hand.[27] Formerly the emperors used to hold the strepa of the Pope's horse. Now-a-days the Pope is considered the first of sovereigns and in Catholic countries his envoys take precedence over all other diplomatic agents.

The Pope is addressed as "Holy Father," in Latin, Beatissime Pater, e. g., in petitions; Sanctitas Vestra, Beatitudo Vestra, although beatitudo is also the address of Oriental patriarchs.

23 Coustant, l. c., p. 765.

24 V. Scherer, I, 468. Pontifex Maximus alludes to the pagan Summus Pontifex and to the Jewish Pontiff or Highpriest.

25 Cc. 2, 4, X, I, 7; c. 17, 6°, I, 6.

26 Io. Diac. Vita Greg. (Migne 75, 87).

27 The etiquette is the so-called Spanish; but it is useless to assert that this adoratio or worship is intended for the relics sewed in the tip of the slippers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The most remarkable INSIGNIA of the Sovereign Pontiff are these:

At certain solemnities the Pope wears the tiara or triregnum, a crown about 1½ ft. high with three bands or small diadems, set with precious stones, and with two lappets hanging from the rear. In its present form it dates back to the first half of the fourteenth century (Benedict XII, d. 1342). No juridical significance can be attached to the tiara.[28] It is used at the coronation of the Pope and high solemnities; at liturgical functions the Pope wears the episcopal mitre.

Instead of the crooked pastoral staff of the bishops the Pope uses the pedum rectum, a straight cross or staff, at the point of which is a cross, to signify the plenitude of power which the holder exercises in the name of Christ crucified.[29]

Besides, to indicate the fulness of his power, the Pope wears the pallium at all functions and without any restrictions as to place. The usual or daily dress of the Pope consists of a cassock of white silk, a white silken skullcap, a pectoral cross, and slippers of red silk.[30]

28 Cath. Encycl., XIV, 717 f. (Braun); Wuescher-Becchi, Ursprung d. päpstl. Tiara u. d. bischöfl. Mitra, 1899, shows that the tiara was modelled on the Phrygian cap or pileus, and the mitre on a band or scarf (taenia) used by priests.

29 C. un. X, I, 15 § 9; v. Scherer, I, 468 f.; Wernz, l. c., II, p. 684.

30 C. 4, X, I, 8; v. Scherer, l. c.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

GENERAL (ECUMENICAL) COUNCILS

CAN. 222

§ 1. Dari nequit Oecumenicum Concilium quod a Romano Pontifice non fuerit convocatum.

§ 2. Eiusdem Romani Pontificis est Oecumenico Concilio per se vel per alios praeesse, res in eo tractandas ordinemque servandum constituere ac designare, Concilium ipsum transferre, suspendere, dissolvere, eiusque decreta confirmare.

No general council can be held except by convocation of the Roman Pontiff, who presides over it either himself or by legates, prescribes and assigns the matters to be treated, as well as the order to be followed, transfers, suspends, and adjourns the council and ratifies its decrees.

Among the causae maiores reserved to the Roman Pontiff was enumerated the convocation of general councils, and hence this chapter is logically connected with the preceding. But there is also another reason why the Code treats of general councils here. The Pope being the supreme head of the universal Church, and a general council being a lawful gathering of prelates representing the whole body with the consent of the supreme head, it is evident that such an assembly must be the foremost object of the sovereign power. Besides, the bishops being the successors of the Apostles, endowed with power to rule the Church of God, can be called together author-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

itatively only by one who enjoys immediate jurisdiction over them.

History testifies that the first four general councils were convoked by civil rulers; but even at these, as the respective acta prove, the Popes were legitimately represented by legates.

As to the necessity of general councils, it is not absolute, but only relative.[1] For the power of the Pope is intrinsically neither enhanced by a general council nor diminished by the absence thereof. But in order to discuss matters thoroughly, and to impress the faithful as well as dissenters more effectively, to give a more widespread influence and application to universal decrees, a general council proves an effective means, especially in times of distress and spiritual calamities.

CAN. 223

§ 1. Vocantur ad Concilium in eoque ius habent suffragii deliberativi:

1.° S. R. E. Cardinales, etsi non Episcopi;

2.° Patriarchae, Primates, Archiepiscopi, Episcopi residentiales, etiam nondum consecrati;

3.° Abbates vel Praelati nullius;

4.° Abbas Primas, Abbates Superiores Congregationum monasticarum, ac supremi Moderatores religionum clericalium exemptarum, non autem aliarum religionum, nisi aliud convocationis decretum ferat.

§ 2. Etiam Episcopi titulares, vocati ad Concilium, suffragium obtinent deliberativum, nisi aliud in convocatione expresse caveatur.

§ 3. Theologi ac sacrorum canonum periti, ad Con-

1 Bellarmine, De Conciliis, I, 10; Mazzella, De Religione et Ecclesia, 1892, p. 809 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cilium forte invitati, suffragium non habent, nisi consultivum.

CAN. 224

§ 1. Si quis ex vocatis ad Concilium ad normam can. 223, § 1, eidem, iusto impedimento detentus, interesse non possit, mittat procuratorem et impedimentum probet.

§ 2. Procurator, si fuerit unus e Concilii Patribus, duplici suffragio non gaudet; si non fuerit, publicis tantum sessionibus interesse potest, sed sine suffragio; expleto autem Concilio, huius acta subscribendi ius habet.

If one of those called to the council is lawfully prevented from attending, let him send a procurator and prove the obstacle.

The procurator, although being perhaps a father of the council, enjoys but one vote; if he is not a father of the council he has no deliberative vote, but may be present at the public sessions and sign the acts after the council is finished.

CAN. 225

Nemini eorum qui Concilio interesse debent, licet ante discedere, quam Concilium sit rite absolutum, nisi a Concilii praeside cognita ac probata discessionis causa et impetrata abeundi licentia.

The fathers of a council are not allowed to leave until it is duly concluded, unless the president of the council grants leave after having duly considered and approved the reasons for departure.

The first of these three canons speaks of those who are called (vocantur) to attend a council. The term vocantur is to be taken as indicating a matter of fact, not a law or

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rule. This is plain from the persons enumerated. For cardinals, if not bishops, are called in virtue of their privileged office, which the Vatican Council silently admitted,[2] as does also our Code.

Those who must be called are the bishops, be they patriarchs, primates, archbishops, or simple bishops, provided they are residential, and not merely titular. The reason why the residential bishops must be called lies in their twofold character of pastors and teachers. This double office they exercise in a twofold way: (1) As successors of the Apostles they share in the government of the universal Church and form a body analogous to the college of the Apostles, with whom Christ remains until the end of time. (2) As residential bishops they exercise their office in a determined district or diocese, which, however, is part and parcel of the universal Church.[3] This power is jurisdictional in a particular sense, while the power they exercise over the whole Church is jurisdictional in a general sense, so far, namely, as they convene in council under their legitimate superior.

The next question would be, whether the right of a bishop to be called to a general council depends on episcopal consecration or jurisdiction. The Vatican Council doubtless took the view that it is a right emanating directly from jurisdiction. This is implicitly also the standpoint of our Code, otherwise a bishop confirmed by Rome but not yet consecrated, could not be called. The point is palpably illustrated by the debate concerning the admission of titular bishops. After long deliberation the commission of cardinals entrusted with the investigation of the matter decided that such bishops are to be called, as they are bound by the oath "vocatus ad synodum

2 Cfr. Granderath-Kirch, Geschichte des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, I, 83, 440.

3 Ib., p. 84 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

veniam." The quaestio iuris the commission would not touch.[4] Our Code says, § 2, "etiam episcopi titulares, vocati ad concilium." The delicate question could, of course, be solved only by answering two others: (1) Is the magisterium an act of jurisdiction or of spiritual power based on the power of orders? and (2) Is episcopal jurisdiction derived directly from God by virtue of consecration, or from the Pope? The commission would not solve the problem, as the time was too short. It only took the historical point of view, by which it was safely guided, thus making the council what it ought to be; "concilium episcoporum est," as the Council of Chalcedon says.[5]

But there is an unmistakable hint as to the viewpoint which the Vatican Council as well as our Code take with regard to the twofold question proposed above: the office of teacher and pastor follows jurisdiction, not consecration, and this jurisdiction is supposed to be given by the Supreme Pontiff. Hence abbots nullius are called to the council, although many of them are not consecrated;— in the Cassinese Congregation they are not even blessed, though some are real abbates nullius.[6] For these abbots nullius as well for other abbots mentioned S. Sanguineti, S. J., gave his votum.[7] He proved that since the second Nicene Council (787) the monastic bodies and their superiors took a conspicuous part in the affairs of the Church, but their participation in councils was a privilege, not a strict right, though abbots possess a quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, which is the reason of their being admitted to councils. But when he comes 4 L. c., p. 93.

5 Sess. IV.
6 Those of Monte Cassino, S. Paolo fuori le mura, Cava de' Tirreni.
7 Granderath-Kirch, l. c., p. 99.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the point — punctum saliens — whether all abbots, or only some of them, should be admitted, Fr. Sanguineti's conclusions seem not to tally with his premises. For in the Benedictine Order all abbots regiminis are endowed with quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, and neither the Abbot Primate nor the Abbot President possesses real jurisdiction over the individual abbots. Hence the distinction between heads of monastic congregations and superiors of single autonomous monasteries is merely extrinsic. We fail to perceive the intrinsic reason of the distinction made, upon the opinion of Sanguineti, by the commission of cardinals in 1868 and now adopted by the Code. One reason advanced at the meeting, why not all abbots should be admitted, we understand, namely, that their number would be so great as to displease the bishops.[8] Transeat! The superiors of non-exempt congregations[9] were not entitled to be present at general councils, which exclusion was logically based upon the theory of quasi-episcopal jurisdiction.

Concerning proxies, our Code embodies the practice of the Vatican Council.[10] If a procurator is at the same time a "father" of the council, i. e., entitled by law to a deliberative vote, he enjoys only one vote, for the reason that a bishop or pastor, being judge and counsellor at the assembly, cannot impart his judgment or counsel to another. Concerning bishops, the matter is still more palpable, for, being chosen by the Holy Ghost, they cannot communicate that personal gift to another.[11] A procurator who does not belong to the "fathers" of the council enjoys no deliberative vote, unless, of course,

8 Ib., p. 104.

9 Exempt congregations are the Redemptorists and the Passionists.

10 Granderath-Kirch, l. c., I, 108 ff.

11 Ib., p. 115; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., III, 12, 4.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Pope expressly grants him one, as Paul III allowed [12] the procurators of some German bishops a decisive vote, which privilege, however, was repealed by Pius IV.[13] Besides, the office of a procurator is to explain and prove the reasons why his mandans has not personally appeared, although he was under obligation to attend.[14] The investigation of such cases must be laid either before a commission specially assigned by the council, or before the presiding officer. The latter must also take cognizance of and approve the reasons for a departure before the close of the council.

A last question may perhaps be of some juridical interest, viz., how many fathers must be present in order to call a council ecumenical? This question Bellarmine [15] has answered by saying that the number cannot be defined but should be such as to constitute a moral representation of the whole Church. He adds that at least some bishops should be present from the majority of provinces. The councils of the East had but few representatives from the Occident, whose small number was supplied by the papal representatives.

ORDER AND AUTHORITY OF A GENERAL COUNCIL

CAN. 226

Propositis a Romano Pontifice quaestionibus Patres possunt alias addere, a Concilii tamen praeside antea probatas.

CAN. 227

Concilii decreta vim definitivam obligandi non ha-

12 "Dudum cum fide," Dec. 5, 1545.

13 Aug. 26, 1562.

14 C. 4, X, II, 24; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., III, 12, 5.

15 De Concil., I, c. 17; Mazzella, l. c., p. 801.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bent, nisi a Romano Pontifice fuerint confirmata et eius iussu promulgata.

CAN. 228

§ 1. Concilium Oecumenicum suprema pollet in universam Ecclesiam potestate.

§ 2. A sententia Romani Pontificis non datur ad Concilium Oecumenicum appellatio.

To the questions proposed by the Roman Pontiff others may be added by the Fathers, provided they are approved by the presiding officer.

Conciliary decrees have no obligatory force unless they are ratified by the Roman Pontiff and promulgated by his command.

An ecumenical council possesses supreme power over the whole Church.

From the judgment of the Roman Pontiff no appeal is admissible to a general council.

CAN. 229

Si contingat Romanum Pontificem, durante Concilii celebratione, e vita decedere, ipso iure hoc intermittitur, donec novus Pontifex illud resumi et continuari iusserit.

Should the Roman Pontiff die during the council, the latter is suspended until the new Pontiff gives orders to resume and continue it.

As to the matter and the order of proposals, it is well known that preparatory sessions are held and various committees chosen. No general rule is laid down, and prelates who wish to make new proposals must submit them to the President of the council, in order that they may be sifted and discussed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning the vis definitiva, it should be remembered that the fathers of the council are judges concerning all matters proposed to their acceptance or rejection. Wherefore those who are mentioned in can. 233, § 1 and § 2 subscribe the acts with the phrase definiens subscripsi. However, although these are regular judges, the final sentence remains with the Pope. He it is that ratifies the decrees either at the council itself, if he is personally present, or when they are submitted to him, generally by the secretary of the council. It may happen that some decrees are ratified, while others are rejected, as, for instance, the third cannon of the I Council of Constantinople and the twenty-eighth of Chalcedon were rejected by the Popes.[16]

As to the authority of a general council, it is evident that, if it deserves the name, its dogmatic decrees bind the whole Church, Oriental as well as Occidental. But the disciplinary decrees of Occidental councils, unless directly applied to the Oriental Church, are not intended for the latter.[17] But there is also another intent in can. 228, § 1, that is to reject the pretention of Hus,[18] that every council called general obliges the whole Church, and especially to condemn the 29th thesis of Luther,[19] that it is allowed to reject or even rebel against the decrees of an ecumenical council. The same canon rejects the famous "conciliar theory," which, approved by Gerson, was a leading topic of discussion at the end of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth centuries, and culminated in the assertion of the superiority of a general council over the Pope, thus destroying the true idea of 16 Also the conciliar decrees of the council of Basle (1431) were not all ratified by the pope.

17 Can. 1 of our Code.

18 Art. 5 (Denzinger, Enchiridion, n. 551).

19 Denzinger, l. c., n. 653.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the papacy.[20] Hence no appeal is possible from the Pope to an ecumenical council. To admit such an appeal would, moreover, be tantamount to maintaining that a council can appeal to itself, since a general council is unthinkable without the supreme head. Wherefore Pope Zosimus (418) justly wrote to Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, that the authority of the Apostolic See is so great that no one can revise its sentences.[21]

Regarding the death of the Roman Pontiff during a council, Pius X established that as soon as the notice thereof should reach the council, wherever it be held, all sessions and meetings and enactments of decrees or canons should be immediately stopped, and nothing further done until the new Pontiff ordered its resumption and continuance. A council has no share in the election of the Pontiff, this prerogative being reserved to the Cardinals.[22]

20 Pius II (who as Aeneas Silvius inclined to the same theory) "Execrabilis," Jan. 18, 1459; Conc. Vatic., Sess. IV, c. 3.

21 Ep. 12 (Migne, 20, 676).

22 "Vacante Sede Apostolica," n. 28.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

THE CARDINALS OF THE HOLY ROMAN CHURCH

Pope Fabian (236–251) divided the (14) regions of Augustus into seven ecclesiastical districts, over which seven deacons should preside, who took care of the temporal affairs of the Church. With the growth of the number of the faithful the number of these diaconiae also increased. In the seventh century we read of diaconiae monasterii, entrusted to monks, from among whom the superior of each diaconia or charitable institute was taken. Henceforth an indefinite number of regionary deacons appear, and their office or charge is designated according to the name of the church attached to each diaconia. Thus in the pontificate of Hadrian I (772–775) 18 such deacons are mentioned. In the eleventh century the deacons presiding over these institutes were called cardinales diaconi.[1] These formed a conspicuous part of the Roman clergy and were often employed for papal legacies and other important affairs.

At the time of the same Pope, Fabian, and most probably even earlier, there were in the city of Rome a number (at first 28, later 48 or 49) churches (more particularly those built above the sepulchres of martyrs) which were called tituli, after the saint whose relics were there preserved, or for some other special reason (e. g., titulus pastoris, St. Pudenziana). Furthermore there were four 1 Liber Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, 1880, I, 148, 519, 522, 364; Kehr, Regesta Pontif. Rom., 1906, I, 3 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

principal churches,[2] which were considered baptismal churches and penitential churches, and around which the other churches or tituli with their clergy were grouped. For as each church had its clergyman, especially assigned to or incardinated into it, so the principal churches had their special or incardinated clergy, who had to serve there and nowhere else. Here we have the origin of the name "cardinal"; it means a clergyman incardinated in a special church which enjoys a certain preëminence, and since the Church of Rome was considered the principal church among all the churches of the world, its clergy, especially those incardinated in one of the ancient tituli, took precedence over the rest in rank and dignity. To the Roman clergy employed in these titular churches, after the 16th century,[3] were reserved the title and rank of cardinals.

Add to these cardinal deacons and cardinal priests the seven suburbicarian bishops, who since the time of Stephen III (768–772) were summoned to perform the liturgical functions each week at the Lateran Basilica,[4] and you have the College of Cardinals.

The energetic John VIII (872–882) employed the cardinal clergy as counsellors, who had to meet at one or the other diaconia or church at least once a month, and twice a week at the papal palace in the Lateran.[5] Still more conspicuous and important grew the cardinal's office after Nicolaus II (1059) and Alexander III (1179) placed the papal election entirely into the hands of the 2 Pope Simplicius (468–483) "constituit ad S. Petrum apostolum et ad S. Paulum apostolum et ad S. Laurentium martyrem ebdomadas ut presbyteri manerent propter penitentes et baptismum." Lib. Pont., I, 249; later on S. Maria ad praesepe was added to the three.

3 There were "cardinals" also at Cologne. Hinschius, K.-R., I, 321 f.

4 Mabillon, Museum Italicum, 1724, II, 574.

5 Kehr, l. c., I, 6, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cardinals of the Roman Church.[6] Under Innocent III (1196–1229), after synods had come into disuse, the Cardinals formed a permanent consistory of the Pope, and were convoked two or three times a week, or as often as affairs were urgent.

It was but natural that the precedence of Cardinals over other prelates should gradually manifest itself. At the IInd Council of Lyons (1174) they rank higher than archbishops and bishops; in the 14th century they precede even the patriarchs. Two centuries later no prelate outside the college of Roman Cardinals was allowed to call himself cardinal. Finally, the Ceremoniale Cardinalium (May 4, 1706) vindicated to the cardinals the title of Princes of the Holy Roman Church.[7]

The number of Cardinals differed at various times, according to the number of titular churches. The Council of Constance and Bâsle allowed only 24, but Sixtus V established 70, in imitation of the 70 seniors of the old Law, 14 deacons, 50 priests and six bishops.[8]

OFFICE AND RANK OF CARDINALS

CAN. 230

S. R. E. Cardinales Senatum Romani Pontificis constituunt eidemque in regenda Ecclesia praecipui consiliarii et adiutores assistunt.

The Cardinals form the senate of the Roman Pontiff and are his main counsellors and helpers in the government of the Church.

6 C. 1, Dist. 23; c. 6, X, I, 6; Galante, Fontes Iuris Canonici, 1906, p. 414 f.

7 Bangen, Die Röm. Curie, 1864, p. 462; Hinschius, l. c., I, 319.

8 "Postquam," Dec. 3, 1586; "Religiosa," April 13, 1587; Galante, l. c., 467 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 231

§ 1. Sacrum Collegium in tres ordines distribuitur: episcopalem, ad quem soli pertinent sex Cardinales dioecesibus suburbicariis praepositi; presbyteralem, qui constat Cardinalibus quinquaginta; diaconalem, qui quatuordecim.

§ 2. Cardinalibus ordinis presbyteralis ac diaconalis suus cuique titulus aut diaconia in Urbe assignatur a Romano Pontifice.

The Sacred College is divided into three orders: that of bishops, to which class the six suburbicarian prelates belong; that of priests, fifty in number; that of deacons, fourteen in number.

Each of the cardinal priests and deacons has his own title or diaconia assigned to him by the Roman Pontiff.

It is not necessary to enlarge upon the exalted office of cardinals. They are, as Eugene IV said, "the hinges upon which the government of the whole Church turns," [9] or, as Sixtus V called them, the "two eyes of the Pontiff." [10]

The six suburbicarian bishoprics are: Porto S. Rufina, Albano, Palestrina, Sabina, Frascati, and Velletri.[11] The cardinal priests' titles are fifty different churches, to which, as said above, a certain number of clerics, among them a presbyter, were assigned. The deacons' churches were originally charitable institutions with oratories attached to them.

The cardinals take solemn possession of their titles after they have been announced in the public consistory. They are, or were in former times, supposed to take ma-

9 "Non mediocri," 1439, § 4.
10 "Postquam," Dec. 3, 1586.
11 Pius X, "Edita a Nobis," May 5, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 219 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

terial care of their churches, juxta posse,[12] and enjoy a certain jurisdiction over the titular clergy.[13]

CREATION AND QUALIFICATIONS OF CARDINALS

CAN. 232

§ 1. Cardinales libere a Romano Pontifice ex toto terrarum orbe eliguntur, viri, saltem in ordine presbyteratus constituti, doctrina, pietate ac rerum agendarum prudentia egregie praestantes.

§ 2. A cardinalatus dignitate arcentur:

1.° Illegitimi, etiamsi per subsequens matrimonium fuerint legitimati; itemque alii irregulares vel a sacris ordinibus impediti secundum canonicas sanctiones, etsi cum ipsis auctoritate apostolica fuerit ad ordines et dignitates etiam episcopalem dispensatum;

2.° Qui prolem etiam ex legitimo matrimonio susceptam, vel nepotem ex ea habent;

3.° Qui primo aut secundo gradu consanguinitatis alicui Cardinali viventi coniuncti sunt.

CAN. 233

§ 1. Cardinales creantur et publicantur a Romano Pontifice in Consistorio sicque creati et publicati obtinent ius ad electionem Romani Pontificis et privilegia de quibus in can. 239.

§ 2. Si tamen Romanus Pontifex creationem alicuius in Consistorio annuntiaverit, eius nomine sibi in pectore reservato, sic promotus nullis interim gaudet 12 The Liber Pontificalis records many donations made by popes to their former titular churches, and well known is the generosity of the late Cardinal Rampolla to S. Cecilia.

13 Cf. can. 240, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cardinalium iuribus aut privilegiis, sed, postquam a Romano Pontifice eius nomen publicatum fuerit, iisdem fruitur a publicatione, iure vero praecedentiae a reservatione in pectore.

CAN. 234

Promotus absens a Curia debet in recipiendo bireto rubro iurare se intra annum, nisi legitimo detineatur impedimento, Summum Pontificem aditurum.

CAN. 235

Nisi aliter in casibus particularibus fuerit a Sancta Sede provisum, per promotionem ad sacram purpuram non solum ipso facto vacant dignitates omnes, ecclesiae, beneficia quae promotus possideat, sed etiam pensiones ecclesiasticae amittuntur.

The dignity or office of a cardinal is of merely human or rather ecclesiastical institution,[14] but from time immemorial was reserved exclusively to the Pope, although, as said above, a cardinal clergy existed also elsewhere.[15] Hence the admission of so-called "crown cardinals," whom certain monarchs recommended to the Pope, was really nothing else but connivance on the part of the Holy See, and constituted no right in the strict sense of the word. The question put to the Cardinals in the secret consistory: "Placetne vobis," by which the Pope seems to ask the consent of the patres purpurati already created, is a mere ceremony.[16]

14 A solid doubt or controversy as to the ecclesiastical institution of the cardinalate, as Smith, Elements, I, n. 488 insinuates, cannot be maintained; cfr. Wernz, l. c., II, n. 624 (p. 706, ed. 1.).

15 C. 17, 6°, I, 6.

16 Wernz, l. c., n. 625.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The qualifications required for the cardinalate are partly stated by the Council of Trent,[17] and partly in the Constitution "Postquam" of Sixtus V, Dec. 3, 1585. At present, in addition, the priesthood is absolutely required.

Excluded by law (from which, however, the Pope may grant a dispensation) are the following:

(a) Persons born of illegitimate wedlock, even though they be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents, or rendered capable of holding ecclesiastical dignities by Apostolic dispensation; hence the parents must have lived in lawful wedlock at the birth of the candidate.

(b) Those who are irregular, either defectu or delicto, for the reception of sacred orders or for the exercise thereof, although made capable by Apostolic dispensation.

(c) All persons who have legitimate or illegitimate offspring, male or female, or grandsons or granddaughters;

(d) Brothers who are either of the same parents or of one parent only: father's or mother's, brother's or sister's sons (cousins-german), paternal or maternal uncles, and grandsons of either father's or mother's side cannot be cardinals at the same time.[18]

The mode of creating Cardinals is left to the Roman Pontiff. However, as a rule, the Pope creates them and publishes their names in a secret consistory,[19] at which only the Cardinals already created are de iure present, and from this moment the new cardinals begin to enjoy cardinalitial rights and privileges. In a sub-

17 Sess. 24, c. 1 de ref.

18 "Postquam," § 17 f.

19 Pius V, Jan. 26, 1571; Gregory XV, "Decet," March 12, 1622, modified the Constitution of Eugene IV, "In eminenti," Oct. 26, 1431.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sequent public consistory, to which, among others, the diplomatic corps, dignitaries, clergy and laity are admitted, they receive the red hat and take the oath of fidelity to the Pope.

A special mode, which was first made use of by Martin V (1417–1431), is that of reserving a cardinal's name in petto; i. e., the Pope, by an act of his will, creates a cardinal, but for special reasons does not immediately publish his name. The one thus made a cardinal "in petto" must await publication before he can exercise the rights and prerogatives of a cardinal; but his precedence dates from the time of the secret consistory when the Pope announced the reservation. Thus Pius IX, on March 18, 1875, created five cardinals "in petto." Had he died before making their names known, the five purpurae would have died with him, had he not provided a means of carrying out his will by testament. However, this is an unsafe way, liable to cause dispute and confusion, and it is better that the names of such reservati be published before the Pope's demise.[20]

Persons promoted to the cardinalate while absent from Rome, generally receive the red biretta by a special envoy, and upon receiving it must promise under oath to visit Rome within a year.[21]

What canon 235 states is nothing else but the general prohibition of a plurality of offices. However, concerning the loss of dignities, it is evident that the episcopal dignity is not forfeited, but rather exalted by the cardinalate, though as to churches it must be noticed that a bishop promoted to the cardinalate only virtually, not actually, loses his bishopric, insofar namely, as the pope is entitled to keep him at his court if he deems fit. As 20 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 31, n. 23 f.

21 "Postquam," § 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to benefices other than episcopal, they are lost; hence also commendae seem, at least de iure, now lost as well as pensions.[22]

OPTION

CAN. 236

§ 1. Per optionem in Consistorio factam et a Summo Pontifice approbatam, possunt, servata prioritate ordinis et promotionis, Cardinales ex ordine presbyterali transire ad alium titulum et Cardinales ex ordine diaconali ad aliam diaconiam et, si per integrum decennium in ordine diaconali permanserint, etiam ad ordinem presbyteralem.

§ 2. Cardinalis ex ordine diaconali, transiens per optionem ad ordinem presbyteralem, locum obtinet ante omnes illos Cardinales presbyteros, qui post ipsum ad sacrae purpurae honorem assumpti sunt.

§ 3. Suburbicaria si vacet sedes, Cardinales ex ordine presbyterali, qui momento vacationis praesentes fuerint in Curia vel ab ea absentes ad tempus ob sibi commissum negotium aliquod a Romano Pontifice, optare eam possunt in Consistorio, servata prioritate promotionis.

§ 4. Cardinales quibus una ex ecclesiis suburbicariis est assignata, aliam optare nequeunt; cum vero Cardinalis gradum Decani attigerit, dioecesim suam Ostiensi cumulat, quae proinde cum alia atque alia dioecesi suburbicaria in persona Cardinalis Decani semper coniungitur.

22 It is a fact, as Wernz (l. c., II, n. 632) justly observes, that commandae were so far retained, and can. 1298 seems to confirm that view; but our canon is absolute, wherefore to combine both, we must say that commendae possessed before promotion are lost, but may be re-obtained with the permission of the Pope after promotion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon deals with the right of option, i. e., the right of a Cardinal to choose a higher rank, or another church within the same rank of a better class or greater renown by reason of antiquity or distinction and income. This is especially the case in the suburbicarian bishoprics. Velletri has for centuries been united with Ostia, whose cardinal bishop always was and still is dean of the Sacred College. Pope Pius X, the solicitous pastor, rearranged the suburbicarian sees. He assigned suffragans to all of them (Velletri and Sabina had suffragans before) [23] with a salary of six thousand Lire ($1150), besides other rights and prerogatives. Four years later he separated Velletri from Ostia, which latter is no longer a suburbicarian see, but always in the hands of the Cardinal Dean. There being only six suburbicarian sees and six cardinal bishops, it happens that the Cardinal Dean is bishop of a real suburbicarian bishopric and at the same time bishop of Ostia.[24] The reason for this change is obvious. The Pope wished to remedy the frequent changes of the holders of these sees, which could only be achieved by uniting Ostia [25] with one of the six other sees and denying the right to all of the incumbents. Ostia having always been the privileged see to which the rank of dean was attached, it was natural that this see should not be suppressed, but made an additional title to one of the other suburbicarian sees: Porto S. Rufina, Albano, Palestrina, Sabina, Frascati, Velletri. Thus now the rank of dean does not depend on the see of Ostia, but solely on the time of promotion to a suburbicarian bishopric. We may add that the suf-

23 "Apostolicae Romanorum," April 15, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 277 ff.).

24 "Edita a Nobis," May 5, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 219 ff.).

25 The diocese of Ostia is insignificant as to population.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fragans of these six sees have again been abolished and the status quo restored.[26]

THE SACRED COLLEGE AS A CORPORATION

CAN. 237

§ 1. Sacro Cardinalium Collegio praeest Decanus, idest antiquior promotione ad aliquam sedem suburbicariam, cui tamen nulla est in ceteros Cardinales iurisdictio, sed ipse primus habetur inter aequales.

§ 2. Vacante decanatu, ipso iure succedit Subdecanus, sive is tempore vacationis sit praesens in Curia, sive in sua suburbicaria dioecesi commoretur, sive absit ad tempus ob sibi commissum munus a Romano Pontifice.

Since the time of Alexander III (1159–1181), when the cardinal clergy of Rome obtained the exclusive power of electing the Pope,[27] the tendency to corporative union among them asserted itself more and more. In course of time they also increased their independence and improved their material condition,[28] so that their revenues became far from insignificant. The temporal administration was in the hands of a chamberlain (camerlengo) elected by the body of cardinals, who, however, must not be confounded with the camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church. Their income was distributed twice a year among the cardinals de curia, including the papal legates. This distribution was called rotulus cardinalitius.[29] Our 26 Benedict XV, "Exactis," Feb. 1, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 229 ff.); the other enactments are left untouched in the Code.

27 C. 6, X, I, 6 de electione.

28 Cf. Sägmüller, Tätigkeit u. Stellung der Kardinäle, 1896, p. 170 ff.

29 Benedict XIV, "In regimine," Feb. 3, 1745, complains of cardinals, who are not de curia, coming to Rome twice a year simply to receive the rotulus; cfr. Bened. XIII, "Romani Pontificis," Sept. 7, 1724; Clement XII, "Pastorale officium," Jan. 10, 1731.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Code is silent about the camerarius, whilst the dean and subdean are mentioned. It is a fact that the significance of the College as such, as well as the rotulus, have lost much of their former importance.

DUTIES AND PRIVILEGES OF CARDINALS

CAN. 238

§ 1. Cardinales tenentur obligatione residendi in Curia, nec fas est ipsis ab eadem discedere sine licentia Romani Pontificis, salvo praescripto §§ 2, 3 huius canonis.

§ 2. Haec obligatio urget quoque Cardinales Episcopos suburbicarios; sed ipsi non indigent licentia ut sese conferant ad dioeceses sibi commissas, quoties opportunum iudicaverint.

§ 3. Cardinales qui sunt Episcopi alicuius dioecesis non suburbicariae, lege residendi in Curia eximuntur; sed cum ad Urbem venerint, Summum Pontificem adeant, nec ab Urbe discedant antequam ab eodem abeundi licentiam impetraverint.

The duty of residence follows from the nature of the cardinalitial office, the Cardinals being counsellors and assistants to the Sovereign Pontiff.[80] Although the suburbicarian cardinal bishops are bound by the law of residing in Rome, yet the Pope always grants them tacit, and now through the Code express permission to visit their dioceses, thus interpreting, not abolishing, the divine law of residence.[81]

What we said above concerning the loss of a bishopric, which naturally follows one's elevation to the cardinalate, is here corroborated. It is an implied dispensation from 80 C. 17, 6°, I, 6.

81 Benedict XIV, "Ad universae," Sept. 3, 1746; De Syn. Dioec., VII, 1, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the law prohibiting a plurality of offices. Diocesan residence is here preferred to residence in curia.

CAN. 239

1. Praeter alia privilegia quae in hoc Codice suis in titulis enumerantur, Cardinales omnes a sua promotione in Consistorio facultate gaudent:

1.° Audiendi ubique terrarum confessiones etiam religiosorum utriusque sexus et absolvendi ab omnibus peccatis et censuris etiam reservatis, exceptis tantum censuris Sedi Apostolicae specialissimo modo reservatis et illis quae adnexae sunt revelationi secreti S. Officii; [32]

2.° Sibi suisque familiaribus [33] eligendi sacerdotem confessionibus excipiendis, qui, si iurisdictione careat, eam ipso iure obtinet, etiam quod spectat ad peccata et censuras, reservatas quoque, illis tantum censuris exceptis, de quibus in n. 1;

3.° Verbum Dei ubique praedicandi;

4.° Celebrandi vel alii permittendi ut coram se celebret unam Missam in feria V maioris hebdomadae ac tres Missas in nocte Nativitatis Domini;

5.° Benedicendi ubique, solo crucis signo, cum omnibus indulgentiis a Sancta Sede concedi solitis, rosaria, aliasque coronas [34] precatorias, cruces, numismata, statuas, scapularia a Sede Apostolica probata eaque imponendi sine onere inscriptionis;

32 This oath is imposed on the employees of the Holy Office and the S. C. Consistorialis; cfr. A. Ap. S., I, 82.

33 Familiares are those who habitually serve cardinals or bishops as domestics and depend on them for their livelihood; cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 20, n. 122.

34 Other coronae or rosaries are those of St. Brigid, of the Seven Sorrows of the B. V. Mary, and of the Immaculate Conception, the corona Domini; cfr. Putzer, Comment. in Facult. Apost., 1897, p. 355.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6.° Sub unica benedictione erigendi, in ecclesiis et oratoriis etiam privatis aliisque piis locis, stationes Viae Crucis cum omnibus indulgentiis, quae huiusmodi pium exercitium peragentibus impertitae sunt; nec non benedicendi pro fidelibus, qui causa infirmitatis vel alius legitimi impedimenti sacras stationes Viae Crucis visitare nequeant, Crucifixi icones [35] cum applicatione omnium indulgentiarum devoto exercitio eiusdem Viae Crucis a Romanis Pontificibus adnexarum;

7.° Celebrandi super aram portatilem non solum in domo propriae habitationis, sed ubicunque degunt; et permittendi ut alia Missa, ipsis adstantibus, celebretur;

8.° Celebrandi in mari, debitis cautelis adhibitis; [36]

9.° In omnibus ecclesiis et oratoriis Missam celebrandi proprio calendario conformem;

10.° Fruendi altari privilegiato personali quotidiano;

11.° Lucrandi in propriis sacellis indulgentias, ad quas acquirendas praescripta sit visitatio templi alicuius vel publicae aediculae civitatis seu loci, in quo Cardinales actu commorentur, quo privilegio etiam eorum familiares frui possunt;

12.° Benedicendi ubique populo more Episcoporum; sed in Urbe in ecclesiis tantum, piis locis et fidelium consessibus;

13.° More Episcoporum gestandi crucem ante pectus etiam supra mozetam atque utendi mitra et baculo pastorali;

14.° Sacrum celebrandi in quolibet privato sacello

[35] Cf. Putzer, l. c., p. 366 f.

[36] Cfr. can. 349, where the conditions are mentioned in the commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sine praeiudicio illius qui indulto gaudet;[87]

15.° Pontificalia cum throno et baldachino peragendi in omnibus ecclesiis extra Urbem, Ordinario praemonito, si ecclesia sit cathedralis;

16.° Honoribus locorum Ordinariis tribui solitis fruendi quocunque se conferant;

17.° Fidem faciendi in foro externo, de oraculo pontificio testantes;[88]

18.° Fruendi sacello ab Ordinarii visitatione exempto;

19.° De reditibus beneficiariis libere disponendi etiam per testamentum, salvo praescripto can. 1298;

20.° Consecrationes et benedictiones ecclesiarum, altarium, sacrae suppellectilis, Abbatum aliasve similes, excepta oleorum sacrorum consecratione, si Cardinalis charactere episcopali careat, ubique locorum, servatis servandis, peragendi, firmo praescripto can. 1157;

21.° Praecedendi omnibus Praelatis etiam Patriarchis, immo ipsis Legatis Pontificiis, nisi Legatus sit Cardinalis in proprio territorio residens; Cardinalis autem Legatus a latere praecedit extra Urbem omnibus aliis;

22.° Conferendi primam tonsuram et ordines minores, dummodo promovendus habeat dimissorias proprii Ordinarii litteras;

23.° Ministrandi sacramentum confirmationis, firmo onere inscriptionis nominis confirmati ad normam iuris;[89]

24.° Concedendi indulgentias ducentorum dierum,

87 Hence the chaplain may say another Mass, at which those endowed with the indult may assist, as well as at that of the Cardinal.

88 Cfr. can. 79; a privilege given orally by the pope, but testified to by a cardinal, may be vindicated also in foro externo.

89 Cfr. can. 798 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

etiam toties quoties lucrandas, in locis vel institutis ac pro personis suae iurisdictionis vel protectionis; item in aliis locis, sed a praesentibus solummodo, singulis vicibus, lucrandas.[40]

§ 2. Cardinalis Decanus gaudet privilegio ordinandi et consecrandi electum Pontificem, si hic ordinatione vel episcopali consecratione indigeat, et tunc pallio utitur; quod privilegium, absente Cardinali Decano, competit Subdecano, eoque etiam absente, antiquiori Cardinali Episcopo suburbicario.

§ 3. Demum Cardinalis Proto-diaconus pallia Archiepiscopis et Episcopis privilegio fruentibus eorumve procuratoribus, vice Romani Pontificis, imponit; et nomen novi electi Pontificis populo annuntiat.[41]

To this specific, though not quite exhaustive,[42] enumeration of privileges we add the insignia of cardinals:

(1) The red hat granted by Innocent IV (1245) to cardinals of the secular and by Gregory XIV (1591) also to those of the regular clergy;

(2) The red biretta, in use probably since Paul II (1464);

(3) The red mantle or sacred purple, in use since Boniface VIII. The Cardinals of the regular (exempt) clergy, with the exception of the Society of Jesus,[43] retain in their dress the color of their order.

40 This would mean that those present in the places subject to the jurisdiction of the Cardinal could gain the indulgence as often as the Cardinal would grant it, even several times in one day, nay that the indulgence would, as it were, be attached to the place itself; whilst outside the institutes of their protection or jurisdiction, this indulgence could be gained only once a day by those personally present.

41 The announcement is made by the cardinal deacon from the balcony of St. Peter's, which is directed towards the piazza.

42 Other privileges are mentioned in can. 2227, 2241–44.

43 The former cardinal Vaszary of Hungary, O.S.B., had the privilege of wearing the purple dress.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In the seasons of Advent and Lent the crimson gives way to violet.

(4) The title "Eminence," or eminentissime princeps, was so strongly insisted on by Urban VII, that a refusal to acknowledge it was held sufficient to cause a break of diplomatic relations.[44]

RIGHTS OF CARDINALS IN THEIR TITLES AND SEDE VACANTE

CAN. 240

§ 1. Cardinalis ad sedem suburbicariam promotus et in eiusdem possessionem canonice immissus est verus Episcopus suae dioecesis, eaque potestate in eam pollet, quam Episcopi residentiales in propria dioecesi obtinent.

§ 2. Ceteri Cardinales in suis titulis vel diaconiis, postquam eorundem canonicam possessionem ceperint, omnia possunt quae locorum Ordinarii in suis ecclesiis, exceptis ordine iudiciorum et qualibet iurisdictione in fideles, sed salva potestate in iis quae ad disciplinam, morum correctionem, servitium ecclesiae pertinent.

§ 3. Cum throno et baldachino Cardinalis ordinis presbyteralis potest in suo titulo pontificalia peragere et Cardinalis ordinis diaconalis in sua diaconia pontificaliter assistere, et nemo alius ibidem id potest sine Cardinalis assensu; in aliis vero Urbis ecclesiis Cardinales throno et baldachino uti nequeunt sine licentia Romani Pontificis.

The obligations and privileges attached to the suburbicarian sees, whose incumbents are bishops or ordinaries [44] Decree of June 10, 1630.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the true sense of the word, have been defined by Paul IV and lately by Pius X.[45]

As to § 2 it should be remembered that Cardinals formerly[46] enjoyed a quasi-episcopal jurisdiction in their respective titles. This, however, was limited by Innocent XII in his Constitution "Romanus Pontifex," of Sept. 17, 1692, to what now remains: a domestic or paternal power, which consists in admonition and the infliction of penalties that require no trial, and in the proper maintenance of the divine service.

Regarding the right of pontificals note that even the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, if he wishes to pontificate in one of the titular churches, needs the consent of the Cardinal to whom the title belongs, as was solemnly decided by Leo XIII in the case of the Basilica Eudoxiana (S. Pietro in Vincoli).[47]

CAN. 241

Sede Apostolica vacante, Sacrum Cardinalium Collegium et Romana Curia non aliam habent potestatem, quam quae definitur in const. Pii X Vacante Sede Apostolica, 25 Dec. 1904.

The powers which the Sacred College of Cardinals and the Roman tribunals enjoy during the vacancy of the Apostolic See are defined by Pius X in the Constitution "Vacante Sede Apostolica," Dec. 25, 1904, which determines that

(1) All the powers which require the express approval

45 "Cum venerabilis," Aug. 22, 1555; Pius X, "Apostolicae Romanorum," April 15, 1909 (A. Ap. S., II, 277 ff.

46 C. 11, X, I, 33; Sixtus V, "Religiosa," April 13, 1589; Fagnani, in c. cit. 11, n. 19 ff.

47 Jan. 30, 1879; S. Rit. C., Sept. 15, 1668; Dec. 1903; Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 31, n. 34 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the Pope, i. e., such as cannot be exercised except "verbo facto cum Sño," or "Ex audientia SSmi.," or "vigore specialium et extraordinariarum facultatum," are suspended;

(2) That the ordinary faculties remain, but should not be made use of except in cases of minor importance, or in more important cases which suffer no delay; and in the latter the matter should be entrusted to the Cardinal Prefect and some Cardinals of that Congregation which would probably decide, but their decision should be only provisional, until a new Pontiff is elected.[48]

[48] Const. cit., nn. 22–25.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER IV

THE ROMAN COURT

It is evident that the Sovereign Pontiff is unable to provide personally for all the needs of the universal Church. His coadjutors are the bishops and members of what is known as the Papal Court,— Curia Romana, from the habitual residence of the Pope.

The name curia is derived either from the Latin cura (care) or quiris (Roman citizen), and signifies either the temple around which the curiae romanae gathered, or the place where the senate assembled to look after the public welfare, as Varro insinuates.[1]

The term Curia Romana has a threefold meaning: (a) in the strict sense it comprises the Sacred Congregations, tribunals, and offices to which the business of the whole Church is entrusted; (b) in a wider sense it embraces not only the three above-mentioned dicasteria but also the so-called familia pontificia, which consists of the servants and coadjutors of the Papal Court as well as honorary prelates and knights. (c) In the strictest sense it comprises only the so-called curiales or minor officials — lawyers, notaries, procurators, speditori, agents,[2] etc. In what sense the term is used, must be determined in each instance from the context.

1 Cfr. Forcellini, Lexicon, s. v. "Curia."

2 Bangen, Die Römische Curie, 1854, p. 7; Hilling, Die Röm. Kurie, 1896, p. 4 (English, New York 1907). Lega, in Annal. Eccl., 1896, t. 4, p. 46; A. Ap. S., I, 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Historically the Curia Romana developed pari passu with the Papal State and power. The term "curia" was almost unknown up to the 12th century,[3] when it occurs in the so-called Ordo Romanus X. But the rapid growth of the papacy during the three subsequent centuries created tribunals of far-reaching influence, especially the Chancery, the Dataria, and the Rota Romana, the Secretary Nepos who was later merged with the Secretary of State, and a host of minor offices (officia vacabilia). Still it was only after the Council of Trent (1545–1563) that the Curia Romana in its present-day sense was completed. Pius IV and his successors, especially Sixtus V (1585–1590), created the Roman Congregations, upon which devolved the burden of supervising the ordinary affairs of the universal Church. The policy established under Julius II (1503–1513) drew the various civil governments, now awakening to national consciousness, into diplomatic relations with the Papal Court.[4] All this enhanced the splendor of the papacy, and at the same time increased the legislative and administrative activities of the Curia. Hence it is not surprising that the Cardinals began to assert their importance at the court and in the special congregations and tribunals.

Of these we shall now treat, as reorganized by Pope Pius X.[5]

CAN. 242

Curia Romana constat Sacris Congregationibus, Tribunalibus et Officiis, prout inferius enumerantur et describuntur.

3 "Exit domnus papa de palatio cum episcopis et cardinalibus, et cum toto apparatu curiae." Mabillon, Museum Italicum, 1724, II, p. 97; Migne, P. L., 78, 1009.

4 Sixtus V, "Immensa," Jan. 22, 1587.

5 "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 243

§ 1. In singulis Congregationibus, Tribunalibus, Officiis servanda est disciplina et tractanda sunt negotia secundum normas tum generales tum particulares, quas ipsis Romanus Pontifex praestituerit.

§ 2. Omnes qui ad Congregationes, Tribunalia, Officia Romanae Curiae pertinent, ad secretum servandum tenentur intra fines et secundum modum ex disciplina unicuique propria determinatum.

CAN. 244

§ 1. Nihil grave aut extraordinarium in iisdem Congregationibus, Tribunalibus, Officiis agatur, nisi a Moderatoribus eorundem Romano Pontifici fuerit ante significatum.

§ 2. Gratiae quaevis ac resolutiones indigent pontificia approbatione, exceptis iis pro quibus eorundem Officiorum, Tribunalium, Congregationum Moderatoribus speciales facultates tributae sint, exceptisque sententiis Tribunalis Sacrae Romanae Rotae et Signaturae Apostolicae.

CAN. 245

Controversiam, si qua exoriatur, de competentia inter Sacras Congregationes, Tribunalia vel Officia Romanae Curiae, dirimit coetus S. R. E. Cardinalium, quos Romanus Pontifex singulis vicibus designaverit.

The Code adopts the general arrangement made by Pius X in his Constitution "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908, which was followed by the "Ordo Servandus in Romana Curia."[6] The duty of secrecy is severest for the [6] A. Ap. S., I, 36 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

members of the "Holy Office," who are bound to it under penalty of excommunication most especially reserved to the Holy See.[7]

The so-called routine or system observed at the Curia we need not set forth here. But it may not be amiss to cite chapter X of the "Ordo,"[8] which ordains that any Catholic may have recourse to the offices of the Curia, either personally or by means of an agent chosen from among those approved by the Curia.

Ordinaries may treat with the Curia either personally or by mail. If an Ordinary wishes to negotiate without a lawyer, he must direct his petition to the respective Congregation, Tribunal or Office, where note is taken thereof with the accompanying words: personalis pro ordinario. But if he wishes to employ the services of an agent or lawyer, he is obliged to take one of those approved by the Curia.

As to the agents of the bishops, the same "Ordo" prescribes that they must be Catholics of good reputation and know Latin and Canon Law. If the agent is a priest, or at least in sacred orders, he must have permission from the Cardinal Vicar to reside in Rome. One who wishes to be approved as an agent must submit a petition to the assessor of the S. C. Consistorialis. If admitted, his name is placed upon the list of official agents.[9] There are many experienced agents in Rome from among whom the Ordinaries may choose.

Can. 245 is an entirely new enactment. Formerly the Signatura Apostolica had power to settle all controversies about competency, which were quite frequent when the "Sapienti consilio" first went into effect.

[7] A. Ap. S., I, p. 82 f.
[8] Ib., p. 53 f.
[9] Ib., p. 49 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. I

THE SACRED CONGREGATIONS

Sixtus V instituted fifteen congregations;[10] but in course of time some were overburdened, while others lost their importance. This led Pius X to issue a Constitution which treats minutely of the reorganization of the Roman Court[11] (Curia in the strict sense). This order was to remain in force, and, despite the difficulties arising from the competency of various Congregations, has remained in force with only one exception, made by the present pontiff, Benedict XV, in his allocution of March 22nd, 1917, when the Congr. of the Index was suppressed, or rather combined with the Holy Office, whilst the department of Indulgences, formerly attached to the Holy Office, was joined to the S. Poenitentiaria.[12] Besides this, Benedict XV has given a fuller title to the S. C. of Studies.

CAN. 246

Singulis Congregationibus praeest Cardinalis Praefectus vel, si eisdem praesit ipsemet Romanus Pontifex, eas dirigit Cardinalis Secretarius; quibus adiunguntur Cardinales quos Pontifex eis adscribendos censuerit, cum aliis necessariis administris.

THE HOLY OFFICE

This Congregation developed from the Inquisition. Its first traces are discernible in the canons issued by Lucius III, A. D. 1184, against the Waldenses and Albigenses. The civil authority (Frederick II and Louis IX)

10 "Immensa," Jan. 22, 1587.
11 "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, 7 ff.)
12 "Amplissimum collegium" (A. Ap. S., IX, 161 ff.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lent their assistance to the Church in combatting these heretics, and the Dominicans were chiefly entrusted with the unpleasant task of prosecution and procedure. Pope Paul III established the "Supreme Universal Inquisition" (1542) and Sixtus V added it to the Roman Congregations. Paul IV (1559) and Pius IV (1564) added the Index Commission to the Holy Office.[13]

CAN. 247

§ 1. Congregatio S. Officii, cui ipse Summus Pontifex praeest, tutatur doctrinam fidei et morum.

§ 2. Iudicat de iis delictis quae sibimet secundum propriam eiusdem legem reservantur, cum potestate has criminales causas videndi non solum in gradu appellationis a tribunali Ordinarii loci, sed etiam in prima instantia, si directe ad ipsam delatae fuerint.

§ 3. Ipsa sola cognoscit ea quae, sive directe sive indirecte, in iure aut in facto, circa privilegium, uti aiunt, Paulinum et matrimonii impedimenta disparitatis cultus et mixtae religionis versantur; itemque ad eam spectat facultas dispensandi in hisce impedimentis. Quare quaelibet huiusmodi quaestio ad hanc Congregationem est deferenda, quae tamen potest, si ita censeat et casus ferat, quaestionem remittere ad aliam Congregationem vel ad Tribunal Sacrae Romanae Rotae.

§ 4. Ad eandem pertinet non solum delatos sibi libros diligenter excutere, eos, si oportuerit, prohibere, et dispensationes concedere; sed etiam ex officio inquirere, qua opportuniore licebit via, quae in vulgus edantur scripta cuiuslibet generis damnanda, et in memo-

13 Cf. Hilling, Procedure of the Roman Court, 1907, p. 54 ff. Pius V and Sixtus V had established the Index as a special congregation; now it is again attached to the Holy Office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

riam Ordinariorum reducere, quam religiose teneantur in perniciosa scripta animadvertere eaque Sanctae Sedi denuntiare, ad normam can. 1397.

§ 5. Ipsa una competens est circa ea omnia quae ieiunium eucharisticum pro sacerdotibus Missam celebrantibus respiciunt.

The Holy Office, therefore, is competent in matters of faith and morals, and whatever touches the so-called privilegium Paulinum and the impediments of disparitas cultus and mixtae religionis; from which impediments it has the power to dispense. All such matters must be referred to that Congregation, which, however, may, if it thinks it opportune and the case permits, refer the question to another Congregation or to the tribunal of the S. R. Rota.

The Holy Office also acts as judge or censor of books, either allowing them to be published or condemning them, and this Congregation alone is competent to decide questions regarding the Eucharistic fast of priests celebrating Mass.

THE CONSISTORIAL CONGREGATION

As its name implies, this Congregation was instituted for the purpose of preparing the matter to be discussed and decided in consistory or meeting of the Cardinals with the Sovereign Pontiff. The subjects chiefly treated in these meetings were the erection of higher benefices and the provision of consistorial benefices. The present importance of this Congregation is due to the reorganization of the Curia by Pius X.

CAN. 248

§ 1. Congregationis Consistorialis Praefectus est

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ipse Romanus Pontifex. Praeter alios ad eandem pertinent ex officio Cardinales Secretarius S. Officii, Praefectus Congregationis de Seminariis et Universitatibus studiorum et Secretarius Status. Inter Consultores eiusdem semper sunt Assessor S. Officii, Secretarius Congregationis pro negotiis ecclesiasticis extraordinariis et Secretarius Congregationis de Seminariis et Universitatibus studiorum.

§ 2. Ad hanc Congregationem spectat non modo parare agenda in Consistoriis, sed praeterea, in locis Congregationi de Prop. Fide non obnoxiis, novas dioeceses ac provincias et capitula tum cathedralia tum collegialia constituere; dioeceses iam constitutas dividere; Episcopos, Administratores Apostolicos, Coadiutores et Auxiliares Episcoporum constituendos proponere, canonicas inquisitiones seu processus super promovendis indicere actosque diligenter expendere, ipsorum periclitari doctrinam, salvo praescripto can. 255.

§ 3. Ab hac Congregatione dependent ea omnia quae pertinent ad constitutionem, conservationem et statum dioecesium. Quare ipsa vigilat super impletis vel minus obligationibus, quibus Ordinarii tenentur; cognoscit ea quae ab Episcopis scripto relata sint de statu suarum dioecesium; indicit visitationes apostolicas examinatque eas quae fuerint absolutae, transmissis in utroque casu ad singulas Congregationes iis ad deliberandum negotiis quae ad eas peculiariter pertinent.

On the Consistorial Congregation at present devolves not only the preparation of matter for the consistories, but also, in places not subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide, the erection of new dioceses, provinces, cathedral and collegiate chapters; the division of dioceses; the proposal of bishops, Apostolic administrators, episcopal coadjutors and auxiliaries, and the so-called processus informativus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To this congregation also belongs whatever pertains to the constitution, preservation, and state of the various dioceses. It sees to it that the obligations of the Ordinaries are complied with; takes cognizance of the written report of the dioceses by the bishops, etc.

THE CONGREGATION OF THE SACRAMENTS

CAN. 249

§ 1. Congregationi de disciplina Sacramentorum proposita est universa legislatio circa disciplinam septem Sacramentorum, incolumi iure Congregationis S. Officii circa ea quae in can. 247 statuta sunt, et Sacrorum Rituum Congregationis circa ritus et caeremonias quae in Sacramentis conficiendis, ministrandis et recipiendis servari debent.

§ 2. Ad illam itaque spectant ea omnia, quae decerni concedique solent tum in disciplina matrimonii, tum in disciplina aliorum Sacramentorum nec non in celebratione Sacrificii Eucharistici, iis tantum exceptis quae aliis Congregationibus reservata sunt.

§ 3. Ipsa cognoscit quoque et exclusive de facto inconsummationis matrimonii et de exsistentia causarum ad dispensationem concedendam, nec non de iis omnibus, quae cum his sunt connexa. Potest tamen cognitionem horum omnium, si id expedire iudicaverit, ad Sacram Romanam Rotam remittere. Pariter ad eam deferri possunt quaestiones de validitate matrimonii, quas tamen, si accuratiorem disquisitionem aut investigationem exigant, ad tribunal competens remittat. Eodem modo ad ipsam pertinet videre de obligationibus ordinibus maioribus adnexis, atque examinare

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quaestiones de ipsa validitate sacrae ordinationis, aut eas ad tribunal competens remittere. Et ita porro de aliis Sacramentis.

The S. Congregation of the Sacraments is entirely new. This Congregation is occupied with whatever concerns the seven Sacraments, with the exception of what belongs to the jurisdiction of the Holy Office and the Congregation of Rites.

To it also is referred whatever pertains to the decision and granting of dispensations in matters of marriage and other Sacraments. This Congregation is alone competent to decide whether a marriage is consummated, whether the reasons for granting a dispensation truly exist, and all matters connected therewith. However, if it deems it expedient, it may refer any matter to the S. R. Romana. To the Congregation of the Sacraments may be reported questions concerning the validity of matrimony, but it will refer these to the competent tribunal if a more accurate examination or investigation is required. This Congregation is also competent to investigate the obligations arising from higher orders and to examine the validity of ordination or remit such cases to the competent tribunal. According to the "Sapienti Consilio," to the S. Congregation of the Sacraments must be addressed the following petitions:

(1) Concerning the preservation of the Blessed Sacrament in oratories which otherwise would not enjoy that privilege;

(2) Concerning the celebration of Mass in the open air, or on board a vessel, before dawn or after noon, or on Holy Thursday;

(3) Concerning the privilege of saying Mass de Beata or requiem on acccount of eye trouble;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(4) Concerning the privilege of private oratories with the right of having Mass said there.

Besides, as is plain from the text, this S. Congregation, perhaps the most occupied of all, is competent to grant dispensations from impediments of a public character, to rich and poor, so that "in forma pauperum" no longer pertains to the S. Poenitentiaria.

THE S. CONGREGATION OF THE COUNCIL

This Congregation was originally known as "S. Congregatio Cardinalium Concilii Tridentini Interpretum." It was instituted by Pius IV, Aug., 1564, and was charged with the execution of the reform decrees of the Council of Trent, to which Pius V added that of interpreting authentically the Tridentine decrees and settling controversies arising in connection therewith. The importance of this Congregation has diminished considerably since the S. C. of the Sacraments was established.

CAN. 250

§ 1. Congregationi Concilii ea pars negotiorum est commissa, quae ad universam disciplinam cleri saecularis populique christiani refertur.

§ 2. Quamobrem ipsius est curare ut christianae vitae praecepta serventur, cum facultate opportune ab eisdem fideles dispensandi; moderari quae parochos et canonicos spectant; aut quae pias sodalitates, pias uniones (etiamsi dependeant a religiosis vel erectae sint in eorum ecclesiis seu domibus), pia legata, pia opera, Missarum stipes, beneficia aut officia, bona ecclesiastica, mobilia et immobilia, tributa dioecesana, taxas curiarum episcopalium aliaquae huiusmodi attingunt. Eidem reservata est facultas eximendi a conditionibus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

requisitis ad assecutionem beneficiorum, quoties ad Ordinarios eorum collatio spectat; admittendi ad compositionem eos qui occuparunt bona ecclesiastica, etiam pertinentia ad religiosos; permittendi ut fideles acquirant bona ecclesiastica, a potestate civili usurpata.

§ 3. Videt quoque de iis omnibus, quae ad immunitatem ecclesiasticam pertinent, itemque de controversiis circa praecedentiam, salvo iure Congregationis de sodalibus religiosis et Congregationis Caeremonialis.

§ 4. Ad eandem pertinent ea omnia quae ad Conciliorum celebrationem et recognitionem atque ad Episcoporum coetus seu conferentias referuntur, extra loca quae subsunt Congregationi de Prop. Fide.

§ 5. Est autem haec Congregatio competens in omnibus controversiis negotia eidem commissa spectantibus, quas in linea disciplinari pertractandas censuerit; cetera ad tribunal competens sunt deferenda.

This Congregation, therefore, is competent in administrative matters pertaining to the secular clergy and to confraternities, beneficiary provisions, immunities, precedence. Besides it grants permission to hold councils, the documents and decrees of which must be submitted to it for approbation.

THE S. CONGREGATION OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 251

§ 1. Congregatio negotiis religiosorum sodalium praeposita ea sibi exclusive vindicat quae respiciunt regimen, disciplinam, studia, bona et privilegia religiosorum sodalium utriusque sexus tum sollemnibus tum simplicibus votis adstrictorum, eorumque qui, quamvis sine votis, in communi tamen vitam agunt more

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

religiosorum, itemque tertiorum Ordinum saecularium, incolumi iure Congregationis de Prop. Fide.

§ 2. Quapropter, quaestionibus ordine iudiciario tractandis ad tribunal competens remissis et incolumi semper iure Congregationis S. Officii et Congregationis Concilii circa negotia ad ipsas spectantia, haec Congregatio quaestiones omnes suae competentiae in linea disciplinari dirimit; sed si quaestio vertatur inter religiosum sodalem et personam non religiosam, ipsa, praesertim ad instantiam partis, potest quoque, si aequum iudicaverit, eandem quaestionem ad aliam Congregationem aut tribunal remittere.

§ 3. Huic denique Congregationi reservatur concessio dispensationum a iure communi pro sodalibus religiosis, firmo praescripto can. 247, § 5.

The S. Congregation of Religious is exclusively competent in whatever concerns the government, discipline, studies, property and privileges of religious of both sexes, either with solemn or simple vows, as also of such as have no vows but live a common life like religious, and of secular tertiaries.

Wherefore, with the exception of judiciary matters to be referred to the competent tribunals and of whatever pertains to the Holy Office and the S. C. of the Council, this Congregation settles all disciplinary questions belonging to its competency. To this Congregation is also reserved the granting of all dispensations to religious.

Formerly there existed a S. C. Episcoporum et Regularium, which had great authority and was probably instituted by Pius V; at least its regesta run from the end of the year 1572 and embrace a threefold division of cases: Episcoporum, Regularium, Monialium. The material was almost entirely collected by the Benedictines of St. Anselm's College when the reorganisation was effected but for some reason or another the Collectanea were never published.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE S. CONGREGATION OF THE PROPAGANDA

Since the Catholic Church began to spread across the seas, to the East and West Indies, and established missions in the countries newly added to its jurisdiction, she has taken particular care of these. Peculiar conditions called for special legislation, which was adapted to the "terrae missionum" as distinguished from the provinces of the regular hierarchy. In order to insure an orderly and stable procedure in the transaction of missionary matters Gregory XV, in 1622, founded this Congregation.[14] By Clement IX (1720) the same was entrusted with the revision of the books of Orientals. Pius IX reformed the Propaganda and created a new section "pro negotiis ritus orientalis" (1862), now detached.

The competency of the Propaganda is locally circumscribed by the so-called "mission territories." Several countries which formerly were subject to its jurisdiction (the U. S., England, Ireland, Scotland, Holland, Luxemberg, Canada) are now withdrawn from it and placed either under the regular hierarchy or among the "provinces of the Apostolic See."

CAN. 252

§ 1. Congregatio de Propaganda Fide missionibus ad praedicandum Evangelium et catholicam doctrinam 14 "Inscrutabili divinae," June 22, 1622. Urban VIII erected the Collegium Urbanum for the training of missionaries; it is entirely under the S. C. Prop. Fide.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

praeest, ministros necessarios constituit et mutat, facultatemque habet tractandi, agendi et exsequendi omnia hac in re necessaria et opportuna.

§ 2. Curat ea omnia quae ad Conciliorum celebrationem in locis sibi subiectis pertinent.

§ 3. Eius iurisdictio iis est circumscripta regionibus, ubi, sacra hierarchia nondum constituta, status missionis perseverat. Huic Congregationi sunt etiam subiectae regiones, quae, etsi hierarchia inibi constituta sit, adhuc inchoatum aliquid praeseferunt. Eidem pariter subsunt societates ecclesiasticorum ac Seminaria quae exclusive fundata sunt eo fine, ut in eis instituantur missionarii pro exteris missionibus, praesertim quod attinet ad eorum regulas, administrationem atque opportunas concessiones ad sacram ordinationem alumnorum requisitas.

§ 4. Haec autem Congregatio tenetur ad competentes Congregationes deferre negotia quae aut fidem attingunt, aut causas matrimoniales, aut generales normas circa sacrorum rituum disciplinam tradendas vel interpretandas.

§ 5. Quod vero spectat ad sodales religiosos, eadem Congregatio sibi vindicat quidquid religiosos qua missionarios, sive uti singulos sive simul sumptos, tangit. Quidquid vero religiosos qua tales, sive uti singulos sive simul sumptos attingit, ad Congregationem religiosorum negotiis praepositam remittat aut relinquat.

This Congregation presides over the missions, provides them with ministers, and has power to do whatever it deems necessary for their benefit.

Its jurisdiction is restricted to provinces which as yet have no hierarchic constitution, but are still in the missionary state. To it are subject also those regions in which the hierarchy is in an incipient state and all societies of ecclesiastics and seminaries founded exclusively for the foreign missions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to religious, this Congregation is competent in whatever touches them as missionaries, either individually or as a body. But whatever concerns religious as such must be referred to the Congregation of Religious.

THE S. CONGREGATION OF RITES

CAN. 253

§ 1. Congregatio Sacrorum Rituum ius habet videndi et statuendi ea omnia quae sacros ritus et caeremonias Ecclesiae Latinae proxime spectant, non autem quae latius ad sacros ritus referuntur, cuiusmodi sunt praecedentiae iura aliaque id genus, de quibus sive servato ordine iudiciario sive in linea disciplinari discepetur.

§ 2. Eius proinde est praesertim advigilare, ut sacri ritus ac caeremoniae diligenter serventur in Sacro celebrando, in Sacramentis administrandis, in divinis officiis persolvendis, in iis denique omnibus quae Ecclesiae Latinae cultum respiciunt; dispensationes concedere opportunas; insignia et honoris privilegia tam personalia et ad tempus, quam localia et perpetua, quae ad sacros ritus vel caeremonias pertineant, elargiri, et cavere ne in haec abusus irrepant.

§ 3. Denique ea omnia agit quae ad beatificationem et canonizationem Servorum Dei vel ad sacras reliquias quoquo modo referuntur.

The business of this important Congregation is, therefore, to watch over the proper observance of the sacred rites and ceremonies in the celebration of the Mass, the administration of the Sacraments, the Divine Office, and everything pertaining to the worship of the Latin Church. It grants dispensations, distributes insignia and honorary privileges, either personal and temporary, or local and perpetual, which are connected with rites and ceremonies, and safeguards against abuses.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This Congregation has the right to decide what belongs to the rites and ceremonies of the Latin Church, especially to approve the official liturgical books, such as the Ritual and the Pontificale Romanum, the Missal, the approbation of feasts, etc.

It also supervises the beatification and canonization of the Servants of God and the cult of sacred relics.

THE S. CONGREGATIO CAEREMONIALIS

CAN. 254

Ad Congregationem Caeremonialem pertinet moderatio caeremoniarum in Sacello Aulaque Pontificali servandarum et sacrarum functionum quas Patres Cardinales extra pontificale sacellum peragunt; itemque eadem Congregatio cognoscit quaestiones de praecedentia tum Patrum Cardinalium tum Legatorum quos variae Nationes ad Sanctam Sedem mittunt.

This Congregation is entrusted with the direction of the ceremonies to be observed in the papal chapel and court, of the sacred functions which the Cardinals perform outside the papal chapel, and the decision of questions concerning the precedence of Cardinals and ambassadors accredited to the Holy See.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE S. C. FOR EXTRAORDINARY ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS

CAN. 255

Ad Congregationem pro negotiis ecclesiasticis extraordinariis spectat dioeceses constituere vel dividere et ad vacantes dioeceses idoneos viros promovere, quoties hisce de rebus cum civilibus Guberniis agendum est; insuper Congregatio in ea negotia incumbit, quae eius examini subiiciuntur a Summo Pontifice per Cardinalem Secretarium Status, praesertim ex illis quae cum legibus civilibus coniunctum aliquid habent et ad pacta conventa cum variis Nationibus referuntur.

This Congregation is entrusted with the erection and division of dioceses and the promotion of ecclesiastics to vacant dioceses, whenever these matters must be settled in accord with civil governments; besides, it has charge of affairs submitted to it for examination by the Supreme Pontiff through the Cardinal Secretary, especially where civil governments or concordats are concerned.

THE S. CONGREGATION OF STUDIES

CAN. 256

§ 1. Congregatio de Seminariis et Universitatibus studiorum vigilat super omnibus quae ad regimen, disciplinam, temporalem administrationem et studia Seminariorum pertinent, incolumi iure Congregationis de Prop. Fide. Eidem pariter commissa est moderatio regiminis ac studiorum, in quibus versari debent athenaea seu quas vocant Universitates vel Facultates quae ab Ecclesiae auctoritate dependent, comprehensis iis quae a religiosae alicuius familiae sodalibus diriguntur. Novas institutiones perpendit approbatque;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

facultatem concedit academicos gradus conferendi normasque tradit quibus ii conferri debeant, et, ubi agitur de viro singulari doctrina commendato, potest eos ipsa conferre.

§ 2. In hac Sacra Congregatione connumerantur inter alios Cardinales Secretarius Congregationis Consistorialis et inter Consultores Assessor eiusdem Congregationis.

This Congregation watches over the government, discipline, and temporal administration of seminaries, except those under the Propaganda. It supervises the order and courses of studies at Catholic universities dependent on the authority of the Holy See, even those entrusted to religious communities, examines and approves new institutions, grants the faculty of and determines the rules for conferring academic degrees in the name of the Holy See, and may itself grant such degrees to men distinguished for their learning and devotion to the Church.

THE S. CONGREGATION FOR THE ORIENTAL CHURCH

CAN. 257

§ 1. Congregationi pro Ecclesia Orientali praeest ipse Romanus Pontifex. Huic Congregationi reservantur omnia cuiusque generis negotia quae sive ad personas, sive ad disciplinam, sive ad ritus Ecclesiarum orientalium referuntur, etiamsi sint mixta, quae scilicet sive rei sive personarum ratione latinos quoque attingant.

§ 2. Quare pro Ecclesiis ritus orientalis haec Congregatio omnibus facultatibus potitur, quas aliae Congregationes pro Ecclesiis ritus latini obtinent, incolumi

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tamen iure Congregationis S. Officii ad normam can. 247.

§ 3. Haec Congregatio controversias dirimit via disciplinari; quas vero ordine iudiciario dirimendas iudicaverit, ad tribunal remittet quod ipsa Congregatio designaverit.

To this Congregation appertain all affairs which touch either persons or the discipline and rites of the Oriental Churches, even such as are of a "mixed" nature, viz. in part concern Latins. However it can settle matters administratively only; all judiciary questions must be referred to tribunals designated by the same Congregation.

The Congregation for the Oriental Church appears to be a new creation, for it formerly formed part of the S. C. of the Propaganda, to which latter was also attached, as a special department since the time of Pius VII, the so-called Reverenda Camera Spoliorum. Pius VII had made a large loan of the Propaganda and, in partial payment thereof, assigned to that Congregation the revenues from vacant benefices which would otherwise be claimed by the Apostolic Exchequer.[15] The Code makes no mention of this, probably because it is of a private nature.

ART. II

TRIBUNALS OF THE ROMAN COURT

The Sacra Poenitentiaria

CAN. 258

§ 1. Sacrae Poenitentiariae praeficitur Cardinalis Poenitentiarius Maior. Huius tribunalis iurisdictio

15 "Spolii jura," June 19, 1817; Hilling, l. c., p. 81.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

coarctatur ad ea quae forum internum, etiam non sacramentale, respiciunt; quare hoc tribunal pro solo foro interno gratias largitur, absolutiones, dispensationes, commutationes, sanationes, condonationes; excutit praeterea quaestiones conscientiae easque dirimit.

§ 2. Eiusdem insuper est de iis omnibus iudicare quae spectant ad usum et concessionem indulgentiarum, salvo iure S. Officii videndi ea quae doctrinam dogmaticam circa easdem indulgentias vel circa novas orationes et devotiones respiciunt.

In the eleventh and twelfth centuries so-called Apostolic confessors were chosen from the papal court, and in the thirteenth century a Cardinal held a prominent place among these poenitentiarii, who had the power to absolve from papal censures and to impart certain dispensations. As a corporation or college, or as a regular tribunal, these poenitentiarii were established by Benedict XII, in 1338.[16] After repeated reorganizations, Benedict XIV gave to this body the form which it has substantially retained to the present time.[17] It is now composed of the Cardinal Penitentiary, the Regens, a theologian, five prelates of the Signatura, a secretary and several minor officials.

Its jurisdiction is limited to the court of conscience, confessional and extra-confessional, and hence this tribunal grants absolutions, dispensations, commutations, sanations, condonations, and solves cases of conscience. It is also empowered to judge concerning the use of indulgences, with the exception of dogmatic questions regarding the same and of new prayers and devotions, which departments belong to the domain of the Holy Office.

16 "In agro Dominico," April 8, 1338; cf. the classical treatise of Goeller, Die Päpstliche Pönitentiarie, 1907, Vol. I.

17 Benedict IV, "Pastor bonus" and "In apostolica," Ap. 13, 1744; Hilling, l. c., p. 127 f.; Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 369.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Rota and the Signatura

The assessors of the Rota are called auditores. The term occurs in the Decretals as well as "Auditorium." [18] The auditors constituted a college in the first decades of the 14th century, for the constitution "Ratio iuris," of John XXII (1326) supposes a corporate body of the "sacri palatii causarum generales auditores." [19] Perhaps this was at first a worldly tribunal for the papal dominions, but in course of time it was transformed into an ecclesiastical corporation. As "Rota" it is mentioned in a constitution of Martin V.[20] The name has found various explanations. Some hold that it arose from the custom of the auditors of holding their meetings at a round table or, at Avignon, in a room with a fretted ceiling ("rota porphyretica lacunar"); but it seems more probable that the name owes its origin to the custom of filing the official records in the form of rolls in a barrel-shaped bookshelf (in pluteo or rotulo).[21] However this may be, the Rota since the 14th century has been often reformed as to the number of auditors and mode of procedure. It maintained its reputation, although somewhat diminished after the institution of the congregations, up to the year 1870, when it seemed that the "charioteer and master of all tribunals" was doomed to a slow death. But Pius X revived and restored the Rota.

Its constitution is officially established in the "Sapienti consilio" and the "lex propria." The Rota consists of ten prelates appointed by the Roman Pontiff. The primus

18 Philipps, K.-R., VII, 307 f.
19 Bull. Taurin., It. IV, 317 ff.
20 Ib., p. 708 f. § 27.
21 Ehrle, Historia Bibliothecae Rom. Pont., I, P. II, p. 696; Goeller, in Archiv. für Kath. K.-R., 1911.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

inter pares is called dean. The auditors are allowed to choose an assistant (coadjutor), to be approved by the pope, who appoints a promotor justitiae and a defensor vinculi. Besides these there are a number of approved lawyers, from whom the litigants must choose one, and minor officials. The Rota is competent to try all cases which are not causae maiores, including criminal cases committed to it by the Pope, either motu proprio or at the request of the parties concerned. The Rota may also decide in the second and third instance, and in the last instance in cases tried by an inferior tribunal. The auditors give their decisions in turns of three, or in more important cases or last instances, in pleno. Their sentences may be overthrown for formal reasons, otherwise they are final.

Formerly there were two segnature, one called gratiae, the other iustitiae. In the course of time one was deemed sufficient, and hence it was but natural that at the reorganization of 1908 the two were welded into one. Benedict XV has further determined the authority of this tribunal,[22] which has entered the new Code in a modified form.

CAN. 259

Causae ordinem iudiciarium requirentes aguntur apud Sacram Romanam Rotam et apud Supremum Tribunal Signaturae Apostolicae intra fines et secundum normas traditas in can. 1598–1605, salvo iure Congregationis S. Officii et Congregationis Sacrorum Rituum in causas sibi proprias.

Causes requiring judiciary procedure are to be treated 22 A. Ap. S., 1915, p. 320 ff; Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 370 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by the S. Roman Rota and the Supreme tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura, according to the norms laid down in can. 1598–1605, except matters pertaining to the Holy Office and the S. Congr. of Rites.

ART. III

THE OFFICES OF THE ROMAN COURT

The Apostolic Chancery

The Apostolic Chancery grew out of the scrinium mentioned under Damasus I (366–384). In the eleventh century the Librarian of the Holy Roman Church appears also as Chancellor of the same, but was called vice-chancellor, because it seemed unfit that a cardinal should hold that office.[23] Now the cardinal presiding over the chancery is styled Cardinal-Chancellor, and is assisted by a regens, his substitute, and several prothonotaries Apostolic and minor officials (mostly laymen).[24]

CAN. 260

§ 1. Cancellariae Apostolicae, cui praeest Cardinalis Cancellarius Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae, hoc est proprium munus, apostolicas expedire litteras seu bullas pro beneficiorum et officiorum consistorialium provisione, novarum provinciarum et dioecesium ac capitulorum institutione et pro aliis maioribus Ecclesiae negotiis conficiendis.

§ 2. Quae litterae seu bullae ne expediantur nisi de mandato Congregationis Consistorialis circa negotia ad eius competentiam spectantia, aut de mandato 23 Bresslau, Urkundenlehre, 1889, I, 173 ff.

24 Formerly lay brothers of the Cistercian Order were the plumbatores at the Apostolic Chancery.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Summi Pontificis circa alia negotia, servatis in singulis casibus ipsius mandati terminis.

The Apostolic Chancery expedites pontifical documents or bulls for the provision of consistorial benefices and offices, for the erection of new provinces, dioceses, and chapters, and for other ecclesiastical affairs of importance.

These documents or bulls cannot be dispatched without the command of the S. C. Consistorialis in matters pertaining to the latter's competency, or without a mandate of the Supreme Pontiff concerning other matters; in any case the limits of the mandate must be strictly observed.

The Apostolic Datary

No later than the 13th century there was attached to the Apostolic Chancery a place or locality where petitions to the Pope were received. This was called "communis data," and later on, "tribunal gratiae concessae." [25] It developed in course of time into a regular tribunal of dispensations, especially for matrimonial cases, and since Innocent X (1644–1655) was presided over by a cardinal pro-datary. At present it has lost much of its significance. The personnel consists of the cardinal datary, a subdatary, and a prefect.

Can. 261

Datariae Apostolicae, quam moderatur Cardinalis Datarius Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae, commissum est cognoscere de idoneitate promovendorum ad beneficia non consistorialia Apostolicae Sedi reservata; conficere et expedire apostolicas litteras pro eorum collatione; eximere in conferendo beneficio a conditionibus requi-[25] Bresslau, l. c., p. 231.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sitis, quoties eius collatio ad Ordinarium non pertinet; curare pensiones et onera quae Summus Pontifex in memoratis conferendis beneficiis imposuerit.

The Apostolic Datary, at the head of which is a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, investigates the fitness of candidates proposed for benefices that are reserved to the Apostolic See but not conferred in consistory. It also composes and dispatches the Apostolic letters for their appointment, grants exemption from qualities required in the appointees to benefices which do not belong to the Ordinary, and takes care of the pensions and taxes imposed by the Supreme Pontiff in conferring such benefices.

The Reverenda Camera Apostolica

After the office of Archdeacon of the Holy Roman Church had, especially through the efforts of Gregory VII (1073–1085), lost much of its former exorbitant power, the Camerlengo took his place and soon acquired the rank of a cardinal. The Camera was a place in the papal palace where the treasury and the sacred vessels and vestments (il tesoro) were kept.[26] Under Leo X the Camerlengo became the exchequer of the Papal State as well as of the Church, whilst the vice-camerlengo was governor and the auditor judge-in-ordinary of the City.[27]

Now the R. C. A. has a Cardinal Camerlengo (not the same as the Camerlengo del Sacro Collegio), a Vice-Camerlengo, an auditor general, and a treasurer.

CAN. 262

Camerae Apostolicae, cui praesidet Sanctae Roma-

26 Mabillon, Iter Italicum, 1724, II, 362, 450, 488.

27 Leo X, "Etsi pro," June 28, 1514.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nae Ecclesiae Cardinalis Camerarius, cura est atque administratio bonorum ac iurium temporalium Sanctae Sedis, quo tempore praesertim haec vacua habeatur; et tunc adamussim serventur normae statutae in const. Pii X Vacante Sede Apostolica, 25 Dec. 1904.

The Camera Apostolica administers the temporal property and rights of the Holy See, especially during a vacancy, when the rules laid down by Pius X in the "Vacante Sede Apostolica" (Dec. 25, 1904) must be strictly observed.

The Secretariate of State

It is evident that the office of Secretary of State is one of "confidence and authority, of great prominence in the Curia."[28] Apostolic secretaries or confidential chaplains were known as early as the 14th century. Of a "College of Apostolic secretaries" we hear in the constitution of Innocent VIII, who reformed it.[29] The same Pontiff also created the office of a "domestic or intimate secretary," who often was a near relative of the Pope (nepos). After Julius II (1503–1513) had established permanent nuncios, the authority of the nepos, who received the cardinal's title and was therefore called Cardinal Nepos, increased so that he managed all the diplomatic affairs of the Papal Court. Many incumbents of this office also held the title of Vice-Chancellor of the H. R. Church. However after the golden age of nepotism had passed, especially through the efforts of Innocent XI (1676–1689), the Cardinal Nepos disappeared before the Cardi-

28 Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 573.

29 "Non debet reprehensibile," Dec. 31, 1487 (Bull., Taur., V, 330 ff).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nal Secretary, who thus became what he now is: Secretary of State or Prime Minister of the Pope.

CAN. 263

Officium Secretariae Status, cuius moderator est Cardinalis Secretarius Status, constat triplici parte hoc ordine:

1.° Prima pars, cui praesidet Secretarius Congregationis pro negotiis ecclesiasticis extraordinariis, versatur in negotiis quae eidem Congregationi examinanda subiici debent ad normam can. 255, ceteris pro diversa eorum natura ad peculiares Congregationes remissis;

2.° Altera pars, cui praeest Substitutus, incumbit in ordinaria negotia;

3.° Tertiam partem dirigit Cancellarius Brevium Apostolicorum, qui vacat expeditioni Brevium.

The office of Secretary of State consists of three departments. (1) The first, presided over by the Secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, deals with matters which (can. 255) are submitted to the authority of that congregation. (2) The second, headed by the Substitute, deals with matters of ordinary occurrence. (3) The third department, under the Chancellor of Apostolic Briefs, attends to the expedition of papal Briefs.

CAN. 264

Ad Secretarias Brevium ad Principes et Epistolarum latinarum spectat munus latine scribendi acta Summi Pontificis, ab eodem illis commissa.

The Secretariate of Briefs directed to Princes and of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Latin Letters is charged with writing in Latin the documents with which the Sovereign Pontiff entrusts it.

Authority of the Roman Court and Its Decisions

The Sacred Congregations are the first and most conspicuous bodies that share in the labors of the Supreme pontificate,[30] wherefore Pius X calls these, together with the Tribunals and Offices, the Roman Court, which has "to deal with the affairs of the universal church."[31] From this it is apparent that the congregations act as true judges in their own domain, in the name and with the authority of the Pope. And although it may be truly said that their jurisdiction is ordinary, yet it is entirely dependent on the Supreme Pontiff. Hence this Court de facto enjoys the same authority as the Pope himself, and its decisions demand obedience and assent from the bishops as well as from the faithful and the clergy.[32]

This is evident also from the fact that all decisions of more than ordinary importance or of extraordinary character must be reported to the Pope.[33]

We now aproach the question of the juridical value of the decisions of the various Congregations and Tribunals.

(1) Concerning favors, there is little difficulty, for they touch only persons directly concerned, and therefore are of a private nature. However, if a favor curtails the right of a third person, the latter must first be asked, either directly or through the Ordinary.[34]

(2) As to questions that may be settled by way of 30 Sixtus V, "Immensa," June 22, 1587.

31 "Sapienti consilio" (A. Ap. S., I, 8).

32 Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 31, n. 41 ff.

33 Cfr. can. 244, § 1.

34 "Sapienti consilio," Ordo servandus, III, 1 (A. Ap. S., I, 62).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

discipline or administration, i. e., without a judicial trial (absque strepitu iudicii), as, for instance, many liturgical questions or questions concerning parish priests and chaplains of institutions or confraternities,— if this mode of settlement is accepted by the parties, then these parties have to abide by the decision of the respective Congregation and are not allowed to pursue their rights by judicial action, unless the S. Congregation itself refers the case to a competent tribunal.[35] From this it is evident that particular decisions touching single cases and persons bind those for whom they are issued, but not outsiders, and hence we sometimes find the clause "et non amplius" added, which means: "et amplius non proponatur,"[36] i. e., the case is definitively settled. But even this clause does not make it impossible to have the case again proposed to the Roman Court if new reasons are found. In this case the remedy, which is not unlike the "restitutio in integrum," must be resorted to. This is granted by the Pontiff.

Concerning the sentences of the Rota, the benefit of restitution to the former judicial status is granted by the Signatura Apostolica.[37]

(3) The judicial sentences of the Roman tribunals, though not irretrievable, must be obeyed by the parties concerned, as long as no "restitutio in integrum" is granted. The latter suspends the effect of the sentence if its execution has not yet begun.[38]

Besides particular decisions and sentences there may be

35 Ib., p. 65.

36 Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 31, n. 44.

37 "Sapienti consilio" (A. Ap. S., I, 18); can. 1603.

38 Can. 1905–1907. That the sentences of the S. R. Rota are final, the Boni Castellaine-Gould case proves.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

general decisions, which as a rule emanate from the Congregations, because the Tribunals are more or less occupied with particular sentences. When issued as "Decreta Urbis et Orbis" these general decrees bind the universal Church, provided no particular custom stands in the way. But, though they must be received with due respect, they are not irretrievable, much less infallible, unless the Roman Pontiff should publish such a decree by means of a solemn Constitution.[39] Instances to prove that even the decrees of the Holy Office are not irreformable or infallible, may be found in the Gallilei case (Feb. 15, 1616), and the decision of 1897 concerning the Comma Ioanneum.[40]

As to future general decisions of the Roman Congregations note that any one which is not based on a strictly comprehensive interpretation of the New Code, but is either extensive or restrictive, is tantamount to a new law and lacks retroactive force.[41] Benedict XV has ordered that the Roman Congregations should for the present abstain from issuing "new general decrees," but limit their decisions to instructions and strictly declaratory explanations.[42]

There are collections of Roman decrees called authentic, for instance, of the S. C. of Rites and the Propaganda (1907), which contain many decisions of a strictly particular nature, whilst others bear the title "decretum Urbis et Orbis." Do the particular decisions lose their nature by being inserted in such a collection? By no

39 Santi-Leitner, I, 29, n. 70 f.

40 "Utrum tuto negari aut saltem in dubium revocari possit, esse authenticum textum S. Ioannis in Ep. I, 5, 7? Negative."— Pope Leo XIII was approached on the subject, and in his Encyclical on the Holy Ghost omitted to quote that text, although occasions were not wanting. Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Divine Trinity, pp. 30 sqq.

41 Can. 17, § 2.

42 "Cum iuris canonici," Sept. 15, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 530).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

means. For "authenticity" in that case is entirely different from that of the three authentic collections of the Decretals, and means neither more nor less than that the decisions contained in those collections are genuine, i. e., were really given by the Congregations to whom they are ascribed. An illustration of the truth of our contention is the fact that Cardinal Gasparri never refers to the "Decreta Authentica" of the S. R. Congr., but merely quotes the date of the decisions.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

LEGATES OF THE ROMAN PONTIFF

Dependent on the Curia, and on the Secretary of State in particular, are those representatives of the Sovereign Pontiff who go by the name of legates. The right of sending and receiving legates (ius legationis activum et passivum) is inherent in the spiritual sovereignty of the Pope.[1] It is evident, however, that the actual relations between the Pope and secular governments will differ according to the connection existing in each case between Church and State (sacerdotium et imperium). In other words, where there is a complete separation between the spiritual and temporal power, papal legates will not exercise diplomatic functions in the proper sense, nor be acknowledged by the public authorities as representatives of the Sovereign Pontiff. Their mission in such countries is limited to merely ecclesiastical matters and their position or rank is strictly ecclesiastical.

After this preliminary observation a few remarks on the historical development of the institution of papal legates may not be out of place. We hear of a Vicar Apostolic of Illyricum in the fourth century, whose office was entrusted to the Archbishop of Thessalonica (Saloniki). Similar rights and attributes were later be-

1 Pius VI, Responsio ad Metropolitanos Mag., Trev., Col., Salisburg., super Nuntiaturis Apostolicis, Romae 1789. The so-called "Punctuatio of Ems," 1786, denied the right of the Pope to send nuncios and to grant dispensations, in an endeavor to impose Febronian principles upon the Church.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

stowed on certain prominent sees in Gaul (Arles, 545), Spain (Seville, 520), and Germany (Treves, 909, Salzburg, 973). The incumbents of these sees were considered to be ipso facto papal legates, or legati nati. Out of these in the eleventh century grew the so-called primates, who have now dwindled into insignificance.[2]

Another species of legates, of greater and more lasting importance, are the legati missi. Leo I (440–461) sent Julian of Cos to the Emperor Marcian to look after ecclesiastical discipline and watch over the purity of faith, as well as to observe the proceedings at the imperial court. If anything should be doubtful, he (Leo) would be ready to issue further instructions.[3] This is presumably the office of those who were called papal responsales or apocrisiarii. In the Orient their activity lasted until Cæsaropapism brought forth the unhappy schism of the ninth century.

Legati missi were employed also in the West, not indeed permanently, but for temporary or transient missions, especially in the tenth and eleventh centuries, when the investiture fight was raging, and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in connection with the crusades. That the royal courts of England and France were not in favor of these papal legates is well known.[4] But Rome insisted upon its right, and when permanent nunciatures had been established upon the model of the Florentine court (Medici) by Julius II, the papal legates became regular diplomatic agents of the Pope, who in turn received the envoys of civil governments.

2 That of Hungary (Strigonensis or Gran) has preserved a few of the ancient prerogatives, but the Code does not favor any exception, can. 271, unless it can be especially proved by particular law.

3 Ep. 113: "Consulenti . . . non deerit relationibus tuis meae responsionis instructio" (Migne, P. L., 54, 1025).

4 Cfr. the following note.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A third kind of legates are the legati a latere, viz., (sent) from the side of the pontiff. They are of rather recent date, used merely for transient purposes, and generally chosen from among the Cardinals. Thus Pius VII sent Cardinal Caprara to put into effect the Napoleonic concordat; thus legati a latere have appeared in recent years at the international Eucharistic Congresses.

CAN. 265

Romano Pontifici ius est, a civili potestate independens, in quamlibet mundi partem Legatos cum vel sine ecclesiastica iurisdictione mittendi.

Two centuries before John XXII complained of his rights being curtailed by Christian princes[5] Pascal II uttered the same complaint against the King of England, who refused to receive papal legates.[6] In the new Code the Pope claims the right to send legates anywhere he pleases. This right can indeed be denied only on the pretext that the Church is no legal, necessary society founded by God, that the Sovereign Pontiff is not the spiritual ruler of that society, and that his power is not supreme, immediate, and independent within its own sphere. But these claims, as has been set forth, cannot be sustained, and the right asserted in Can. 265 is essential to any sovereign.

5 C. un. Extrav. Comm., I, 1: "Super gentes et regna Romanus Pontifex a Domino constitutus, cum personaliter singulas regiones circuire non possit, nec circa gregem sibi creditum curam pastoralis solicitudinis exercere, necesse habet interdum ex debito impositae servitutis, suos ad diversas mundi partes destinare legatos." Cfr. Leo XIII, "Longinqua oceani," Jan. 6, 1895.

6 Friedberg, Grenzen zwischen Staat und Kirche, 1872, p. 729; 477, 542.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The legislator is careful to specify that it is a strictly spiritual jurisdiction that is exercised by his legates, viz., such as in no way exceeds the limits of the power exercised by the Pope himself.

It follows that if papal legates would deal with political questions, or such of a mixed nature which concern both Church and State, the "independent right" would become dependent on the State, which in its sphere is also sovereign. This latter supposition is not verified, e. g., in the case of the Apostolic Delegate at Washington, whose mission is confined to purely spiritual matters.

It is evident that the Pope will not send legates to entirely pagan countries, where no Catholic subjects live, although he can and often does send missionaries for the purpose of conversion. But no government under whose régime a goodly number of Catholics live, has the right to exclude papal legates who come on a purely ecclesiastical mission.

CAN. 266

Dicitur Legatus a latere Cardinalis qui a Summo Pontifice tanquam alter ego cum hoc titulo mittitur, et tantum potest, quantum ei a Summo Pontifice demandatum est.

A legatus a latere, then, is a Cardinal sent by the Sovereign Pontiff, and he has precisely as much power as the Pontiff bestows on him, and no more.

As we have said before, legates were not always welcome in the countries to which they were sent. One reason for this was that they committed grievous mistakes and often exceeded their faculties.[7] In the light of history Canon 266 almost sounds like a warning.

[7] Cc. 3, 4, X, I, 30.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The following canons remove some misgivings which may arise in the Ordinaries of dioceses.

CAN. 267

§ 1. Legati qui mittuntur cum titulo Nuntii aut Internuntii:

1.° Fovent, secundum normas a Sancta Sede receptas, relationes inter Sedem Apostolicam et civilia Gubernia apud quae legatione stabili funguntur;

2.° In territorio sibi assignato advigilare debent in Ecclesiarum statum et Romanum Pontificem de eodem certiorem reddere;

3.° Praeter has duas ordinarias potestates, alias plerumque facultates obtinent quae tamen sunt omnes delegatae.

§ 2. Qui vero mittuntur cum titulo Delegati Apostolici unam habent ordinariam potestatem de qua in § 1, n. 2, praeter alias facultates delegatas ipsis a Sancta Sede commissas.

The office of the legates sent as Nuncios or Internuncios, therefore, is to foster friendly relations between the Apostolic See and the civil governments to which they are accredited; to observe the conditions of the churches of the territory assigned to them and inform the Roman Pontiff thereof. Besides these ordinary functions, they often receive other faculties, which, however, are all delegated.

Those legates who are sent out as Apostolic Delegates enjoy the ordinary power mentioned under § 1, n. 2, besides other delegated faculties entrusted to them by the Holy See.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 268

§ 1. Legatorum munus cum omnibus facultatibus eisdem commissis non exspirat vacante Sede Apostolica, nisi aliud in litteris pontificiis fuerit statutum.

§ 2. Cessat autem, expleto mandato, revocatione eisdem intimata, renuntiatione a Romano Pontifice acceptata.

This canon repeals the enactment, elsewhere made,[8] that the office of Legates with all the faculties granted them does not expire by the vacancy of the Apostolic See, unless otherwise provided in the Apostolic letters; but, that, on the other hand, it ceases if the mandate or mission is fulfilled, or by repeal duly intimated, or by resignation accepted by the Roman Pontiff. A due intimation means an official or authentic document.

CAN. 269

§ 1. Legati Ordinariis locorum liberum suae iurisdictionis exercitium relinquant.

§ 2. Licet forte charactere episcopali careant, praecedunt tamen omnibus Ordinariis qui non sint cardinalitia dignitate insigniti.

§ 3. Si charactere episcopali sint aucti, possunt sine Ordinariorum licentia in omnibus eorum ecclesiis, excepta cathedrali, populo benedicere et officia divina etiam in pontificalibus, adhibito quoque throno et baculo, peragere.

Since legates must respect the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries, any suspicion on the part of the latter would be unfounded. Leo XIII justly observed, following St.

[8] Cfr. cc. 2 f., 6°, I, 15; can. 207; can. 181.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Gregory: "Their rights are sacred to us, their honor is that of the whole Church, and the pastor's glory is the solid strength and vigor of his brethren." [9]

The rules for precedence are laid down in can. 106, 1°, and can. 239, § 1, n. 21, concerning cardinals. The term "all the churches" includes the churches of exempt religious.

CAN. 270

Episcopis qui, ratione sedis, titulo Legati Apostolici decorantur, nullum exinde competit speciale ius.

Bishops who are Apostolic legates by reason of their see, enjoy no special rights on that account.[10]

* * *

To complete this more or less diplomatic tract we will add a list of papal nuncios and internuncios and Apostolic delegates. For the present Pope has divided the whole ecclesiastical corps into these three classes.[11]

1. Apostolic Nuncios are at Vienna and Madrid.

2. Apostolic Internuncios in Argentina, Bavaria, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Holland, Peru, Venezuela.

3. Delegates Apostolic, under the S. C. Consistorialis, are in Canada and Newfoundland, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, and the United States of America (Mexico also should have one). Delegates subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide: Australia, Constantinople, East Indies, Egypt and Arabia, Greece, Kurdistan and Armenia Minor, Mesopotamia, Persia, Syria.

9 "Longinqua oceani," Jan. 6, 1895.

10 A certain right, or at least honorary prerogative, of an Apostolic legate is still claimed by the King of Hungary (cf. Potthast, Regesta, n. 10,637), and was vindicated by the King of Sicily, (Monarchia Sicula), but entirely suppressed by Pius IX ("Suprema," Jan. 28, 1864; cfr. Giannone, Il tribunale della Monarchia di Sicilia, 1892).

11 A. Ap. S., 1916, p. 213 (Decree of May 8, 1916).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The countries now represented at the Papal Court are:

1. By ambassadors: Austria-Hungary and Spain.

2. By envoys extraordinary: Argentina, Bavaria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, England (on special mission), Holland, Monaco, Peru, Prussia, Russia.[12]

The Congress of Vienna, 1814, fixed the precedence of nuncios which they still retain. They rank in the first class, even after the loss of the temporal power of the Pope.[13]

It is noteworthy that the U. S. maintained, at least for some years, diplomatic relations with Pius IX (1848 to 1868).[14]

12 Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 579, 292, 582 ff.

13 Westlake, International Law, 1910, I. p. 286 f.

14 Cfr. Catholic Fortnightly Review, (St. Louis), Vol. XXV, No. 12; Historical Records and Studies of the U. S. Catholic Hist. Soc., New York, Vol. XI (1918).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

PATRIARCHS, PRIMATES, METROPOLITANS

After what has been said about organization and papal legates, it is superfluous to add anything concerning patriarchs. As to the metropolitans, a few notes will suffice.

Metropolitans are bishops who rule over a province composed of several bishoprics. However, under the present legislation, the term "rule" must be taken in a very restricted sense. In ancient times the power of metropolitans was more extensive, especially in regard to the election and ordination of the provincial bishops, the convocation of synods, and trials of the higher and lower clergy.[1] This was but natural since the metropolis was considered the mother see and center of the whole ecclesiastical organism. However, in course of time the authority of the metropolitans was diminished and went to the general centre, Rome. Metropolitans are also called archbishops, though these terms are not fully synonymous; for every metropolitan is an archbishop, but not every archbishop is a metropolitan (e. g., the Archbishop of Ferrara). The title may be merely an honorary distinction.[2] Every metropolitan has one or more suffragans, thus called since the eighth century.[3] In the Frankish

1 Cfr. Nic., cc. 4 ff.; c. 1, Dist. 64; c. 3, Dist. 12; dictum Gratiani ad c. 1, C. 9, q. 3.

2 The title archbishop for metropolitan occurs since the VIII century, cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 4, 3 ff.

3 V. Scherer, l. c., I, 532. In

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Kingdom, and in Italy, especially at Ravenna, the tendency early manifested itself to diminish the number of metropolitan sees and augment the prerogatives of the remaining archbishops, in order that they might appear as primates. These primates were mostly the nominees of temporal rulers. The abuses of this system were so grievous that the papacy set to work to arrest the extension of metropolitan powers, prevent the creation of primatial sees, and generally opposed the growth of tendencies which threatened to lead to the establishment of national churches.[4]

CAN. 271

Patriarchae aut Primatis titulus, praeter praerogativam honoris et ius praecedentiae ad normam can. 280, nullam secumfert specialem iurisdictionem, nisi iure particulari de aliquibus aliud constet.

The title Patriarch or Primate is purely a title of honor and aside from the right of precedence (can. 280) carries with it no special jurisdiction, except where particular laws exist to the contrary.

Our historical remark concerning the tendencies of certain bishops of France is corroborated by the canon quoted by Cardinal Gasparri in his edition. Rudolf, Archbishop of Bourges, claimed patriarchal rights; but Pope Nicholas I told him that, except where the canons and legitimate custom permit, patriarchs and primates have no power over other bishops, unless the Apostolic See has honored a church by special privileges.[5] The case of the transfer of an archbishop to a bishop's, see, he retains his title and hence is addressed as Archbishop-Bishop (e. g., Msgr. Harty of Omaha).

4 Cfr. Joy-Maitland, St. Nicholas, I, 1901, p. 33 f.

5 C. 8, C. 9, q. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

same answer Innocent III made to an archbishop of Tours.[6] To-day, if we mistake not, only the archbishop of Gran (Esztergom) in Hungary enjoys any noteworthy prerogatives.

CAN. 272

Provinciae ecclesiasticae praeest Metropolita seu Archiepiscopus; quae dignitas coniuncta est cum sede episcopali a Romano Pontifice determinata vel probata.

Over an ecclesiastical province presides a Metropolitan or Archbishop, and the connection of that dignity with an episcopal see must be determined or approved by the Roman Pontiff.

As the erection of dioceses, so that of provinces, is a causa maior reserved to the Holy See (S. C. Consist.).[7]

CAN. 273

Salvo praescripto can. 275–280, Metropolita in propria dioecesi easdem obligationes eademque iura habet quae Episcopus in sua.

Besides the obligations and rights mentioned in can. 275–280, a Metropolitan is bound in his own diocese by the same duties as a bishop in his, and enjoys the same rights.

CAN. 274

In dioecesibus vero suffraganeis Metropolita potest tantum:

1.° A patronis ad beneficia praesentatos instituere,

6 C. 9, X, I, 31.

7 Cf. c. 2, C. 9, q. 3; can. 215; can. 248, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

si Suffraganeus intra tempus iure statutum, iusto impedimento non detentus, id facere omiserit;

2.° Indulgentias centum dierum, sicuti in propria dioecesi, concedere;

3.° Deputare Vicarium Capitularem ad normam can. 432, § 2;

4.° Vigilare ut fides ac disciplina ecclesiastica accurate serventur, ac de abusibus Romanum Pontificem certiorem facere;

5.° Canonicam visitationem peragere, causa prius ab Apostolica Sede probata, si eam Suffraganeus neglexerit; tempore autem visitationis, potest praedicare, confessiones audire etiam absolvendo a casibus Episcopo reservatis, de vita et honestate clericorum inquirere, clericos infamia notatos Ordinariis ipsorum, ut eos puniant, denuntiare, notoria crimina, manifestas et notorias offensas tum sibi tum suis forte illatas, iustis poenis, censuris non exclusis, punire;

6.° In omnibus ecclesiis, etiam exemptis, Ordinario loci praemonito, si ecclesia sit cathedralis, peragere pontificalia, uti Episcopus in proprio territorio, populo benedicere, cruce ante se delata incedere, non autem alia exercere quae iurisdictionem importent;

7.° Appellationem recipere a sententiis definitivis aut interlocutoriis definitivarum vim habentibus, prolatis in Curiis suffraganeis, ad normam can. 1594, § 1;

8.° Controversias de quibus in can. 1572, § 2, in prima instantia dirimere.

As to No. 1: The right of investing is granted to the metropolitan if the suffragan delays investiture beyond two months, for in that case the law [8] permits the patron

8 Pius V, "In conferendis," § 4; Richter, Trid., p. 576; Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. I, tit. 4, n. 20; cfr. can. 455, 458.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to ask the metropolitan for investiture, supposing, of course, that the candidate is fit. It may be observed that the Code mentions only benefices of the iuspatronatus, which is of no importance for the metropolitans of our country.

No. 3 will be explained in its proper place, under can. 432.

No. 5. As to the canonical visitation, the Council of Trent [9] ordained that a metropolitan could perform it in a diocese of any of his suffragans only after he had visited his own diocese and with the approval of the provincial council. The new law modifies the old in two ways: first, in that the visitation of his own diocese is not required previously to visiting a suffragan's diocese; secondly, the reason for visiting the suffragan's diocese must now be reported to, and ratified by, the Holy See. This latter enactment is the logical consequence of the provincial councils being approved by the Holy See. As soon as the visit is ratified by competent authority, and the metropolitan enters the diocese of his suffragan, his jurisdiction becomes as it were ordinary over the subjects of his suffragan, but not over the suffragan himself. Hence, (a) he may preach the word of God even without asking the suffragan; (b) exercise acts of jurisdiction in the confessional as well as outside. To this latter faculty must be referred the investigation of the life and conduct of the clergy, and the exercise of contentious jurisdiction. Coercive power may be exercised by the metropolitan against infamous clergymen [10] for notorious crimes [11] which cannot be concealed, especially if the culprit has been tried by a civil or ecclesiastical [9] Sess. 24, c. 3 de ref., cc. 1, 5, 6°, III, 20.

[10] Cf. can. 2320, 2328, 2343, 2314, 2359, § 2.

[11] Cf. can. 2197. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Appellativa, n. 166.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

court. Finally, the metropolitan may proceed against such as offer affronts or insults to his person or suite, or prevent the exercise of his jurisdiction during the time of canonical visitation.[12]

Nos. 7 and 8 mention appeals, which may, but need not always, be made from the sentence of the episcopal court,[13] and settlements of such controversies as regard the personal property and rights of the bishop or his episcopal revenues, or diocesan property.[14]

From this enumeration of the rights of a metropolitan with regard to his suffragans we may conclude, first, that only in case of negligence directly stated in the law has the metropolitan a right to interfere in the diocese of a suffragan. Here the old [15] and the new law agree. Secondly, a metropolitan enjoys no jurisdiction over his suffragans as such, for in all the cases alleged in the present canon the person of the suffragan is nowhere mentioned, but there is question merely of administrative measures or appeals, or the extraordinary case (n. 5) of canonical visitation, and in this the metropolitan really acts in the name of the Pope.

Except in the case of a canonical visit, every jurisdictional act is forbidden to the metropolitan in the dioceses of his suffragans.[16] Wherefore the statement of some older canonists [17] that the metropolitan may exercise jurisdiction over his suffragans, must now be modified, as the present law warrants no such privilege, unless when the Holy See permits a metropolitan to exercise it in connection with a canonical visitation.

12 Cc. 1, 5, 6°, III, 20; c. 1, 6°, V, 9.

13 Can. 1594, § 1; c. 11, X, I, 31; c. 1, 6°, I, 16; c. 7, 6°, V, 11.

14 Can. 1592, § 2.

15 C. 1, 6°, I, 8; c. 1, 6°, I, 6.

16 Cc. 7 f., C. 9, q. 3.

17 Reiffenstuel, I, 10, n. 11; Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. I, tit. 4, who enumerates 38 prerogatives of the archbishops; cfr. his Summa Decis. Apost., s. v. "Archiepiscopus."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE PALLIUM

The origin of the pallium is involved in obscurity. It seems to be an imitation of the ὠμοφόριον, a band of wool worn at Mass by Oriental bishops. This ornament was in vogue also in Gaul and Africa. As a special sign of distinction the pallium came into general use after the sixth century. In its modern form it is a circular band, about two inches wide, worn about the neck, breast and shoulders, and having two pendants, one hanging down in front, the other behind. It is set with six black crosses of silk, one each on the breast and back, one on each shoulder, and one on each pendant. It is worn over the chasuble and signifies the plenitude of the pastoral and episcopal power which an archbishop has received from the Pope.[18] The pallia are kept in a capula over the tomb of St. Peter, and hence are said to be "taken from the body of St. Peter," after being blessed by the Pontiff on the eve of the feast of SS. Peter and Paul.[19]

CAN. 275

Metropolita obligatione tenetur, intra tres menses a consecratione vel, si iam consecratus fuerit, a provisione canonica in Consistorio, per se vel per procuratorem a Romano Pontifice pallium petendi, quod significat potestatem archiepiscopalem.

The metropolitan is obliged, either himself or by proxy, to ask the Pope for the pallium within three months from the date of his consecration, or, if he is already consecrated, from the time of his canonical promotion in the consistory.

18 Cfr. Duchesne, Christian Worship, p. 380 ff; Braun in the Cath. Encycl., Vol. XI, 427.

19 Benedict XIV, "Rerum ecclesiasticarum," Aug. 12, 1748.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 276

Quare ante pallii impositionem, excluso speciali indulto apostolico, ipse illicite poneret actus sive iurisdictionis metropolitanae, sive ordinis episcopalis in quibus, ad normam legum liturgicarum, usus pallii requiritur.

Acts of metropolitan jurisdiction or of the episcopal order which require the use of the pallium according to liturgical norms, are illicit if performed before the imposition of the pallium.

CAN. 277

Metropolia uti potest pallio intra quamlibet ecclesiam etiam exemptam suae provinciae in Missarum sollemnibus, diebus in Pontificali Romano designatis aliisque forte sibi concessis; nullatenus vero extra provinciam, etsi Ordinarii loci consensus accedat.

The Metropolitan may use the pallium in every church of his province on the days determined in the Pontificale Romanum or on others specially granted to him; but he may not use it outside his province, even though the local Ordinary consent.

CAN. 278

Si Metropolita pallium amittat vel ad aliam sedem archiepiscopalem transferatur, novo indiget pallio.

If a Metropolitan loses his pallium, or is transferred to a different archiepiscopal see, he must obtain another pallium.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 279

Pallium neque commodari potest neque donari nec in morte alicui relinqui, sed omnia pallia quae Metropolita obtinuit, cum eodem sunt sepelienda.

The pallium can neither be lent, nor given away, nor left to anyone after death, but all pallia received by a Metropolitan must be buried with him. Archbishops who are metropolitans, or who hold that title, must demand the pallium instanter, instantius, instantissime. The reason for this urgent postulation lies in the significance of the pallium as indicative of the plenitude of the archiepiscopal jurisdiction.[20]

If an archbishop is personally present in Curia, he must present himself to the senior Cardinal Deacon, who imposes the pallium in the name of the Pontiff. The same applies to the procurator who requests the pallium for an archbishop, and who is, moreover, obliged to take an oath before the same Cardinal Deacon that he will conscientiously transmit the sacred ornament to the metropolitan.[21]

Since the pallium signifies the plenitude of the pastoral office, it must be obtained before the metropolitan can exercise his archiepiscopal functions. Hence he cannot licitly invest clergymen presented by patrons, but he may licitly and validly make appointments in his own archdiocese; he cannot convoke a provincial council (can. 284), nor licitly perform any act of jurisdiction mentioned in can. 274. Besides, before the reception of the pallium, a metropolitan cannot consecrate altars, or churches, or bishops, or chrism, or ordain clergymen, 20 C. 1, Dist. 100; c. 3, X, I, 8.

21 Benedict XIV, "Inter conspicuos," Aug. 29, 1744. The formula of the oath is given in "Rerum ecclesiasticarum," Aug. 12, 1748; cfr. can. 239, §3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

even though he may have been archbishop of another diocese.[22]

The pallaium may be worn by an archbishop in all the churches located within the limits of his province. Strictly speaking, its use is restricted to the celebration of the Mass, except de requiem.[23] The festival occasions on which the use of the pallium is permitted are indicated in the Caeremoniale Episcoporum.[24] Since the pallium is something attached to the person, but with definite relation to a church designated by the Roman Pontiff, it cannot be loaned to another, or taken to another see, but all the pallia of an archbishop, if he has obtained several, are to be buried with him.[25]

PRECEDENCE

CAN. 280

Patriarcha praecedit Primati, Primas Archiepiscopo, hic Episcopis, salvo praescripto can. 347.

Patriarchs enjoy precedence over primates, primates over archbishops, and archbishops over bishops, except in the cases mentioned in can. 347.

The Annuario Pontificio for 1917 enumerates the following Patriarchs, called maiores:

Constantinople: (Latin) residing in Rome;

Alexandria: The Latin residing in Rome; the Coptic at Hermopolis;

Antioch: The Latin in Rome; the Syrian at Beirut; the Maronite at Bikorchi on Mount Lebanon; the Greek Melchite (Arabic) at Damascus; 22 Pontificale Rom., De Pallio; Caeremoniale Episcop., I, c. 16, n. 6.

23 Caerem. Ep., ib.

24 L. I, c. 16, n. 4.

25 C. 2, X, I, 8; c. 4, X, I, 5; Pont. Rom., De Pallio; Caeremoniale Episcop., I, 16, n. 6 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Jerusalem, the Latin, with residence there.

Minor Patriarchs are those of:

Babylon of the Chaldees, at Mossul, who is at the same time Administrator Apostolic of Acre;

Armenian Cilicia, at Constantinople, Administrator Apostolic of Ispaham in Armenia;

West Indies, Archbishop of Toledo in Spain (since 1540);

East Indies, at Goa, since 1886;

Lisbon, since 1716, residence there (under normal circumstances).

Venice, transferred from Aquileja-Grado since 1541.[26]

[26] Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., 1918 (Vol. 58), p. 113 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VII

PLENARY AND PROVINCIAL COUNCILS

When Christianity had spread and diocesan centres were erected, the bishops assembled for deliberation and especially for the uprooting of heresies. This custom soon became an important factor in the life of the Church. Synods or councils, as they were called already in Tertullian's [1] time, were quite frequent in the third and even more so in the fourth century, and were generally held in times of a crisis, but also for disciplinary purposes. Since the middle of the third century they were known by the name of provincial (exarchal) councils. In Africa, however, plenary or universal councils, presided over by the primate of Carthage, were celebrated in the fourth and fifth centuries. Roman or Papal synods went by the same name almost to the close of the Middle Ages.[2] The Council of Trent [3] ordered provincial councils to be held every three years for the regulation of morals, the correction of excesses, and the settling of controversies. Notwithstanding this enactment, times were so unfavorable that more than a century elapsed without a provincial council being held, with the exception of one at Tarragona in Spain, until Benedict XIII held one at Benevento in 1693. Since then they became more frequent.[4]

1 De ieiunio, c. 13.

2 Cfr. Kirchenlexikon, 2 ed., s. v. "Concil."

3 Sess. 24, c. 2 de ref.

4 Collectio Lacencis, Acta et Decreta SS. Concil. Recentiorum, 1870, Vol. I, Prolegomena, p. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In this country the first provincial council was held at Baltimore in 1829 and followed by others in 1833, 1837, 1846, 1849. In 1852 the first National or Plenary Council was convoked by the Archbishop of Baltimore, Mt. Rev. F. P. Kendrick, in the capacity of Apostolic Delegate of Pius IX. The second followed fourteen years later, and the last one was held in 1884, under the presidency of Archbishop, now Cardinal, Gibbons of Baltimore as Apostolic Delegate.[5]

PLENARY COUNCILS

CAN. 281

Ordinarii plurium provinciarum ecclesiasticarum in Concilium plenarium convenire possunt, petita tamen venia a Romano Pontifice, qui suum Legatum designat ad Concilium convocandum eique praesidendum.

The Ordinaries of several ecclesiastical provinces may meet in a plenary council after having obtained permission from the Roman Pontiff, who will designate a Legate to convoke and preside over the council.

Leo XIII, after having received the petition of South American bishops, left it to them to choose the place of meeting, but was highly pleased with their choice of Rome, where the illustrious prelates met in 1899 and enacted a number of decrees which received the specific approval of the Holy See.[6]

CAN. 282

§ 1. Concilio plenario assistere debent cum suffragio

5 The acta were published in the Coll. Lacencis, t. III, and separately at Baltimore in 1853, 1868, 1886.

6 "Quum diuturnum," Dec. 25, 1898 (Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 20, 409 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

deliberativo, praeter Legatum Apostolicum, Metropolitae, Episcopi residentiales, qui, sui loco, mittere possunt Coadiutorem vel Auxiliarem, Apostolici dioecesium Administratores, Abbates vel Praelati nullius, Vicarii Apostolici, Praefecti Apostolici, Vicarii Capitulares.

§ 2. Etiam Episcopi titulares, in territorio degentes, si a Legato Pontificio, secundum receptas instructiones, ad Concilium vocentur, adesse debent habentque suffragium deliberativum, nisi in convocatione aliud expresse caveatur.

§ 3. Alii ex utroque clero viri, forte ad Concilium invitati, suffragio non gaudent nisi consultivo.

This canon, especially by § 3, excludes the superiors of religious orders or congregations from a deliberative or decisive vote; they need not even be invited if the preliminary meeting thinks it unnecessary to call them. This enactment is surprising if compared with can. 223, § 1, n. 4, which admits the superiors general of exempt religious and abbots presidents of monastic congregations to deliberative participation at a general council. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore had accorded that same right to the abbots presidents Wimmer of St. Vincent and Mundwiler of St. Meinrad, and to the superior general of Holy Cross, Father Sorin.[7] We are at a loss to find a solid reason for the exclusion of the aforesaid superiors from the right of assisting at a plenary council, the more so since Cardinal Gasparri gives no text for this enactment. But where there is no right, there is no obligation, although an invitation might be tendered.

7 Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. III., 1886, p. LXIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROVINCIAL COUNCILS

CAN. 283

In singulis provinciis ecclesiasticis celebretur provinciale Concilium vicesimo saltem quoque anno.

In each province a provincial council should be held at least once every twenty years.

CAN. 284

Metropolita, eoque legitime impedito vel sede archiepiscopali vacante, Suffraganeus antiquior promotione ad ecclesiam suffraganeam:

1.° Locum ad celebrandum Concilium intra provinciae territorium, auditis omnibus qui assistere debent cum suffragio deliberativo, eligit; cessantibus tamen iustis impedimentis, metropolitana ecclesia ne negligatur;

2.° Concilium convocat eique praeest.

The metropolitan, or in case he is lawfully prevented or the archiepiscopal see is vacant, the suffragan who by reason of promotion to the suffragan see is the senior, shall select the place for holding the council, after having received the opinion of all those who are obliged to assist thereat with a decisive vote. If there is no serious obstacle, the metropolitan church should be chosen. The metropolitan shall convoke the council and preside over it.

The term "auditis" signifies that the metropolitan is not bound by the opinion or quasi-vote given, but may choose a place according to his own good pleasure.[8]

CAN. 285

Episcopi qui nulli Metropolitae subiiciuntur, Ab-

[8] Cf. can. 105.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bates vel Praelati nullius, et Archiepiscopi Suffraganeis carentes, aliquem viciniorem Metropolitam, nisi forte iem elegerint, semel pro semper, praevia Sedis Apostolicae approbatione, eligant, cuius Concilio provinciali cum aliis intersint, et quae ibi ordinata fuerint, observent et observanda curent.

Bishops who are not subject to a metropolitan, abbots or prelates nullius, and archbishops without suffragans, if they have not done so already, should once for all and with the approbation of the Holy See choose the nearest metropolitan, at whose provincial council they must assist, and the enactments of which they must observe and enforce.

As to the vicinior, or nearest metropolitan, several decisions [9] of the Roman Court have defined that the distance is to be measured from the cathedral or abbey church to the cathedral of the metropolitan. However, these decisions are rather old, and perhaps antiquated, because there were no railroad facilities in those days, and hence it will be advisable to submit the choice to the Holy See. After the choice has been approved, no change is permitted and the obligation of assisting at the provincial councils is strict if no legitimate impediment occurs.

CAN. 286

§ 1. Praeter Episcopos, Abbates vel Praelatos nullius et Archiepiscopos de quibus in can. 285, ad Concilium provinciale vocandi sunt et convenire debent cum voto deliberativo Suffraganei omnes aliique de quibus in can. 282, § 1.

9 S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 20, 1579; 1 C. C. Aug. 2, 1596; cf. Barbosa, Summa Decis. Apost., s. v. "Episcopus vicinior;" Santi-Leitner, I, 11, n. 36; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 2 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Episcopi titulares qui in provincia degunt, possunt a praeside, cum consensu maioris partis illorum qui cum voto deliberativo intersunt, convocari, et si convocentur, votum habent deliberativum, nisi aliud in convocatione caveatur.

§ 3. Capitula cathedralia aut Consultores dioecesani cuiusvis dioecesis cuius Ordinarius ad normam § 1 vocari debet, invitentur ad Concilium et invitati mittant duos ex capitularibus aut Consultoribus collegialiter designatos, qui tamen obtinent votum tantum consultivum.

§ 4. Maiores quoque religionum clericalium exemptarum ac Congregationum monasticarum Superiores, qui in provincia resideant, invitandi sunt, debentque invitati adesse aut impedimentum, quo detinentur, Concilio notum facere; sed his, quemadmodum aliis ex utroque clero viris ad Concilium forte vocatis, votum fuerit, habet votum dumtaxat consultivum.

Two diocesan consultors, therefore, must attend the provincial council and the superiores maiores of exempt clerical orders and monastic congregations who reside in the province must also be invited, and upon being invited, must attend or give notice of the reason for their absence; but all these and other ecclesiastics, secular and regular, if invited, have only an advisory vote.

Innocent III told the archbishop of Sens, who wished to exclude the cathedral chapters from the provincial council, that their deputies were to be admitted to the conciliar discussions (ad tractatum), especially with regard to matters touching upon the chapters.[10] This text would seem to indicate that these delegates ought to have a deliberative vote. But the new Code grants only a

[10] C. 10, X, III, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

consultive vote, apparently for the reason that only the bishops are judges and legislators in the true sense,—which reason is perfectly correct, inasfar as even these judges cannot go against the general law.

The deputies of the chapters and diocesan consultors must be appointed collegialiter, either by secret ballot or open vote by a legitimate quorum present in one place at the same time.

At provincial councils the superiors of religious orders are allowed to be present, nay, they must be invited, and this invitation, of course, creates the obligation of attending.

CONCILIARY PROCEEDINGS

CAN. 287

§ 1. Qui Concilio plenario aut provinciali interesse debent cum voto deliberativo, si iusto impedimento detineantur, mittant procuratorem et impedimentum probent.

§ 2. Procurator, si fuerit unus ex Patribus quibus est votum deliberativum, duplici voto non gaudet; si non fuerit, habet votum dumtaxat consultivum.

Those obliged to attend either a plenary or provincial council and who have a deliberative vote, shall, if detained, send a procurator and prove that they are legitimately absent. If the procurator is one of the "Fathers" of the Council, he enjoys but one vote; if he is not a "Father," he has a consultive vote only.

CAN. 288

In Concilio sive plenario sive provinciali praeses,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

habito, si de provinciali agatur, Patrum consensu, determinat ordinem servandum in quaestionibus examinandis et ipsum Concilium aperit, transfert, prorogat, absolvit.

The president of either a plenary or provincial council (if the latter, with the consent of the Fathers) shall establish the order in which questions are to be examined, shall open, transfer, prorogue, and close the meetings.

CAN. 289

Concilio plenario vel provinciali inchoato, nemini eorum qui interesse debent, licet discedere, nisi iustam ob causam a Legato Pontificio vel a Concilii provincialis Patribus probatam.

Those who are obliged to attend a plenary or provincial council are not allowed to depart, once the council has been opened, unless they have a reason approved by the Apostolic Legate or the Fathers of the Council.

Notice the difference between those who are obliged to attend, because these may enjoy only an advisory vote, and the Fathers of the council, who are entitled to a deliberative or decisive vote.

CAN. 290

Patres in Concilio plenario vel provinciali congregati studiose inquirant ac decernant quae ad fidei incrementum, ad moderandos mores, ad corrigendos abusus, ad controversias componendas, ad unam eandemque disciplinam servandam vel inducendam, opportuna fore pro suo cuiusque territorio videantur.

The Fathers of a plenary or provincial council shall earnestly examine and decree upon all matters touching the increase of faith, the control of morals, the correction of abuses, the settling of controversies, the preservation and introduction of uniform discipline, and whatever may be opportune for their own territory. This canon states, in rough outline, what is to be submitted to the deliberation and consultation of the Fathers, and is chiefly taken from the IVth Lateran Council and that of Trent.[11] Note that only "increase of faith" is mentioned, not a definition of faith, because infallibility is not the attribute of a plenary or provincial council, which may, however, denounce heresies, draw attention to wrong tendencies, and warn the faithful against them. But the final definition or qualification must be left to the supreme tribunal. By the phrase "settling controversies" is not meant a dogmatic or theological settlement, as long as Rome has not spoken, but questions of discipline, education of clergy and faithful in seminaries and schools, the administration of the Sacraments, parish boundaries, etc. The matter is made much easier by the new Code, which states the universal law, modifications of which, either restrictive or extensive, are reserved to the Holy See. Where the Code is not explicit enough, a council must apply to Rome (S. C. Concilii).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Finally, though the canon says nothing about it, the mode of proceeding at a council is by vote. The vote may be secret or open. This point is to be settled in a preliminary session. The presiding officer has no preponderating voice, even where there is a tie,[12] unless the papal legate to a plenary council has received special instructions from the Holy See.

11 C. 25, X, V, 1; Sess. 24, c. 2 de ref.

12 Smith, Elements, I, n. 71.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 291

§ 1. Absoluto Concilio plenario aut provinciali, praeses acta et decreta omnia ad Sanctam Sedem transmittat, nec eadem antea promulgentur, quam a Sacra Congregatione Concilii expensa et recognita fuerint; ipsimet autem Concilii Patres designent et modum promulgationis decretorum et tempus quo decreta promulgata obligare incipiant.

§ 2. Decreta Concilii plenarii et provincialis promulgata obligant in suo cuiusque territorio universo, nec Ordinarii locorum ab iisdem dispensare possunt, nisi in casibus particularibus et iusta de causa.

After the close of a plenary or provincial council the president of the same shall send all the acts and decrees to the Holy See, and they must not be promulgated until the S. C. of the Council has examined and approved them. The mode of promulgating the decrees as well as the date of their going into effect is left to the Fathers of the council.

The decrees of a plenary or provincial council, after being duly promulgated, oblige throughout the whole territory for which they were made, and the Ordinaries of the various dioceses cannot dispense from them except in individual cases and for a just reason.

The efficacy of conciliar decrees is here determined, first conditionally, and then as to extent. The condition is that the decrees are approved by the highest authority, i. e., the Holy See, through the S. C. of the Council. This S. Congregation first obtains the opinion of one consultor, and then that of all the consultors, or at least five of them. Then the S. C. deliberates in pleno congressu and instructs the agent of the province to have the decrees printed.[13] The approval is given either in forma specifica or in forma communi. The former is generally expressed by the verbal insertion of the acts and decrees in the document of approbation, or else the printed decrees contain the formula "ex certa scientia, ex plenitudine potestatis approbamus," etc. The acts and decrees of the Latin-American Plenary Council held in Rome 1899 were approved by the Holy See with the clause, "quibuscunque minime obstantibus," and it was the general assumption that they were approved in forma specifica.[14] The same cannot be said concerning our American plenary councils, for they were, as is commonly held,[15] approved in forma communi, i. e., by simple recognition. It appears that the Code refers only to recognition, without determining the nature of the approbation given. But the Code also supposes that the acts and decrees of a council obtain legal force by mere recognition as soon as promulgated, i. e., from the date of promulgation fixed by the Fathers of the council. In view of this fact the former distinction between approbation in forma specifica and approbation in forma communi appears to be of little practical value. This deduction is corroborated by an answer of the Secretary of State to the Archbishop of St. Louis, dated Sept. 30, 1896, which declares that the decrees of a plenary council are binding even if recognized only in forma communi and not inserted in the diocesan statutes.[16]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to the interpretation of the decrees of plenary and provincial councils the general rules laid down in our Code[17] must be observed. These grant the right of inter-

13 "Sapienti consilio" (A. Ap. S., I, 95).

14 Analecta Ecclesiastica, 1900 (VIII), p. 145 f.

15 Smith, l. c., n. 72.

16 Am. Eccl. Rev. 1896 (Vol. 15), p. 545.

17 Can. 17–20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pretation to the legislators. However, the case here is a peculiar one, since the decrees have no obligatory force unless approved by the Roman Congregation. We think it will be safe to adopt the rule laid down by the Fathers of the Latin-American Plenary Council, viz.: that the bishops have power to settle doubts arising from the wording of the text, as long as their interpretation does not affect the substance and juridical value of the same. In the latter case, the doubts should be submitted to the Congregation of Extraordinary Affairs.[18] For our country the authentic interpretation of the decrees of plenary and provincial councils belongs to the S. Congregation of the Council.

With regard to dispensations, the Code is more explicit, permitting the Ordinaries to dispense from or relax the decrees in individual cases for a just reason. The reason why this power of dispensation is limited and why the limitation affects the metropolitans as well as their suffragans — though they are themselves the legislators — lies in the fact that their decrees have been elevated into a higher sphere by a superior, not only through papal interposition, but also by a collective act of the legislators.[19] Particular cases means not such as happen daily and ordinarily (communiter contingentes), but exceptions, to single persons and parishes.

CAN. 292

§ 1. Nisi aliter pro peculiaribus locis a Sede Apostolica provisum fuerit, Metropolita, eoque deficiente, antiquior e Suffraganeis ad normam can. 284, curet ut 18 Archiv für K.-R., 1901 (Vol. 81), p. 54 f.

19 Suarez, De Legibus, l. VI, c. 15, nn. 4 ff.; Kenrick, Theologia Moralis, 1860, I, 118 (tract. IV, c. 6, n. 49).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinarii locorum, saltem quinto quoque anno, stato tempore apud Metropolitam aliumve Episcopum comprovincialem conveniant, ut, collatis consiliis, videant quaenam in dioecesibus agenda sint ut bonum religionis promoveatur, eaque praeparent de quibus in futuro Concilio provinciali erit agendum.

§ 2. Etiam Episcopi aliique de quibus in can. 285, una cum aliis Ordinariis convocari et convenire debent.

§ 3. Iidem Ordinarii congregati sedem proximi conventus designent.

Unless otherwise provided for by the Apostolic See, the metropolitan, or if he fails to act, the senior suffragan bishop (according to can. 284) should see to it that the Ordinaries of the dioceses meet every five years at a stated time, at the metropolitan's or a fellow-bishop's residence, in order to deliberate about the affairs of their dioceses and thus foster the good of religion, as well as to prepare the questions to be treated in a future provincial council.

The bishops and others mentioned in can. 285, together with other Ordinaries, should be called and must attend a meeting to appoint the place for the next meeting.

All these regulations are intended to secure a united and uniform proceeding as well as to foster charity.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VIII

VICARS AND PREFECTS APOSTOLIC

There is a material difference between the vicars Apostolic formerly appointed for, e. g., Thessalonica or Arles, and the vicars Apostolic now appointed for missionary countries. The former were quasi legati nati,[1] whereas the vicars of whom the present canon treats are really vicars of the Apostolic See with episcopal jurisdiction, appointed for regions where a full diocesan organization cannot as yet be established or restored. Thus a vicar Apostolic was appointed for Brunswick and Lüneburg, in 1607, under the pontificate of Alexander VII (1655–67), and one for Malabar, where Nestorian disturbances made such a measure imperative. To-day there are vicars or prefects Apostolic in all the territories subject to the Propaganda.[2] In England a vicar Apostolic (Blackwell) was appointed in 1598, and vicars Apostolic continued to govern the English Church until 1850, when the hierarchy was reëstablished. Alaska is now the sole vicariate in our country.

CAN. 293

§ 1. Territoria quae erecta non sunt in dioeceses reguntur per Vicarios aut Praefectos Apostolicos; qui omnes ab una Apostolica Sede nominantur.

§ 2. Vicarius et Praefectus Apostolicus possessionem

1 Smith, l. c., I, n. 524.

2 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 10, 3 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

sui territorii capiunt, ille litteras apostolicas, hic decretum seu patentes litteras Sacrae Congregationis de Prop. Fide per se vel per procuratorem ostendentes ei qui territorium regit ad normam can. 309.

CAN. 294

§ 1. Vicarii et Praefecti Apostolici iisdem iuribus et facultatibus in suo territorio gaudent, quae in propriis dioecesibus competunt Episcopis residentialibus, nisi quid Apostolica Sedes reservaverit.

§ 2. Etiam ii qui charactere episcopali carent, possunt, intra sui territorii fines ac perdurante munere, omnes benedictiones Episcopis reservatas, una pontificali excepta, impertiri, calices, patenas et altaria portatilia cum sacris oleis ab Episcopo benedictis consecrare, indulgentias quinquaginta dierum concedere, confirmationem, primam tonsuram et ordines minores conferre ad normam can. 782, § 3, 957, § 2.

Apostolic vicars and prefects enjoy the same rights and faculties in their respective territories as residential bishops in their dioceses, unless the Apostolic See makes reserves. Even though destitute of the episcopal character they may, within the limits of their own territory, and during the time of their office, impart the blessings reserved to bishops, except the pontifical blessing proper, may consecrate chalices, patens, and portable altars with oil blessed by a bishop, grant indulgences of fifty days, and confer the tonsure and minor orders according to can. 782, § 3, 957, § 2.

Blessings reserved to bishops are: the blessing of abbots, the dedication and consecration of churches, the blessing and laying of corner-stones, the blessing and reconciliation of cemeteries.[3] The consecration of fixed altars is not expressly mentioned, and therefore probably not included in these faculties.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

All these faculties, with the exception of such as require the episcopal character or cannot be exercised without the use of holy oils, can be communicated to simple priests.[4]

CAN. 295

§ 1. Vicarii et Praefecti Apostolici ab omnibus missionariis, etiam religiosis, possunt ac debent exigere ut suas patentes seu alias quasvis eorum missionis, destinationis, constitutionis ac deputationis litteras exhibeant, easque exhibere recusantibus exercitium cuiusvis ministerii ecclesiastici prohibere.

§ 2. Omnes missionarii, etiam regulares, licentiam sacri ministerii exercendi petant a Vicariis et Praefectis Apostolicis, qui tamen eam ne denegent, nisi singulis et gravem ob causam.

Apostolic vicars and prefects may and must demand of all missionaries, even religious, that they show their credentials or other letters explaining their mission, destiny, appointment, and deputation, and in case of refusal must forbid them the exercise of any ministerial functions.

All missionaries, including (exempt) regulars, must ask permission of the vicars or prefects Apostolic to exercise the sacred ministry. This permission should not be denied except in single cases and for weighty reasons.

This is but a repetition of former injunctions.[5]

3 Van der Stappen, Sacra Liturgia, IV, p. 347.

4 Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 4.

5 Clement IX, "Speculatores," Sept. 13, 1669; Benedict XIV, Const. cit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 296

§ 1. Etiam missionarii regulares subiiciuntur Vicarii et Praefecti Apostolici iurisdictioni, visitationi et correctioni in iis quae pertinent ad missionum regimen, curam animarum, Sacramentorum administrationem, scholarum directionem, oblationes intuitu missionis factas, implementum piarum voluntatum in favorem eiusdem missionis.

§ 2. Quamvis Vicariis et Praefectis Apostolicis nullo modo liceat, praeter casus in iure praevisos, se in disciplinam religiosam ingerere quae a Superiore religioso dependet, si tamen circa ea, de quibus in superiore paragrapho, conflictus oriatur inter mandatum Vicarii aut Praefecti Apostolici et mandatum Superioris, prius praevalere debet, salvo iure recursus in devolutivo ad Sanctam Sedem et salvis peculiaribus statutis a Sede Apostolica probatis.

All missionaries belonging to (exempt) regular orders are subject to the jurisdiction, visitation, and correction of the vicar or prefect Apostolic in matters pertaining to the government of the mission, the care of souls, the administration of the Sacraments, the direction of schools, the gifts of the faithful made for the mission, and the execution of pious legacies made in behalf of the same.

Although the vicar or prefect Apostolic has no right, except in cases provided by law, to interfere with the religious discipline, which depends on the religious superior, yet in the matters mentioned in § 1 of this canon, should a controversy arise between a command of the vicar or prefect and of the superior, the former must prevail, without prejudice to the right of recourse in devolutivo to the Holy See and to special statutes approved by the latter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

That regulars in charge of souls should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinary in all matters pertaining to the exercise of this office, was established by the Council of Trent.[6] Benedict XIV ordained furthermore that no appeal or injunction should delay or invalidate the execution of these decrees and their consequences as applied by the Ordinaries,[7] and logically extended the law to the regular missionaries.[8] New experiences and questions elicted the remarkable constitution of Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," of May 8, 1881, which endeavored to settle some disputes between Ordinaries and regulars employed in parish or mission work. The rules laid down in that Constitution have entered almost entirely into the new Code, as may be seen in the section on religious. Here we will only add a note on schools. Leo XIII has subjected all elementary (parish) schools conducted by religious, exempt as well as non-exempt, to the direction and visitation of the bishops, but in the same Constitution states that other schools, colleges, etc., are not subject to the Ordinary, though they require his permission for their erection.[9]

As to gifts made for the missions, the same Constitution ordains that all donations made for missionary purposes must be used for that purpose. Broadly speaking, Sunday and house collections, pew rent and stole fees are mission donations and must be employed as such and accounted for to the vicar or prefect Apostolic.

What in devolutivo means has already been explained. Religious orders (the Society of Jesus, for instance)

6 Sess. 25, c. 11 de regg.

7 "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 8.

8 "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 12.

9 Can. 1382, however, gives the Ordinary the right to inspect the schools — except house schools — of regulars as to their religious and moral training.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which have statutes concerning their missionaries approved by the Holy See, are entitled to have these statutes respected by vicars or prefects Apostolic.

CAN. 297

Deficientibus e clero saeculari sacerdotibus, Vicarii et Praefecti Apostolici possunt, audito eorum Superiore, cogere religiosos, etiam exemptos, vicariatui vel praefecturae addictos, ad animarum curam exercendam, salvis pariter peculiaribus statutis a Sede Apostolica probatis.

Where there is an insufficient number of secular priests, the vicar or prefect may, upon having heard their superior, compel religious, even those belonging to exempt orders, who are attached to the vicariate or prefecture, to perform pastoral work, with due regard, however, to their peculiar statutes approved by the Apostolic See, as stated in "Speculatores" of Clement IX, Sept. 13, 1669.

CAN. 298

Si qua dissidia in iis quae ad curam animarum pertinent, sive inter singulos missionarios, sive inter diversas religiones, sive inter missionarios et alios quoslibet oriri contigerit, ea quamprimum componere curent Vicarii ac Praefecti Apostolici, qui huiusmodi quaestiones, ubi opus fuerit, dirimant, integro tamen iure recursus ad Apostolicam Sedem, qui decreti effectum non suspendit.

If any controversy should arise about matters pertaining to the care of souls between individual missionaries, or different religious orders, or between missionaries and others, let the vicars or prefects settle them as quickly as possible. The right of recourse in devolutivo to the Apostolic See, however, remains untouched.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

That such controversies may arise, the incidents recorded in several constitutions of Benedict XIV amply prove. This Pontiff had to settle the somewhat heated dissensions between the Dominicans and the Jesuits about Chinese rites, and solve doubts about various customs regarding the administration of baptism and nuptial ceremonies.[10]

CAN. 299

Vicarii Apostolici obligatione tenentur Sacra Limina Beatorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli visitandi eadem prorsus lege, qua Episcopi residentiales ad normam can. 341; cui tamen muneri, si quid graviter obstet ne per se ipsi illud expleant, satisfacere possunt per procuratorem etiam in Urbe degentem.

Vicars Apostolic are, like residential bishops, bound to make the visitatio ad limina (or tombs) of SS. Peter and Paul. If a serious obstacle prevents them from performing this duty, they may send a procurator, or commission some one living in the Eternal City. An explanation of this follows under can. 341.

CAN. 300

§ 1. Ad normam can. 340, Vicarii ac Praefecti Apostolici tenentur obligatione Sedi Apostolicae exhibendi plenam accuratamque relationem de suo quisque pastorali officio, deque omnibus quaecunque ad

10 "Ex quo singulari," July 11, 1744; "Omnium solicitudinum," 1742; "Redditae nobis," Dec. 19, Sept. 12, 1744.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

statum vicariatus vel praefecturae, ad missionarios, ad religiosos, ad populi disciplinam, ad scholarum frequentiam, ad fidelium denique ipsorum curae commissorum salutem quavis ratione pertineant; quae relatio scripta esse debet et subscripta tum ab ipso Vicario aut Praefecto tum ab uno saltem ex consiliariis de quibus in can. 302.

§ 2. Imo etiam sub cuiusque anni exitum ad Sanctam Sedem mittant elenchum seu numerum conversorum, baptizatorum annuaeque Sacramentorum administrationis una cum aliis notatu dignioribus.

As prescribed in can. 340, Apostolic vicars and prefects are obliged to send each year a full and accurate report of their pastoral office and everything that touches the state of their vicariate or prefecture, or the missionaries, the religious, the discipline of the people, the frequenting of schools, the welfare of the faithful committed to their care. This report must be made in writing, signed by the vicar or prefect and by at least one of his consultors (see can. 302). Each vicar and prefect shall, moreover, at the end of each year, send to the Holy See a report on the number of converts, baptisms, and the annual administration of the Sacraments, together with other noteworthy items.

CAN. 301

§ 1. In regione sibi commissa commorentur, a qua sine gravi et urgenti causa per notabile tempus iis abesse ne liceat, inconsulta Sede Apostolica.

§ 2. Regionem sibi concreditam, quandocumque sit opus, debent ipsi per se vel, si legitime impediti fuerint, per alium visitare eaque omnia in visitatione expendere,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quae ad fidem, bonos mores, Sacramentorum administrationem, praedicationem verbi Dei, festorum observantiam, cultum divinum, iuventutis institutionem, disciplinam ecclesiasticam referuntur.

Apostolic vicars and prefects must reside in the territory assigned to them and are not allowed to be absent therefrom for any considerable length of time without a weighty and urgent reason and without having consulted the Apostolic See.

Whenever necessary, they must visit their district either themselves or, if impeded, send another, and at this visitation take due measures respecting the faith, good morals, the administration of the Sacraments, preaching, the observance of feasts, divine worship, the education of youth, and ecclesiastical discipline.

These two paragraphs enjoin residence and diocesan visitation; that a wide margin is left as to place and time is but natural in missionary countries. Due regard must necessarily be taken of distance and transportation facilities. Weighty and urgent reasons may arise at any moment and cannot always be foreseen.

CAN. 302

Constituant Consilium ex tribus saltem antiquioribus et prudentioribus missionariis, quorum sententiam, saltem per epistolam, audiant in gravioribus et difficilioribus negotiis.

They shall appoint a council consisting of at least three of their older and more experienced missionaries, whose opinion they shall hear, at least by letter, in more important and difficult matters.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 303

Prout siverit opportunitas, missionarios saltem praecipuos tum religiosos tum saeculares proprii territorii congregent semel saltem in anno, ut possint ex singulorum experientia et consilio deducere quae sint ordinanda perfectius.

As far as circumstances permit, they shall also convoke the principal missionaries, religious as well as secular, once a year, in order to learn from their experience and advice what may be more perfectly arranged.

CAN. 304

§ 1. Legibus quae de archivo constituendo Episcopis praescribuntur, etiam Vicarii ac Praefecti Apostolici, habita locorum personarumque ratione, aeque tenentur.

§ 2. Pariter quae de Conciliis plenariis et provincialibus can. 281–291 praescribuntur, applicari debent, congrua congruis referendo, Conciliis plenariis vel regionalibus et provincialibus in regionibus Sacrae Congregationi de Prop. Fide subiectis; quae de Synodo dioecesana can. 356–362, Synodo vicariatus apostolici; sed nullum est praefinitum tempus pro Concilii provincialis et Synodi celebratione, et canones Conciliorum, antequam promulgentur, recognosci debent a Sacra Congregatione de Prop. Fide.

Vicars and prefects, like bishops, but with due consideration of persons and places, are obliged to keep archives for the documents pertaining to their districts. Similarly, but also in a manner proportionate to circumstances, the prescriptions concerning plenary and provincial councils (can. 281–291) must be applied to the provinces subject to the Propaganda; also enactments regarding diocesan synods (can. 356–362). However, no definite time is fixed for the celebration of either provincial councils or diocesan synods, and the canons of both must, before promulgation, be recognized by the Propaganda. Here it is permissible to doubt whether the religious superiors are to be excluded from participation in a plenary council.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 305

Studiosissime curent, onerata graviter eorum conscientia, ut ex christianis indigenis seu incolis suae regionis probati clerici rite instituantur ac sacerdotio initientur.

They are under strict obligation to see to it that worthy Christian natives or inhabitants of their province are properly trained and raised to the priesthood. This most Apostolic injunction has been insisted upon in various Apostolic constitutions and inculcated again and again by the S. C. Prop. Fide. Thus, on Nov. 23, 1845, the latter enjoined that natives should be trained and employed, not only in inferior mission work, such as catechizing, but also as missionaries, who in course of time might become pastors of souls and even vicars or prefects Apostolic. The contrary practice was condemned as opposed to the intentions of the Holy See and out of keeping with the spirit of the sacred ministry.

CAN. 306

Missae sacrificium pro populis sibi commissis applicare debent, saltem in sollemnitatibus Nativitatis Domini, Epiphaniae, Paschatis, Ascensionis, Pentecostes, sanctissimi Corporis Christi, Immaculatae Con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceptionis et Assumptionis Beatae Mariae Virginis, Sancti Ioseph eius sponsi, Sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, Omnium Sanctorum, servato praescripto can. 339, §§ 2 seqq.

They must apply the holy sacrifice of the Mass for the people entrusted to them at least on the feasts of Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Corpus Christi, the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption of the B. V. Mary, St. Joseph, SS. Peter and Paul, and All Saints, with due regard to the rules laid down in can. 339, § 2 ff.

CAN. 307

§ 1. Ipsis non licet, inconsulta Sede Apostolica, concedere missionariis ab ea missis veniam in perpetuum deserendi vicariatum aut praefecturam, vel alio transeundi, nec eos quoquo modo expellere.

§ 2. In casu autem publici scandali possunt ipsi, audito suo Consilio, et si agatur de religiosis, praemonito, quantum fieri potest, Superiore, missionarium statim removere, facta tamen illico certiore Apostolica Sede.

They are not allowed, without consulting the Apostolic See, to grant to the missionaries sent out by the same (Apostolic See) perpetual leave of absence from their vicariate or prefecture, or permission to go elsewhere, or to expel them in any way.

In case a missionary has given public scandal, however, they may, after having heard their counsellors, and, if the culprit is a religious, after serving notice, when possible, upon his superior, remove him at once and then notify the Apostolic See as soon as possible.[11]

11 Clement IX, "Speculatores," Sept. 13, 1669; Leo XIII, "Ad

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 308

Vicariis et Praefectis, charactere episcopali auctis, privilegia honorifica competunt, quae ius concedit Episcopis titularibus; si autem charactere episcopali careant, habent tantum, durante munere et in proprio territorio, insignia et privilegia Protonotariorum apostolicorum de numero participantium.

Vicars and prefects, if they have the episcopal character, enjoy the same prerogatives of honor which the law grants to titular bishops; if they are not consecrated bishops, they are entitled, during their tenure of office and in their own territory only, to the insignia and privileges of prothonotaries Apostolic de numero participantium.

As titular bishops, vicars and prefects rank after residential bishops. Their place at councils is expressly defined in the Code.[12]

As to the protonotarii apostolici de numero participantium, Pius X ("Inter multiplices," Feb. 25, 1905) regulated their dress, which is that of regular prelates, with the right of wearing a ring and the faculty of pontificating outside of the Eternal City, but only with the faldistorium (faldstool) and without the seventh candle. Nor are they allowed to bless the people when entering the church. They say not "Pax vobis," but "Dominus vobiscum." They wear the pectoral cross only when they pontificate. Their mitre is not the pretiosa (studded with gems), but of gold cloth or silk, and their skull-cap of black silk. They always need the consent of the Ordinary if they wish to celebrate pontifical High Mass.[13] extremas Orientis," June 24, 1893; Instructio S. C. Prop. Fide in Collectio Lacensis, VI, 663 ff.

12 Can. 348 f.

13 Cf. Am. Eccl. Rev., 1905 (Vol. 33), p. 612 ff; Vol. 34, p. 74 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 309

§ 1. Vicarii et Praefecti, ubi primum in territorium suum advenerint, deputent ex uno vel altero clero Pro-vicarium vel Pro-praefectum idoneum, nisi Coadiutor cum futura successione a Sancta Sede datus fuerit.

§ 2. Pro-vicarius aut Pro-praefectus nullam habet, vivente Vicario aut Praefecto, potestatem, nisi quae fuerit ab eodem sibi commissa; sed deficiente Vicario aut Praefecto, vel eorum iurisdictione impedita ad normam can. 429, § 1, totum debet regimen assumere et in hoc munere permanere, donec a Sancta Sede aliter fuerit provisum.

§ 3. Pari modo Pro-vicarius aut Pro-praefectus, qui titulari successerit, statim deputet ecclesiasticum virum, qui sibi, ut supra, in munere succedat.

§ 4. Si forte contingat ut nemo sive a titulari sive a pro-titulari uti administrator fuerit designatus, tunc senior in vicariatu vel praefectura, is, nempe, qui sit praesens in territorio et suas destinationis litteras in eodem prius exhibuerit, censetur delegatus a Sancta Sede ut regimen assumat, et inter plures aeque seniores antiquior sacerdotio.

Vicars and prefects shall, immediately upon entering their territory, appoint a fit clergyman as pro-vicar or pro-prefect, unless the Holy See has already assigned a co-adjutor with the right of succession.

The pro-vicar or pro-prefect has no power during the lifetime of the vicar or prefect, except in so far as the latter has committed it to him; but in case the vicar or prefect ceases to officiate, or if his jurisdiction is impeded, according to can. 429, § 1, the pro-vicar or pro-prefect assumes the whole government and administers it until the Holy See shall provide otherwise.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A pro-vicar or pro-prefect who has succeeded the vicar or prefect proper, shall immediately appoint an ecclesiastic to succeed him.

Should the appointment of an administrator have been omitted either by the vicar or the pro-vicar, the prefect or the pro-prefect, then the senior of the vicariate or prefecture, i. e., the priest who is present in the territory and has first shown the papers of his missionary appointment, must be looked upon as delegated by the Holy See to assume the reins, or if there are several of equal seniority, the one who has been longest in the priesthood.

Benedict XIV provided that where no coadjutor with the right to succession had been appointed, the vicar Apostolic should name a pro-vicar or quasi vicar-general, who in case of the demise of the vicar should immediately succeed him.[14] In another Constitution [15] he limited the appointment of a vicar-general to territories in which there were no chapters or consultors who would be entitled to choose a vicar-capitular. But he also modified the requisites (doctor title) for the office of vicar, demanding only that he be "habilis et idoneus." Our canon modifies this law in so far as not only the vicars Apostolic but also the prefects Apostolic are instructed to appoint pro-prefects, in order to obviate any uncertainty or confusion regarding the government of the territory. The canon makes no distinction between territories with chapters or concultors and such as have none of these, but merely enjoins that a pro-vicar or pro-prefect be appointed immediately upon entering his office, or rather his district. The power of these pro-vicars and pro-prefects is suspended until the vicars and prefects go out of office, just as Benedict XIV had ordered.

14 "Ex sublimi," Jan. 26, 1753. 15 "Quam ex sublimi," Aug. 8, 1755.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 310

§ 1. Ad quos vicariatus aut praefecturae cura devenerit ad normam can. 309, ii debent quamprimum certiorem facere Apostolicam Sedem.

§ 2. Interim uti possunt omnibus facultatibus sive ordinariis ad normam can. 294, sive delegatis, quibus Vicarius vel Praefectus pollebat, nisi commissae fuerint ob industriam personae.

Those who rule a vicariate or prefecture (ad interim) according to can. 309, must inform the Apostolic See as soon as possible. In the meanwhile they enjoy the faculties, both ordinary (can. 294) and delegated, which were enjoyed by the vicar or prefect himself, with the exception of such as were granted with sole respect to person.

These faculties in certain formularies — the personal faculties are not contained in these formularies — are given by the S. C. of the Propaganda.

CAN. 311

Qui vacariatui vel praefecturae apostolicae ad certum tempus praepositus est, debet in regimine cum omnibus facultatibus sibi concessis permanere, licet definitum tempus fuerit praeterlapsum, donec successor canonicam sui muneris possessionem ceperit.

One who is appointed to a vicariate or prefecture for a certain time only, must continue to administer the government with all the faculties granted to him, until his successor has taken canonical possession of the office, even though this should happen after his own term has expired.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IX

APOSTOLIC ADMINISTRATORS

CAN. 312

Dioecesis canonice erectae regimen, sive plena, sive vacante sede, aliquando Summus Pontifex ob graves et speciales causas Administratori Apostolico vel in perpetuum vel ad tempus committit.

The Sovereign Pontiff, for weighty and special reasons, sometimes entrusts a canonically established diocese, either during the occupancy of the Ordinary or during a vacancy, to an Apostolic administrator, either permanently or for a limited period.

Administrators, sometimes styled visitatores, occur in the Decretals of Boniface VIII. They were appointed either by the Roman Pontiff or by the chapter, the synod or the metropolitan, but only those appointed by the Pope had full power.[1] Besides it was customary to allow young nobles to assume the government of a diocese as administrators in temporal, especially princely, affairs.[2] Later it became the exclusive right of the Pope to assign an administrator to a diocese. This right he often exercised in times of politico-ecclesiastical troubles, such as happened, e. g., at Cologne, and lately at Genoa. The expedient of appointing an Apostolic administrator is occasionally resorted to when the financial or religious conditions of a diocese are in a precarious state. The administrator is named in pleno congressu by the S. C. Consistorialis, and the letters of appointment are dispatched in the form of a Bull.[3]

1 C. 42, 6°, I, 6; c. 4, 6°, I, 8. 2 Sägmüller, K.-R., 1 ed., p. 363.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 3

§ 1. Quilibet Administrator Apostolicus, si datus fuerit dioecesi, sede plena, canonicam administrationis possessionem init, ostendens litteras suae nominationis tum Episcopo, si sit mentis consiliique compos et in dioecesi versetur, tum etiam Capitulo, ad normam can. 334, § 3.

§ 2. Si sedes fuerit vacans, vel si Episcopus non sit mentis consiliique compos, aut in dioecesi non moretur, Administrator Apostolicus possessionem sumit ad instar Episcopi secundum cit. can. 334, § 3.

Every Apostolic administrator given to a see whilst still occupied by a bishop (sede plena) enters upon the canonical possession of his administration by presenting the letters of his appointment to the bishop, if the latter is in full possession of his mental faculties and dwells in the diocese, as well as to the chapter, according to can. 334, § 3.

If the see is vacant, or the bishop is not in full possession of his mental faculties, or if he does not dwell in the diocese, the administrator takes possession like a new bishop, according to can. 334, § 3.

We believe "mentis consiliique compos" here means the full possession of one's mental faculties, for it may be that one can think rationally, but lacks the faculty of memory, or by reason of softening of the brain has no

[3] "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908, P. II, c. VII, art. 2, n. 7 (A. Ap. S., I, 83 f.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

will power. The so-called lucida intervalla must not be taken into account here.

A bishop may dwell outside of his diocese either casually or fortuitously, or culpably, or as an exile, by deportation. Again, he may be in the diocese, but held a quasi-prisoner. In the latter case, too, it may be said that he has no power of his own (impos consilii).

Can. 314

Iura, officia ac privilegia Administratoris Apostolici desumantur ex litteris suae deputationis, vel, nisi in eisdem aliud caveatur expresse, ex praescripto canonum qui sequuntur.

The rights, duties, and privileges of an Apostolic administrator must be gathered from the letter of appointment, or if no special provision is therein made, from the rules laid down in the following canons.

Can. 315

§ 1. Administrator Apostolicus permanenter constitutus iisdem iuribus et honoribus fruitur, iisdemque obligationibus tenetur, ac Episcopus residentialis.

§ 2. Si ad tempus datus sit:

1.° Eadem iura ac officia habet, ac Vicarius Capitularis; sed, sede plena, potest dioecesim visitare ad tramitem iuris; nec tenetur obligatione applicandae Missae pro populo, quae Episcopum gravat;

2.° Ad honorifica privilegia quod attinet, valeat praescriptum can. 308; sed Episcopo qui, ad aliam sedem translatus, prioris retinet administrationem, in hac quoque omnia Episcoporum residentialium honorifica privilegia competunt.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

An Apostolic administrator, if appointed permanently, enjoys the same rights and honors and is bound by the same obligations as a residential bishop.

If he is appointed only for a limited time, he has the same rights and duties as a vicar-capitular, but may visit the diocese according to law; but he is not obliged to apply the Mass for the people, as a bishop is.

As to honorary prerogatives, an Apostolic administrator enjoys those of a titular bishop (see can. 308), or, if he is not a bishop, those of Apostolic prothonotaries de numero participantium.

A bishop transferred to another see, who retains the administration of his former diocese, enjoys also in the latter all the honorary privileges of a residential bishop.

CAN. 316

§ 1. Si Administrator Apostolicus dioecesi, sede plena, praeficiatur, iurisdictio Episcopi eiusque Vicarii Generalis suspenditur.

§ 2. Quanquam autem Administrator Apostolicus Episcopi auctoritati non subest, non debet tamen se immiscere causis Episcopum ipsum spectantibus, neque in Vicarium eius Generalem iudicium seu processum instruere aut animadvertere ob acta praeteritae administrationis.

If an administrator is appointed for a diocese while its bishop is still alive, the jurisdiction of the bishop and of his vicar-general is suspended.

Although the administrator is not subject to the authority of the bishop, yet he must not meddle in affairs which concern the bishop personally, nor try judicially or punish the vicar-general for acts of the former administration.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 317

Si impedita fuerit iurisdictio Administratoris Apostolici aut si idem Administrator defecerit, Sedes Apostolica statim moneatur; et interim, si dioecesis vacet aut Episcopus non sit sui compos, valent praescripta can. 429 seqq.; secus Episcopus dioecesim regit, nisi Sedes Apostolica aliud praestituerit.

If the jurisdiction of an Apostolic administrator is impeded, or if he goes out of office, the Holy See must be immediately informed; meanwhile, if the see is vacant or the bishop is not in full command of his faculties, the prescription of can. 429 ff. must be followed; in all other cases the bishop rules the diocese, unless the Apostolic See has decided otherwise.[4]

CAN. 318

§ 1. Administratoris Apostolici iurisdictio Romani Pontificis aut Episcopi obitu non cessat.

§ 2. Cessat vero cum Episcopus dioecesis vacantis possessionem legitime ceperit ad normam can. 334, § 3.

The jurisdiction of an Apostolic administrator does not expire with the death of the Roman Pontiff or the bishop. But it ceases as soon as the bishop of a vacant see has taken legal possession thereof, according to can. 334, § 3.

Under § 1 of this canon the canons or consultors of a diocese cannot proceed to the election of a vicar-capitular or administrator while the bishop whose diocese is ruled by an Apostolic administrator, is alive.[4] [4] S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 4, 1578; Jan. 24, 1749 (Bizzarri, l. c. p. 31, 214, 276).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER X

INFERIOR PRELATES

CAN. 319

§ 1. Praelati qui praesunt territorio proprio, separato ab omni dioecesi, cum clero et populo, dicuntur Abbates vel Praelati nullius, nempe dioecesis, prout eorum ecclesia dignitate abbatiali vel simpliciter praelatitia gaudet.

§ 2. Abbatia vel praelatura nullius, tribus saltem paroeciis non constans, singulari iure regitur, nec eidem applicantur quae canones statuunt de abbatiis vel praelaturis nullius.

Prelates who preside over a territory of their own, belonging to no diocese, inhabited by clergy and people, are called abbots or prelates nullius, viz., of no diocese, according as their church is abbatial or simply prelatial.

An abbey or prelature nullius, which does not consist of at least three parishes, is ruled by special law, and the following canons do not apply to it.

It is evident that here the question of exemption would, at least partly, enter canonical discussion. However, this topic belongs formally to the tract on religious, to which we must therefore refer the reader for a fuller exposition. Here we will only state, with Benedict XIV, that there are three kinds of inferior prelates:

(1) such as are superiors of religious living within a monastery or convent with passive exemption from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(2) such as enjoy active jurisdiction over the clergy and people of a certain district within the limits of a diocese; and

(3) prelates with active jurisdiction over clergy and people living in a territory which is separated and distinguished by proper boundaries from the surrounding dioceses. The last-named class of prelates are abbots or prelates nullius (dioeceseos), and their right or title is acquired by Apostolic privilege or immemorial custom which bears all the marks of a juridical proof.[1] The Annuario Pontificio for 1917 enumerates four prelatures, eighteen abbeys, and one priory nullius.[2] One of the eighteen abbeys is St. Mary's, at Belmont, North Carolina. The Abbey of Einsiedeln, Switzerland, belongs to the class defined in § 2 of our canon, for its active exemption and jurisdiction extends only over the territory circumscribed by the walls of the monastery and over the clergy and people living within that precinct; therefore this latter abbey is ruled by special laws.

CAN. 320

§ 1. Abbates vel Praelati nullius nominantur et instituuntur a Romano Pontifice, salvo iure electionis aut praesentationis, si cui legitime competat; quo in casu ab eodem Romano Pontifice confirmari aut institui debent.

§ 2. Assumendi ad abbatiam vel praelaturam nullius iisdem qualitatibus ornati esse debent, quas ius in Episcopis requirit.

Abbots and prelates nullius are nominated and invested

1 De Syn. Dioec., II, 11, 2 ff.

2 Page 283 ff., the priory being that of Ciudad Real in Spain belonging to the United Military Orders.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by the Roman Pontiff, with due regard to the right of election or presentation lawfully belonging to another person; in which latter case they are confirmed or invested by the Roman Pontiff.

Those chosen to govern an abbey or prelature nullius must have the same qualifications which the law requires for bishops.

CAN. 321

Si cui collegio est ius eligendi Abbatem vel Praelatum nullius ad validam electionem requiritur numerus suffragiorum absolute maior, demptis suffragiis nullis, firmo peculiari iure quod maiorem suffragiorum numerum exigat.

As abbots or prelates nullius are classed with bishops, it is evident that the Pope is entitled to nominate them. However, the Code does not wish to curtail the acquired rights of others, be they physical or moral persons. The physical person generally is the patron, e. g., the King of Spain concerning Ciudad Real; who presents a fit person for the vacant office. The right of election belongs to an electoral college, which must proceed according to the rules laid down in can. 160–178. However, if the constitutions or statutes of a college or chapter require it, the candidate must have two-thirds of the entire number of votes. On the other hand, any statute or constitution which admits only a relative majority, would now have to be discarded. If, for instance, there are forty electors and three candidates, one of whom receives twenty, the second eleven, the third nine votes, the election is null and void. As to the qualifications of candidates, can. 331 must be observed.[3]

[3] Gregory XIV, "Onus apostolicae," May 15, 1591, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 322

§ 1. Abbas vel Praelatus nullius nequit quovis titulo sive per se sive per alios in regimen abbatiae vel praelaturae se ingerere, antequam eiusdem possessionem ceperit, ad normam can. 334, § 3.

§ 2. Abbates vel Praelati nullius qui ex praescripto apostolico vel ex propriae religionis constitutionibus benedici debent, intra tres menses a receptis litteris apostolicis, cessante legitimo impedimento, benedictionem ab Episcopo, quem maluerint, accipiant.

§ 1 strictly prohibits any interference in the spiritual or temporal government of an abbey or prelature nullius by the candidate-elect before he has received the Apostolic letters confirming his election. But suppose the election fell upon the administrator or vicar-capitular, what then? In that case, as Pius IX has decided,[4] a new administrator should be chosen by the electoral college. Our Code, mitigating the Constitution of Pius IX just quoted,[5] inflicts the penalty of suspension of the right of election ad beneplacitum, if the electors allow the candidate elected or presented to interfere before he has received the Apostolic letters notifying him of his appointment. One who acts against this law is declared unable to obtain the prelacy.[6] But can. 334, § 3 permits an administrator who is elected bishop, to continue in the office of administrator.

As to the blessing of abbots or prelates nullius, the Code speaks conditionally, viz., if an Apostolic mandate or statute requires the same. Up to a few years ago the Cassinese abbots, three[7] of whom are abbots nullius,

4 "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873.

5 According to the Const. just quoted, excommunication speciali modo reserved was inflicted.

6 Can. 2394.

7 Those of Monte Cassino, S. Paolo Roma, SS. Trinità della Cava de' Tirreni.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

were never blessed, because being chosen ad tempus, for special reasons, they simply took possession of their abbeys after being confirmed. An abbot must be blessed by a bishop, not by an abbot.[8]

CAN. 323

§ 1. Abbas vel Praelatus nullius easdem potestates ordinarias easdemque obligationes cum iisdem sanctionibus habet, quae competunt Episcopis residentialibus in propria dioecesi.

§ 2. Si charactere episcopali non sit ornatus et benedictionem, si eam recipere debet, receperit, praeter alia munera quae in can. 294, § 2 describuntur, potest quoque ecclesias et altaria immobilia consecrare.

§ 3. Quod attinet ad Vicarii Generalis constitutionem, serventur praescripta can. 366–371.

As to § 1 we may mention[9] that some abbots seem to have exempted themselves from the duty of visiting the tombs of SS. Peter and Paul at stated times. The Code, following the law laid down by Benedict XIV, enjoins on abbots and prelates nullius the same obligations which are incumbent on residential bishops, including the visitatio ad limina.

§ 2 appears somewhat misleading, because there are two conditions in one sentence: if not endowed, and if obliged to receive the blessing, as if the blessing were a necessary qualification for obtaining the rights mentioned. We believe the meaning to be that abbots who are not bishops may perform the functions allowed to vicars and prefects Apostolic — for these are mentioned in can. 294, § 2 —

8 S. Rit. C., March 8, 1617; Barbosa, Summa Apost. Decis., s. v. "Abbas," n. 8.

9 Cfr. Benedict XIV, "Quod sancta," Nov. 23, 1740, §§ 3, 5, 6; "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

but that this does not apply to those abbots who are under obligation to receive the blessing and, against the Apostolic injunction or proper statutes, fail to receive it. As a penalty for their disobedience they are deprived of prerogatives which they would otherwise enjoy, and which such abbots as are not bound to receive the blessing enjoy unconditionally.

We may here draw attention to our explanation of can. 294, § 2, where we said that Apostolic vicars and prefects are not entitled to consecrate churches and immovable altars. Can. 323, § 2 adds to the privileges enjoyed by vicars that of consecrating churches and altars as granted to the abbots or prelates nullius, who therefore are more privileged than vicars and prefects.

Can. 324

Capitulum religiosum abbatiae vel praelaturae nullius regitur propriis legibus ac constitutionibus; Capitulum saeculare, iure communi.

Concerning religious chapters and their constitutions, note must be taken of can. 489, which ordains that particular constitutions conflicting with the present Code are to be looked upon as abrogated.

Can. 325

Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, licet charactere episcopali careat, utitur tamen in proprio territorio insignibus pontificalibus cum throno ac baldachino et iure ibidem officia divina pontificali ritu celebrandi; crucem autem pectoralem, annulum cum gemma, ac pileolum violaceum potest etiam extra territorium deferre.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Abbots and prelates nullius, though not consecrated bishops, enjoy within their own territory the right of wearing the pontifical insignia with throne and canopy, and of celebrating pontifical functions; outside their territory, they may wear the pectoral cross, a ring set with a precious stone, and a violet skull-cap.

The canon limits the pontifical functions of these prelates to their own territory, outside of which they are not allowed to pontificate, unless the Ordinary of the diocese grants permission.[10]

CAN. 326

Si praelatura saecularis Capitulo careat, eligantur consultores ad normam can. 423–428.

CAN. 327

§ 1. Abbatia vel praelatura nullius vacante, si agatur de abbatia vel praelatura religiosa, succedit Capitulum religiosorum, nisi constitutiones aliud ferant; si de saeculari, Capitulum canonicorum; utrumque autem Capitulum intra octiduum debet Vicarium Capitularem deputare ad normam can. 432 seqq., qui abbatiam vel praelaturam regat usque ad novi Abbatis vel Praelati electionem.

§ 2. Abbatia vel praelatura impedita, servetur praescriptum can. 429.

During the vacancy of an abbey or a prelature belonging to religious, the chapter of religious succeeds in the government, unless the Constitutions provide otherwise; to a vacant secular abbey or prelature, the chapter of 10 S. Rit. C., Dec. 6, 1631; Barbosa, Summa, Dec. Ap., s. v. "Abbas," n. 28; cfr. can. 337.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google canons succeeds; however, both chapters are obliged within eight days from date of notice of the vacancy, according to can. 432 ff., to elect a vicar-capitular, who shall rule the abbey or prelacy until a new abbot or prelate is elected.

If an abbey or prelature is impedita, let canon 429 be observed.

These canons will be treated in their proper places further down.

Can. 328

Circa Romani Pontificis Familiares, sive praelati titulo gaudeant, sive non, standum privilegiis, regulis et traditionibus pontificiae Domus.

The term familiares (dependants) of the Roman Pontiff excludes the so-called palatinate Cardinals, who would otherwise belong to the familia pontificia. The latter term first included all persons belonging to the Papal Court, but towards the end of the fifteenth century it came to be a special distinction or honor granted to certain persons who stood in a special relation to the palatinate clergy.[11] Now the palatinate clergy really meant those clerics who served the palatium Lateranense, or Lateran palace. But in course of times various papal officials and tribunals (Rota and Signatura) were detached from the palatinate clergy and attached to the Papal Court.[12] According to the Annuario Pontificio for 1917 the following belong to the Familia Pontificia: two Cardinals palatinate, the Maggiordomo, the Maestro di Camera, the Vicar-Prefect of the Sacred Apostolic Palaces, the Auditor of the Pope, the Master of the Sacred 11 Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 559.

12 Phillips, K.-R., 1864, Vol. VI, 333 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Palace, the secret Chamberlains participantes,[13] the Domestic Prelates in great number, the secret Chamberlains supernumerary, also in great number, the Chamberlains with the purple dress (pavonazzo) in and outside of Rome, and finally the secret chaplains in and outside the City.[14]

13 After that would follow the camerieri di spada e cappa, who, however, are all secular persons.

14 Annuario Pontificio, 1917, p. 455 ff.; Pius X, "Inter multiplices," Feb. 21, 1905.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VIII

THE EPISCOPAL POWER AND THOSE WHO PARTAKE THEREOF

After treating of the supreme power in the Church and those who stand either in a proximate or a remote relation to the Sovereign Pontiff, the Code proceeds to deal with the episcopal power and those who partake thereof. The whole preceding title considered only prelates immediately connected with the Papal Court. This is intelligible, because all the ranks of the hierarchic order so far enumerated, with the exception of the Primacy itself, are of ecclesiastical institution, and, so to speak, ramifications of the central power.

Now a new title starts, treating of an institution which, though dependent on the supreme power, exists not by mere permission or authority of the Roman Pontiff, but by divine right and ordination.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE BISHOPS

CAN. 329

§ 1. Episcopi sunt Apostolorum successores atque ex divina institutione peculiaribus ecclesiis praeficiuntur quas cum potestate ordinaria regunt sub auctoritate Romani Pontificis.

§ 2. Eos libere nominat Romanus Pontifex.

§ 3. Si cui collegio concessum sit ius eligendi Episcopum, servetur praescriptum can. 321.

After what has been said under cc. 100 and 216, only a few remarks remain to be added.

The names episcopus and sacerdos occur promiscuously up to the third century, and even at the time of St. Gregory the Great, bishops were called consacerdotes, which is not surprising, since the bishops are priests in the fullness of the word, who have received the plenitude of the priesthood and jurisdiction over a determined territory, generally called diocese. Hence bishops were also styled dioecesani.

Two characteristics distinguish the bishop from the simple priest: the fullness of the priesthood and the power of jurisdiction in foro externo. The former, potestas ordinis, consists chiefly in the right of administering the Sacraments of Confirmation and Holy Orders and performing pontifical consecrations and blessings. The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

potestas iurisdictionis is ordinary, because ipso facto attached to the episcopal office, wherefore the bishop is also called Ordinarius (i. e., iudex) of his diocese. However, the episcopal jurisdiction is subject to the power of the Sovereign Pontiff, and hence is neither plena nor independens, but limited, first to the diocese (locally) and, secondly, in regard to subject-matter (materially), especially by reserved cases and limited dispensations, as also by co-called causae maiores.

From this we must conclude: (1) that whereas the potestas ordinis is equal in the bishops and the Pope, the latter is superior to the bishops as to the potestas iurisdictionis; (2) that bishops are superior to ordinary priests both in power, order, and jurisdiction. These conclusions are de fide.[1] The opinion of St. Jerome[2] concerning the equality of bishops and priests, and the false views of William a Sancto Amore are of purely historical interest.[3] The Code merely says that the bishops are by divine right placed over single dioceses. This expression appears to us not well chosen. For local organizations are not of divine institution, and therefore single dioceses cannot correctly be said to be ruled by the bishops in virtue of a divine ordinance. The truth is that, by virtue of their episcopal consecration, bishops are radically (aptitudinaliter) qualified to rule a diocese assigned to them by the Pope. Jurisdiction, of course, no matter how we conceive it to be conferred, whether immediately by God through consecration, or mediately through the Pope, can neither validly nor licitly be exercised without a canonical mission, which, on account of the monarchical principle of the Church, 1 Vatic., Sess. IV, c. 3; Trid., Sess. 23, cap. 4; can. 7 f. (Denzinger, l. c., nn. 1672 ff. nn. 837, 844 f.).

2 Comm. in Titum, I; Ep. ad Ocean. 69, 1; ep. 146 ad. Evang. 1.

3 Bouix, De Parocho, 1855, p. 65 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

must be imparted by the supreme head. Therefore, also, episcopal consecration is, according to modern law,[4] reserved to the Pope, who has moreover the exclusive right of confirming bishops.[5]

§ 3 of our canon mentions the election of bishops, which followed, as we shall see under chapter V (Diocesan Chapters), the investiture, which the diocesan chapters, with the approval of the Holy See, vindicated to themselves. The Decretals mention this mode of providing for a vacant diocese, not as a particular concession of the Holy See, but rather as a matter-of-fact and the usual thing.

QUALITIES REQUIRED IN A BISHOP

CAN. 330

Antequam quis in Episcopum assumatur, constare debet, secundum modum a Sede Apostolica determinatum, eum esse idoneum.

Can. 331

§ 1. Ut quis idoneus habeatur, debet esse:

1.° Natus ex legitimo matrimonio, non autem legitimatus etiam per subsequens matrimonium;

2.° Annos natus saltem triginta;

3.° A quinquennio saltem in sacro presbyteratus ordine constitutus;

4.° Bonis moribus, pietate, animarum zelo, prudentia, ceterisque dotibus praeditus, quae ipsum aptum

4 Schemier, Jurisprud. Eccl. Civilis, l. I, tr. 3, c. 1, n. 569; Pontificale Rom., tit. de consec. electi.

5 Benedict XIV, "In postremo," Oct. 20, 1756, § 15; but historians would put at least a sign of interrogation after the word "restituta," used in the paragraph quoted; even the Decretals speak of election as something usual and legal; cc. 46, 48, 50, 57, X, I, 6 de electione.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

efficiant ad gubernandam dioecesim de qua agitur;

5.° Laurea doctoris vel saltem licentia in sacra theologia aut iure canonico potitus in athenaeo aliquo vel in Instituto studiorum a Sancta Sede probatis, vel saltem earundem disciplinarum vere peritus; quod si ad religionem aliquam pertineat, a suis Superioribus maioribus vel similem titulum vel saltem verae peritiae testimonium habeat.

§ 2. Etiam electus, praesentatus vel quoquo modo ab illis designatus, qui privilegio a Sancta Sede concesso eligendi, praesentandi seu designandi gaudent, debet memoratis qualitatibus pollere.

§ 3. Iudicare num quis idoneus sit, ad Apostolicam Sedem unice pertinet.

CAN. 332

§ 1. Cuilibet ad episcopatum promovendo, etiam electo, praesentato vel designato a civili quoquo Gubernio, necessaria est canonica provisio seu institutio, qua Episcopus vacantis dioecesis constituitur, quaeque ab uno Romano Pontifice datur.

§ 2. Ante canonicam institutionem seu provisionem candidatus, praeter fidei professionem de qua in can. 1406–1408, iusiurandum fidelitatis erga Sanctam Sedem edat secundum formulam ab Apostolica Sede probatam.

No one, says can. 330, shall be appointed a bishop, unless his fitness is proved according to the rules prescribed by the Apostolic See. It also mentions the processus informativus[6] or investigation into the qualifications of candidates for the episcopal office. This is now conducted by the S. C. Consistorialis. For appointments to bishop-

[6] Trid., Sess. 24, c. 1 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rics outside of Italy, the Secretary of State gathers the necessary documents, makes up what is called the "position" of the case, and then proposes it to the full Congregation. According to a decree of July 25, 1916, of the same Congregation [7] the names and qualifications of candidates for American sees, after being passed upon by the bishops and the metropolitan of the province, must be forwarded to the Secretary of State.

Canon 331 states some of the qualities which are required in episcopal candidates over and above those demanded for the priesthood.

(1) The candidate must be of legitimate birth. Legitimation by a subsequent marriage is not sufficient. This is a stricter regulation than was usually admitted by authors.[8] It means that at the time the candidate was born, his parents must have lived in lawful wedlock.

(2) The candidate must be thirty years of age and in sacred orders or the priesthood. As to age, the old law [9] was not quite determined up to the Decretals,[10] and the Tridentine Council did not fix the precise age, but simply referred to the canons.[11] And as to the time during which one had to be in sacred orders, the Council required only six months. The new Code requires five years.

(3) The moral qualifications are more detailed in our canon than in the Tridentine decrees.[12]

(4) As to scientific equipment, the Code closely follows the enactments of Trent, but inserts "vere peritus" to determine more definitely the Tridentine decree which says that if an academic degree is wanting, "at least the

7 A. Ap. S., 1916 (VIII), p. 400 ff.

8 Cfr. Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Ep., P. II, alleg. 1, nn. 33 ff.

9 C. 3, dist. 77 required 45 years; c. Dist. 51 only 30 years.

10 Cc. 7, 19, X, I, 6 de electione.

11 Sess. 22, c. 2 de ref.

12 Ib. and Sess. 24, c. 1 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

public testimony of an academy should declare the candidate fit to teach others." It is not probable now-a-days that, as in the time of Honorius III (1216–1227), a bishop should be unable to read the grammar or "Donatus," [13] but the standard of scholarship laid down by the Code must be insisted upon. For, as Barbosa says, a bishop without learning is like a ship without a rudder, a clock without weights, a hen without wings.[14] A bishop should be particularly "well versed" in theology and canon law because the former governs the court of conscience, while the latter is required for the forum externum.

The superiores maiores of a candidate who belongs to a religious order or congregation are the Abbot Primate, the Abbot President, the Abbot, the Superior General, or the Provincial.[15]

The same qualities are required for all candidates for episcopal sees, no matter whether they are elected, presented, or designated, for the law [16] makes no distinction. Nor is there any reason for granting an exemption when the public welfare is concerned, since these qualities are prescribed not merely for the persons, but for the office, which is one of great dignity and importance. Nothing, says Innocent III, is more offensive to the Church of God, than unworthy prelates ruling souls.[17] The Roman Pontiff alone is competent to judge whether or not the qualities described in the papers relating to the processus informativus are sufficient. Of course, in case of necessity or utility the Pontiff may dispense with some of the required qualifications.[18]

13 C. 15, X, I, 14.

14 De Officio et Pot. Ep., P. II, alleg. 1, n. 25.

15 Can. 488, 8°; cfr. Trid., Sess. 22, c. 2 de ref.

16 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, X, I, 5; cc. 7, 18, 44, 53, X, I, 6; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 1 de ref.

17 C. 44, X, I, 6.

18 Ib. and c. 19, X, I, 6; Pius X, Allocutio "Duplicem," Nov. 14, 1904.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 332 rejects the claim of the so-called regalists that the right of presentation includes investiture, and that consequently a bishop can enter upon the government of his diocese without papal investiture and documents.[19] The contrary is true. Only by ratification on the part of the Apostolic See can one become a bishop or Ordinary of a diocese. This confirmation is preceded by two acts: the profession of faith and the oath of allegiance to the Church. The oath must be taken before an Apostolic Delegate, personally and not by proxy.[20] If the consecration is performed in virtue of Apostolic letters, the oath of fidelity or loyalty is taken into the hands of the consecrator.[21] This is that "fearful" (!) oath which most probably Pope Gelasius I (492–496) prescribed for the suburbicarian bishops, and which St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, made into the hands of Gregory II, which did not, however, prevent him from making remonstrances to Pope Zachary.[22]

CAN. 333

Nisi legitimo impedimento prohibeatur, promotus ad episcopatum, etiamsi S. R. E. sit Cardinalis, debet, intra tres menses a receptis apostolicis litteris, consecrationem suscipere, et intra quatuor ad suam dioecesim pergere, salvo praescripto can. 238, § 2.

Unless prevented by a lawful obstacle, one promoted to a bishopric, even though he be a cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, must within three months after receiving the Apostolic letters receive consecration, and within 19 Pius IX, Allocutio, "Nunquam fore," Dec. 15, 1856; Syllabus, n. 50 (Denzinger, n. 1598); "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873; cfr. c. 18, X, I, 6; Reg. Iuris I in 6°; c. 5, Clem. I, 3.

20 Can. 1406 f.

21 Pontificale Rom., De Consecr. Electi in Episcopum: Forma juramenti.

22 Cf. Alzog, Manual of Church History, 1876, II, p. 114.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

four months take up residence in his diocese. The cardinal-bishops of the suburbicarian sees are the only ones exempted from this rule. The text is based upon an old law,[23] and its meaning is evident, with the possible exception of the time within which a newly consecrated bishop must go to his diocese. For it might be construed either that the four months run from the date of consecration, or that they must be counted from the date of having received the Apostolic letters of confirmation. In the first case seven months would be granted, in the latter only four. We believe that the latter interpretation is the correct one, because otherwise the clause would have no proper starting point; and hence the omission of the terminus a quo in the last clause must be supplied from that of the first or, "a receptis litteris." This seems still more probable if we consider the omission of the word "months" in the last clause.

DUTIES AND RIGHTS OF BISHOPS

CAN. 334

§ 1. Episcopi residentiales sunt ordinarii et immediati pastores in dioecesibus sibi commissis.

§ 2. In regimen dioecesis neque per se neque per alios, nec ullo sub titulo sese ingerere possunt, nisi prius eiusdem dioecesis possessionem canonice ceperint; sed si ante suam ad episcopatum designationem vicarii capitulares, officiales, oeconomi fuerint renuntiati, haec officia etiam post designationem retinere et exercere possunt.

§ 3. Canonicam dioecesis possessionem capiunt Episcopi residentiales simul ac in ipsa dioecesi vel per se [23] Ce. 7, 44, X, I, 6; Trid., Sess. 7, c. 9, de ref; Sess. 23, c. 2 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vel per procuratorem apostolicas litteras Capitulo ecclesiae cathedralis ostenderint, praesente secretario Capituli vel cancellario Curiae, qui rem in acta referat.

Bishops are the judges-in-ordinary of their respective districts, because their power accrues to them in virtue of the episcopal office, not by mere delegation. What the term immediate, taken from the decrees of the Vatican Council,[24] means is to be determined by the bishop's dependence upon the supreme authority of the Church on the one hand, and by his independence of any secular or clerical power on the other. Pius X complained against the illegal procedure of the government of Portugal, which tried to separate clergy and people from the centre and subject them to its own power.[25] The episcopal power, though it may be offered by electors or patrons, is not conferred by them, but by the Sovereign Pontiff, and is attached to the office. Immediate in the truest sense would mean that the episcopal power is the result of consecration. But it is hardly probable that the Code intends to settle a controversy which has been debated for a long time and with an excess of zeal by canonists.[26] Probably the term here only means that, aside from papal interposition, no other power on earth shares in the bestowal of episcopal jurisdiction.

With regard to his inferiors, the bishop of a diocese is their free and independent judge, and not responsible to them, but subject only to the supreme lawgiver and the common law of the Church.[27]

The next paragraph emphasizes that a bishop elect, even after he is confirmed, should not interfere in dio-

24 Sess. IV, c. 3 (Denzinger, l. c. n. 1674).

25 "Iamdudum," May 24, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 217 ff).

26 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., I, 4, 2.

27 Aichner, l. c., § 115, 3, c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cesan matters before he has taken canonical possession of his see.[28] Stress is here laid, as the quotations of Card. Gasparri show, on the Apostolic letters of Pius IX against the regalistic tendencies which tried to subvert the organization of the Church in favor of civil governments.[29] But the old law already opposed such encroachment.[30]

Our canon permits a candidate elected and confirmed to a bishopric to continue in the office of administrator or official (can. 1573), if he held these offices before his appointment to the episcopate. As bishop elect, however, he cannot accept any such office.

The act of taking juridical (not liturgical) possession of a see is performed in the chapter (in capitulo). In our country this means that the consultors, who take the place of the chapter as far as this forms the senate of the bishop,[31] must meet to hear or inspect the papal document. The chancellor of the diocese, who acted as such under the preceding bishop, must be present, in order to make a record of the proceeding.

CAN. 335

§ 1. Ius ipsis et officium est gubernandi dioecesim tum in spiritualibus tum in temporalibus cum potestate legislativa, iudiciaria, coactiva ad normam sacrorum canonum exercenda.

§ 2. Leges episcopales statim a promulgatione obligare incipiunt, nisi aliud in ipsis caveatur; modus autem promulgationis ab ipsomet Episcopo determinatur.

28 See can. 322.

29 "Nunquam fore," Dec. 15, 1856; Syllabus, n. 50; "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873.

30 Cc. 9, 17, 23, X, I, 6; c. 5, 6°, I, 6; c. 1, Extrav. Comm. I, 3.

31 Can. 427.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 336

§ 1. Observantiam legum ecclesiasticarum Episcopi urgeant; nec in iure communi dispensare possunt, nisi ad normam can. 81.

§ 2. Advigilent ne abusus in ecclesiasticam disciplinam irrepant, praesertim cira administrationem Sacramentorum et Sacramentalium, cultum Dei et Sanctorum, praedicationem verbi Dei, sacras indulgentias implementum piarum voluntatum; curentque ut puritas fidei ac morum in clero et populo conservetur, ut fidelibus, praecipue pueris ac rudibus, pabulum doctrinae christianae praebeatur, ut in scholis puerorum ac iuvenum institutio secundum catholicae religionis principia tradatur.

§ 3. Circa praedicationis munus, servetur praescriptum can. 1327.

About these two canons many pages might be written. The new Code has rendered a great service to the bishops as well as to canonists, as the former have in it a guide-book through the labyrinth of canon law, while the latter are allowed to refer to the respective canons. Yet some observations will not be superfluous.

(1) The bishops, in virtue of their office, enjoy legislative power within the limits of the common law, from which, however, they may dispense under certain conditions. These conditions are laid down in canon 81, which says that a bishop cannot dispense even in individual cases unless this power has been given to him either explicitly (by a faculty), or implicitly in virtue of a special office connected with that of Ordinary. Implicitly may also mean that the law itself grants the power of dispensation in certain cases. And, indeed, our Code

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mentions several instances in which Ordinaries may grant dispensations which would otherwise be beyond their power. Thus they may dispense from examinations those who are distinguished in theological science [82]; they may dispense from occult irregularities,[83] from the banns of marriage,[84] from impediments of ecclesiastical law in certain cases,[85] and from fasting and the observation of feasts in peculiar circumstances.[86]

But, as noticed under can. 81, there is another category of cases in which bishops may dispense, viz.: if the three conditions mentioned there occur. Hence if the law, on the one hand, is sufficiently explicit as to the power of dispensation, it is also strict in limiting the use of that power.[87]

Here let us state that, without solid reasons, Ordinaries cannot validly dispense in common law. Laxity in that regard would subvert ecclesiastical discipline, endanger the hierarchy, and invite schism, such as the pseudo-council of Pistoja tried to bring about.[88]

In what, then, does the legislative power of the bishops consist? Being the guardians, not the authors, of the common law of the Church, they have to watch over its enforcement.[89] They may furthermore make new decrees in matters which the common law has overlooked or left undetermined, for in that case an episcopal decree is not against, but beyond the law. Thus, for instance, the common law [40] ordains in a general way that children

82 Can. 459, § 3.
83 Can. 990.
84 Can. 1028.
85 Can. 1043, 1045.
86 Can. 1245.
87 Can. 85. The S. C. Cons. (Apr. 25, 1918) has abolished certain faculties (Acta Ap. Sedis, X, 190 ff.), of which we shall treat in an appendix.
88 Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," nn. 7, 74 (Denzinger, l. c., nn. 1370, 1437).
89 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XII, passim.
40 Rituale Rom., tit. 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

should be brought to church for baptism as soon as possible. Here the bishop may determine the precise time. He may also determine more accurately the common law rules concerning clerical dress and conduct. He may abolish customs contrary to the common law and proper to his diocese only; although, as Benedict XIV says, he should be cautious in abrogating long standing traditions tolerated by the Church.[41] However, a bishop would exceed his power were he to demand of ordinandi the so-called five-year pledge under threat of refusing them Holy Orders. For such an ordinance would be tantamount to establishing an irregularity, which bishops cannot do.[42]

(2) The judiciary power of the Ordinary extends to all ecclesiastical matters brought before his court, which are not specially reserved to the Holy See. Reserved are all causae maiores, as noted above,[43] as well as the foundation of religious communities and the approbation of their constitutions.[44] Otherwise bishops are judges-in-ordinary of the first instance, and therefore every bishop must establish a diocesan court and finish cases brought before him within the time prescribed by law.[45] Besides, at canonical visitations he may issue enactments and rules for correction, from which appeal can be made only in devolutivo.[46] Lastly, they may reserve cases to themselves, but only a few, at most four.[47]

The place where a bishop can exercise his judiciary power, in cases of contentious jurisdiction, is his whole

41 Bened. XIV, l. c., XII, 7, 4; XI, cc. 10 ff.; XI, cc. 1–3.

42 This is the opinion of a Roman canonist whom we consulted about the matter.

43 Can. 220.

44 Can. 492.

45 Can. 363 f.; can. 1709.

46 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742; can. 345.

47 Can. 897.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

diocese (barring places exempted); whilst extra-judicial or voluntary jurisdiction may be exercised even outside the diocese.[48]

(3) The coercive power of a bishop consists in inflicting ecclesiastical penalties on such as are contumaciously delinquent and recalcitrant. Here especially the censures are to be noted. They are either established by law or directly inflicted by the Ordinary. The Code admonishes bishops to be moderate and very circumspect in wielding this power.[49] To inflict canonical penalties without weighty reasons would diminish episcopal authority and provoke contempt of the bishop.[50] Temporal punishments, especially fines, forfeiture of revenues, etc., unless permitted by law, should be sparingly used.

(4) Regarding the administrative power of a bishop, he is the dispenser and steward of all the church property within his jurisdiction, i. e., so far as not exempt by law, and as such must watch over the diocese.[51] Here we deem it well to call attention to the late decree of the S. C. Council, which says that bishops should not hold church property in fee simple, but have it acknowledged by the State as vested in parish corporations or a corporation sole, to be administered by the bishop with the coöperation of trustees and the diocesan consultors.[52] The bishop is furthermore entitled and obliged to demand an account of priests or administrators, and to see to it that testaments are properly executed.[53]

As to civil laws, note that some States of our Union restrict the amount of property that a church or religious society may hold, and the use to which it is put, whereas 48 Cfr. c. 7, 6°, I, 16; can. 201.

49 Can. 2241.
50 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 3 de ref.; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., v, 5, 5.
51 Can. 1519.
52 July 29, 1911 (Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 45, 586).
53 Can. 1520 ff; Trid., Sess. 22, cc. 9, 11 de ref.; can. 1515.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other States have no restrictions. Nearly all States, however, have some statutory laws, which must be observed as far as they do not conflict with ecclesiastical laws.[54] A deed of land to the bishop for a church in fee simple creates a trust, and on the death of the bishop, the title passes to his successor.[55] As to cemeteries, the civil laws generally acknowledge ecclesiastical jurisdiction.[56]

As regards the exactions the bishop is entitled to make, see can. 1504–1507.

(5) The bishop's ius vigilantiae, according to canon 336, is exercised by watching that no abuses creep into:

(a) The administration of the Sacraments and Sacramentals, which should take place according to the Rituale Romanum. No diocesan ritual should be used, unless it has the special approbation of the Holy See (S. Rit. C.). Bishops may approve editions of Roman liturgical books, if they are in strict concordance with the original text. Their approval is simply testifying to the correctness of the reprint. Bishops may also approve and publish a diocesan calendar with feasts prescribed for the universal church or for their diocese especially. Besides, they may set the hour of divine service more precisely. For the rest the third book contains explicit instructions.

(b) The divine worship and the veneration of saints might be endangered by tolerating devotions not approved by the Church, or by the exhibition of strange images and unusual representations, drawing an aureole around the head of one not yet beatified or canonized, etc.[57] The bishops might, at times, profitably say a word about pictures, sculptures, and architectural designs.

54 Scanlan, The Law of Church and Grave, 1909, n. 304; C. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917.

55 Scanlan, n. 287.

56 Ibid., n. 454.

57 Trid., Sess. 25, de invoc., venerat., etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) As to indulgences, see the rules laid down in can. 911 ff.

(d) Concerning the purity of faith and morals, the rules on the censorship of books are of special importance.[58] Of course, bishops are not infallible judges in matters of faith and morals and cannot singly define articles of faith, and therefore they should abstain from endeavoring to settle dogmatical controversies which the Church has not yet decided.[59]

(e) About schools, the Code gives some important rules in can. 1375 ff., and it is not necessary to repeat the injunctions of popes and councils touching that matter. Leo XIII in the beginning of his pontificate,[60] addressed all the bishops of the Church, saying: "Your duty, Venerable Brethren, is to take every care that the seed of celestial doctrine be sown throughout the field of the Lord, in order that the minds of the faithful may be deeply imbued with the Catholic truths and firmly rooted and preserved from error." He went on to urge upon the bishops the necessity of giving a solid Catholic training to the young.

(f) As to preaching, the new Code merely reiterates the old precept that bishops must preach the word of God and also see to it that the pastors do their duty in this important matter.[61]

PONTIFICAL FUNCTIONS

CAN. 337

§ 1. Episcopus in tota dioecesi, ne exceptis quidem

58 Can. 1384 ff.

59 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VII, 11, 2.

60 "Inscrutabili," April 21, 1878.

61 II Tim. 4, 2; Acts 6, 2; Benedict XV, "Humani generis," June 15, 1917; cfr. can. 1327.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

locis exemptis, potest pontificalia exercere; non vero extra dioecesim sine expresso vel saltem rationabiliter praesumpto consensu Ordinarii loci, et, si agatur de ecclesia exempta, de consensu Superioris religiosi.

§ 2. Exercere pontificalia in iure est sacras functiones peragere quae ex legibus liturgicis requirunt insignia pontificalia, idest baculum et mitram.

§ 3. Episcopus, licentiam concedens pontificalia exercendi in suo territorio, potest quoque permittere usum throni cum baldachino.

That a bishop may perform pontifical functions which require the use of the pastoral staff and mitre, even in the exempt churches of his diocese, has been decided by several congregations. Thus the S. C. EE. et RR. answered on July 10, 1603, that a bishop may employ censures if regulars refuse him that right.[62] Outside his diocese, however, a bishop needs the consent of the respective Ordinary. This consent may reasonably be presumed if the Ordinary is absent and has never objected to outside bishops pontificating in his diocese. However, if the church belongs to exempt religious outside his own diocese the consent must be expressed, because in that case the Ordinary[63] has no power to give his consent, and the religious superior is not supposed to permit a stranger to exercise pontifical functions, in order not to establish a precedent.

Pontifical functions, says the Code, are such as require the use of the pastoral staff and mitre, hence, the conferring of Holy Orders (even minor), Confirmation,

62 Barbosa, Summa Decis. Apost., s. v. "Baldachinum."

63 We scarcely believe that the Code intends to enjoin two consents: that of the Ordinary and that of the religious superior, although "et" (and) would not exclude that interpretation; but the consent of the religious superior too may reasonably be presumed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

blessing abbots, consecrating virgins,[64] consecrating chrism, sacred vessels, blessing sacred vestments, etc. Mitre and staff always go together and are things related to one another in the bishop's use, except, of course, in Masses de requiem.[65]

RESIDENCE

CAN. 338

§ 1. Etiamsi Episcopi Coadiutorem habeant, tenentur lege personalis in dioecesi residentiae.

§ 2. Praeterquam causa visitationis Sacrorum Liminum, Conciliorum, quibus interesse debent, vel civilis officii suis ecclesiis legitime adiuncti, abesse possunt aequa de causa non ultra duos vel ad summum tres menses intra annum, sive continuos sive intermissos, dummodo cautum sit ne ex ipsorum absentia dioecesis quidquam detrimenti capiat: quod tamen tempus coniungi nequit sive cum tempore sibi concesso occasione suae promotionis, vel visitationis Sacrorum Liminum, vel assistentiae Concilio, sive cum tempore vacationum anni subsequentis.

§ 3. Ab ecclesia cathedrali ne absint tempore Adventus et Quadragesimae, diebus Nativitatis, Resurrectionis Domini, Pentecostes et Corporis Christi, nisi ex gravi et urgenti causa.

§ 4. Si ultra sex menses e dioecesi illegitime abfuerint, Episcopum Metropolita, ad normam can. 274, n. 4, Metropolitam antiquior Suffraganeus residens Sedi Apostolicae denuntiet.

64 The phrase "La consacra," which frequently occurs in the regesta S. C. EE. et RR. means the solemn blessing of nuns (moniales) with solemn vows.

65 Cf. Benedict XIV, "Ad audientiam," Feb. 15, 1753, § 8; Caeremoniale Episcoporum, I, c. 17, nn. 4, 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon deals with the important duty of residence, by which is understood not only material presence in the place of office, but also personal discharge of the duties involved. For offices are indeed attached to places, as the Council of Chalcedon (c. 6) enacted, but they are also generally conferred with regard to personal qualities (de industria personae). Hence this obligation may truly be said to have its foundation in divine law, although it is modified and further determined by ecclesiastical law.

The place where the bishop must reside is his diocese, but not necessarily the cathedral church. His presence in the latter is required only at certain times mentioned in § 3. In this point the old law [66] agrees with the new Code.

The law of residence obliges all residential bishops, as well as Cardinals who govern a diocese, with the exception of the six cardinal bishops of the suburbicarian sees.[67]

We may add that, according to canonists, residence in the diocese means attending to business, not merely looking on.

§ 2 allows a three months' vacation, as granted by the Tridentine Council.[68] This period does not include the canonical visit to the tombs of SS. Peter and Paul (a mere pleasure trip, even a pilgrimage, cannot be called a visitatio ad limina) nor the time spent at a council at which attendance is of obligation. (A friendly visit to a provincial or plenary council at which a bishop is not obliged to be present, because not belonging to that prov-

66 C. 19 ff, c. 25 f., C. 7, q. 1; c. 9, X, III, 4; Trid., Sess. 6, c. 1; Sess. 23, c. 1 de ref.; Richter, Trid., pp. 33 ff.; p. 178 ff.; Benedict XIV, "Ad universae," Sept. 3, 1746.

67 Can. 238.

68 L. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ince or country, could not be reckoned off). Lastly,—and this is intended mainly for countries (e. g., Austria) in which the bishops are ex officio deputies to parliamentary assemblies — bishops are allowed to deduct from the three months allowed them for vacation the time they are in duty bound to spend outside their dioceses to attend parliamentary sessions. Foreseeing, however, human frailty and astuteness, or perhaps also good faith wrongly applied, the Code forbids any arbitrary interpretation as to the three months' period by stating that no combination or putting together is allowed, because that would protract a bishop's absence from his diocese.

No mention is made of lawful absence because of a civil office, for in that case circumstances are not at the command of the bishop.

Note that a vacation may not be prolonged by taking the last three months (Oct.-Dec.) of one year and the first three months (Jan.-March) of the following year and staying away six months in succession. All these questions were proposed to the S. Congregation under Urban VIII and solved as stated in the Code.[69]

§ 3 describes the feasts on which bishops must be at their cathedral, for they are pastors whose voice the faithful hear more willingly. From this duty they are excused only by an urgent and solid reason, such a one, says Benedict XIV, as will stand the test before the tribunal of the great Judge.[70]

§ 4 ordains that, if a bishop is unlawfully absent from his diocese for more than six months, the metropolitan must report him to the Holy See, and if he is himself a metropolitan, this duty devolves on the senior suffragan.

69 Benedict XIV, "Ad universae," § Cum vero.

70 "Ubi primum," Dec. 3, 1740, § 4.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Reasons which would excuse such absence are, according to the Council of Trent:[71]

(a) Christian charity, for instance, preaching to infidels and heretics, or a lecture which cannot well be postponed; spiritual or bodily help to confrères and people in time of distress or calamity, such as war, earthquakes, etc.

(b) Urgent necessity, relating to his own person, for instance, persecution, ill-will of the people, or personal infirmity requiring a change of climate; however, the danger of contracting disease in times of epidemics and perils common to pastors and flock does not excuse the bishop from keeping residence;[72]

(c) Obedience to superiors, for instance, a call to Rome or to the Metropolitan, perhaps for a special meeting, trial, canonization, etc. To this class belong the visitatio ad limina and assistance at councils, as expressly stated in the Code;

(d) Evident utility of Church or State, for instance, as peacemakers, as extraordinary envoys or counsellors, as strike settlers, etc. However, if time permits, it is advisable to inform the metropolitan or the Apostolic See.[73]

Reports concerning the non-observance of the law of residence are to be made to S. C. Consistorialis.[74]

MISSA PRO POPULO

CAN. 339

§ 1. Debent quoque, post captam sedis possessionem, omni exiguitatis redituum excusatione aut alia quavis

71 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 3; Sess. 24, c. 12; Benedict XIV, "Ad universae."

72 Benedict XIV, "Ad universae."

73 Wernz, l. c., II, p. 557; p. 564 ed. 1; cfr. can. 465; 2168, 2175.

74 Can. 248, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exceptione remota, omnibus dominicis aliisque festis diebus de praecepto, etiam suppressis, Missam populo sibi commisso applicare.

§ 2. In festo Nativitatis Domini, et si quod festum de praecepto in diem dominicam incidat, satis est ut Missam unam pro populo applicent.

§ 3. Si festum ita transferatur ut in die ad quem non solum fiat officium cum Missa festi translati, sed serventur quoque obligationes audiendi Missam et abstinendi a servilibus, Missa pro populo applicanda est in die ad quem; secus in die a quo.

§ 4. Episcopus Missam pro populo diebus supra indicatis per se ipse applicare debet; si ab eius celebratione legitime impediatur, statis diebus applicet per alium; si neque id praestare possit, quamprimum vel per se ipse vel per alium applicet alia die.

§ 5. Licet Episcopus duas vel plures dioeceses aeque principaliter unitas regat aut, praeter propriam dioecesim, aliam vel alias in administrationem habeat, obligationi tamen satisfacit per celebrationem et applicationem unius Missae pro universo populo sibi commisso.

§ 6. Episcopus, qui obligationi de qua in superioribus paragraphis, non satisfecerit, quam citius pro populo tot applicet Missas, quot omisit.

The first of these paragraphs is taken almost verbally from the Apostolic letter of Leo XIII, "In suprema," June 10, 1882, where the Pontiff says that one of the duties of a pastor is to pray and offer sacrifice for his flock, and that this obligation, considered in general and not as to fixed days, is based on the divine law. The Code with the S. C. Concilii, insisting upon the Tridentine decrees,[75] authentically explains and extends this rule to all bishops and cardinals who govern a diocese, and to abbots and prelates nullius.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The days on which a bishop has to say Mass pro populo are Sundays, holydays of obligation celebrated in foro et choro, and such suppressed feastdays as are now celebrated only in choro. The feastdays in foro et choro, or holydays of obligation, are: New Year's Day, Ascension, Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, All Saints, Immaculate Conception, and Christmas (First Mass).[76] The suppressed feasts are: Epiphany, Purification,[77] St. Matthias, St. Joseph (March 19), Annunciation B. M. V., Monday and Tuesday after Easter, Monday and Tuesday after Pentecost, SS. Philip and James, Finding of the Holy Cross, Corpus Christi, St. John Baptist, SS. Peter and Paul, St. James, Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, St. Matthew, St. Michael (Sept. 29), SS. Simon and Jude, St. Andrew, St. Thomas, St. Stephen Protomartyr, St. John Evangelist, Holy Innocents, Pope St. Sylvester (Dec. 31).[78]

The rest of the canon needs no explanation, with the exception perhaps of two phrases. "Si ab eius celebratione legitime impediatur" (§ 4) does not mean that a bishop is unable to say Mass at all, but that he is not able to apply his Mass; for instance, he may have to say a Mass for a special intention, a funeral Mass, or a missa pro sponso et sponsa, or perhaps he has a pingue stipendium for that day and no other. All these and similar reasons are considered lawful, provided a bishop complies with the rest of the canon.—"Aeque principaliter

75 Sess. 23, cc. 1, 4 de ref.

76 Cfr. can. 1247, § 3.

77 Not Candlemass day, because the blessing of candles always takes place on Feb. 2, whereas the feast of the Purification may be transferred.

78 The compiler of the St. Louis Ordo, 1918, has wisely inserted this list (p. 22).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

unitae" are two dioceses which have been combined, but so that both remain intact and none is subject to the other.[79]

REPORTS TO THE HOLY SEE

CAN. 340

§ 1. Omnes Episcopi tenentur singulis quinquenniis relationem Summo Pontifici facere super statu dioecesis sibi commissae secundum formulam ab Apostolica Sede datam.

§ 2. Quinquennia sunt fixa et communia, atque computantur a die Ianuarii 1911; in primo quinquennii anno relationem exhibere debent Episcopi Italiae, insularum Corsicae, Sardiniae, Siciliae, Melitae, et aliarum minorum adiacentium; in altero, Episcopi Hispaniae, Portugalliae, Galliae, Belgii, Hollandiae, Angliae, Scotiae et Hiberniae, cum insulis adiacentibus; in tertio, ceteri Europae Episcopi, cum insulis adiacentibus; in quarto, Episcopi totius Americae et insularum adiacentium; in quinto, Episcopi Africae, Asiae, Australiae et insularum his orbis partibus adiacentium.

§ 3. Si annus pro exhibenda relatione assignatus inciderit ex toto vel ex parte in primum biennium ab inito dioecesis regimine, Episcopus pro ea vice a conficienda et exhibenda relatione abstinere potest.

On the last day of December, 1909, the S. C. Consistorialis issued a decree ("A remotissima") regulating the visitatio ad limina and the reports to be made in connection therewith. Canon 340 relates only to the latter.[80] It is a new law, in so far as the report is to some extent detached from the visitatio, and in regard to details.

79 Can. 1419, 30.

80 A. Ap. S., II, p. 13 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What the canon means by "communia" (general) appears from the contrary; i. e., the dates fixed oblige all the bishops comprised under a certain year, so that no exception or further specification is required. The year for our American bishops commenced on the first of January, 1914, and ended the last day of December, 1914, so that the next year in which they will have to make a report is 1919; then 1924, etc.

§ 3 says if a bishop has been governing his diocese only for two years when his turn comes for making his report to the Holy See, he may omit it. The reason is evident. A new bishop is hardly able to know the state of his diocese, especially if he has not yet visited all portions of it.

The decree of S. C. Consist. prescribes that the quinquennial report be made in Latin. The "Ordo servandus in Relatione de Statu Ecclesiarum" (fifteen chapters with 150 points) specifies what the report must contain, viz.: a survey of the material and spiritual state of the diocese, comprising the clergy, religious and pious institutes, and the faithful at large.[81]

VISITATIO AD LIMINA

CAN. 341

§ 1. Omnes et singuli Episcopi eo anno quo relationem exhibere tenentur, ad Urbem, Beatorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli sepulcra veneraturi, accedant et Romano Pontifici se sistant.

§ 2. Sed Episcopis qui extra Europam sunt, permittitur ut alternis quinquenniis, idest singulis decenniis, Urbem petant.

81 A. Ap. S., II, 17 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 342

Episcopus debet praedictae obligationi satisfacere per se vel per Coadiutorem, si quem habeat, aut, ex iustis causis a Sancta Sede probandis, per idoneum sacerdotem qui in eiusdem Episcopi dioecesi resideat.

The tombs of the princes of the Apostles were from the earliest times visited by the faithful and their pastors as a sign of veneration for the two founders of the Roman Church. Cajus, a presbyter of Rome, told the heretic Proculus: "I can show you the trophies of the Apostles." Two epitaphs testify to the custom of sacred visitation, notably that of Abercius, bishop of Hieropolis in Phrygia, who came to Rome to venerate the tombs of the Apostles towards the end of the second century.[82] Of course, the Italian bishops, who were immediately subject to the Bishop of Rome as their metropolitan, were more numerous and regular in making these visits. But it is also true that missionary bishops were sometimes summoned to Rome, whence they had received their mission. Since Paschal II (1099–1118) the metropolitans had to promise at the reception of the pallium to visit the sacra limina at stated intervals.[83] Later on all the bishops who were either directly or indirectly consecrated by the Pope had to comply with this obligation.[84] A more uniform discipline was ushered in when Sixtus V, in his Constitution "Romanus Pontifex," Dec. 20, 1585, ruled that all patriarchs, primates, metropolitans, and bishops should present themselves at regular intervals before the Roman Pontiff, to give counsel and make suggestions conducive to the betterment of ecclesiastical 82 Armellini, Lezioni di Archeologia Cristiana, 1898, p. 90 f; p. 225.

83 C. 4, X, I, 6.

84 C. 13, X, I, 33; C. 4, X, II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conditions. Benedict XIV directed also the prelates and abbots nullius to make the ad limina visit.[85] He permitted bishops who were lawfully prevented from making the visit personally, to send a representative,— either a secular or regular dignitary, or a priest in good standing. This representative must report the reason why the bishop cannot come. Titular bishops are not obliged to make the visit, because the text binds only those who have to make a report.

In Rome, the bishops, after visiting the two churches of St. Peter (Vatican) and St. Paul (Via Ostiense), must present themselves in the sacristies of the two basilicas and inscribe their names in a book kept for that purpose.

The relatio status must be handed in at the Apostolic Chancery (Via Vittore Emmanuele) to the S. C. Congregatio Consistoralis.

During their visit,[86] the bishops must also present themselves to the Sovereign Pontiff, in order to pay their respects to the Vicar of Christ and, as stated above, to offer their counsels if asked for.

DIOCESAN VISITATIONS

CAN. 343

§ 1. Ad sanam et orthodoxam doctrinam conservandam, bonos mores tuendos, pravos corrigendos, pacem, innocentiam, pietatem et disciplinam in populo et clero promovendam ceteraque pro ratione adiunctorum ad bonum religionis constituenda, tenentur Episcopi obligatione visitandae quotannis dioecesis vel ex toto vel

85 "Quod sancta," Nov. 23, 1744.

86 The Irish bishops, by indult of the S. C. Conc., May 20, 1631, have to make the visit only every ten years; but we scarcely believe that the S. C. Consist. would now admit that privilege, although can. 60 does not declare it null and void.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ex parte, ita ut saltem singulis quinquenniis universam vel ipsi per se vel, si fuerint legitime impediti, per Vicarium Generalem aliumve lustrent.

§ 2. Fas est Episcopo clericos duos etiam a Capitulo sive cathedrali sive collegiali sibi adsciscere visitationis comites atque adiutores; eosque, quos maluerit, eligere, reprobato quocunque contrario privilegio vel consuetudine.

§ 3. Si obligationi de qua in § 1, Episcopus graviter defuerit, servetur praescriptum can. 274, nn. 4, 5.

Can. 344

§ 1. Ordinariae episcopali visitationi obnoxiae sunt personae, res ac loca pia, quamvis exempta, quae intra dioecesis ambitum continentur, nisi probari possit specialem a visitatione exemptionem fuisse ipsis ab Apostolica Sede concessam.

§ 2. Religiosos autem exemptos Episcopus visitare potest in casibus tantum in iure expressis.

Can. 345

Visitator, in iis quae obiectum et finem visitationis respiciunt, debet paterna forma procedere, et ab eius praeceptis ac decretis datur recursus in devolutivo tantum; in aliis vero causis, etiam tempore visitationis, Episcopus ad normam iuris procedat necesse est.

Can. 346

Studeant Episcopi debita cum diligentia, sine inutilibus tamen moris, pastoralem visitationem absolvere: caveant, ne superfluis sumptibus cuiquam graves onerosive sint, neve ratione visitationis ipsi aut quisquam suorum pro se suisve dona quodvis genus petant aut

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

accipiant, reprobata quavis contraria consuetudine; circa vero victualia sibi suisque ministranda vel procurationes et expensas itineris, servetur legitima locorum consuetudo.

From the Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Africanae we learn that at the beginning of the fifth century synods ruled that prelates should visit their privinces annually.[87] A council of Tarragona, 516, commanded the bishops on the occasion of this visit to see especially to the repairs of the churches.[88] In the Frankish Kingdom, especially under Charles the Great, the bishops were accompanied by a count (comes) as protector and aid, who took cognizance of and decided cases of a more or less civil nature.[89] A decretal of Innocent IV (1252) forbids avaricious exactions, allowing the necessary victuals but no gifts or donations of any kind.[90] These rules were renewed by the Council of Trent, from which our text is almost verbally taken.[91]

(1) The episcopal visitation must be made by the bishop personally, unless he is prevented by a legitimate obstacle, e. g., sickness, or duties of an urgent nature, in which latter case the visit may be entrusted to the vicar-general or some other trustworthy priest.

(2) The whole diocese must be visited within the space of five years, which is a modification of the Tridentine law.

(3) Not more than two companions are allowed, who may be taken from the number of canons, although these might remonstrate against the exercise of this right of 87 Nn. 53, 73, 94, Mansi, Coll., III, 742, 775, 799.

88 Cfr. c. 10 f., C. 10, q. 1; (Toledo synod, 633, cc. 35 f.).

89 Regino of Prüm, De Synodalibus Causis, l. II., c. 2 ff.

90 C. 1, § 5, 6°, III, 20.

91 Sess. 24, c. 3 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the bishop;[92] and the Code reprobates any contrary privilege or custom.

(4) The persons, things, and places subject to the diocesan visitation are:

(a) The whole secular clergy of the diocese, also cathedral and collegiate chapters, in all matters spiritual and temporal.[93] The laity, too, may, if the Ordinary judges it expedient, be examined about things pertaining to faith and morals, the administration of the Sacraments and the care of the church property. The church trustees in particular are liable to be questioned.

All religious, not exempt, of both sexes, are amenable to the canonical visit; and also exempt religious who are pastors of souls, in all matters concerning their pastoral conduct.[94]

(b) The places which should and may be visited are the cathedral church, the parish churches, and public and semi-public oratories not in possession of or administered by exempt religious. Oratories which, though incorporated into an exempt religious body, are served by a secular priest, are subject to visitation.[95]

The Bishop may also visit any parish church held and administered by exempt religious, and inspect the baptismal font, the confessionals of the pastor and his assistants and the altar of the Blessed Sacrament.[96] He may visit the meeting places or chapels or confraternities or sodalities of lay persons, even though they are erected in churches belonging to exempt religious;[97] also hos-

92 Richter, Trid., p. 155, nn. 34, 35, 37, 38.

93 Trid., Sess. 6, c. 4 de ref. (Richter, l. c., p. 39).

94 Can. 631, § 1.

95 Trid., Sess. 7, c. 8 de ref. (Richter, l. c., p. 52, n. 3).

96 S. C. Conc., April 5, 1631, Curiensi; June 23, 1725 (Richter, l. c., n. 6).

97 Trid., Sess. 7, c. 7 de ref.; S. C. Conc., Sept. 30, 1730 (Richter, l. c., p. 53, n. 10).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pitals and orphanages and schools which are maintained, even by exempt religious, as parish or elementary schools.

High schools and colleges conducted by exempt religious are liable to canonical visitation by the Ordinary only concerning their religious and moral training.[98]

Cemeteries common to the faithful and exempt religious are subject to episcopal visitation, whilst cemeteries exclusively reserved to exempt religious are not.[99]

(c) The things which the bishop should examine and inspect must be determined by the purpose of the canonical visit, as outlined in the first clause of canon 343, § 1, and mentioned in the Pontificale Romanum.[1] The second point: "That he may know how the church is administered spiritually and temporally," offers an opportunity to investigate:

(α) Whether the Blessed Sacrament is properly kept and in the right place; whether there is a sanctuary lamp; whether pyxis, monstrance, lunula, etc., are of the prescribed material, kept clean and free from verdigris, whether the sacred species are changed with sufficient frequency, etc.

(β) Whether the altars are made according to rubrics, and if images or statues are erected upon them, whether these are in conformity with the mind of the Church and in good taste, and especially whether any extraordinary images or representations disapproved by the Church are exposed for veneration.

(γ) Whether the baptismal font is properly and conveniently kept and the holy oils can be easily found and are preserved in a decent place.

(δ) In the sacristy he should observe the neatness and

98 Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881; can. 1382.

99 Leo XIII, ibid.

1 Pars III: Ordo ad Visitandas Parochias.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google color of the sacred vestments, the chalices and other sacred vessels.

(ε) The confessionals should be examined as to their grates, and also with regard to veils, stole and surplice, where these are prescribed, etc.[2]

We come now to what the Code says about exempt religious.[3]

(1) Note that exemption from canonical, or rather episcopal, visitation is now comprised under the general concession of exemption, as has been more than once decided by the S. R. Rota,[4] but is valid only if granted by a special concession of the Apostolic See, as canon 344, § 1 clearly emphasizes. Wherefore no communicatio privilegiorum may be invoked by exempt religious as to the canonical visitation.

(2) However, as far as the exempt religious themselves are concerned, the bishop is entitled to visit them only in cases expressly stated in the law. These cases, as far as the diocesan visitation is concerned, were partly mentioned above. They are:

(a) The parish churches administered by exempt religious, including the Blessed Sacrament, the altar, the tabernacle, the baptismal font and holy oils, the confessionals, the pulpit, the sacristy, the belfry with the bells belonging to the parish, the cemetery, etc.[5]

(b) The oratories or chapels of confraternities whose members are lay or secular persons, even though administered by exempt religious;[6]

2 Cf. Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. III, alleg. 73, nn. 63 ff.

3 Cfr. can. 615 f.

4 Barbosa, l. c., n. 6; Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1772; "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744; Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili;" Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881.

5 "Firmandis," § 7.

6 "Inscrutabili;" Richter, l. c., p. 53, n. 10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) The schools conducted by exempt religious, except the secondary schools, which are subject to visitation only as far as religious and moral education is concerned;[7]

(d) Divine worship, that it be carried out according to the sacred canons, and no superstitious practices tolerated, even in the churches and oratories of exempt religious.[8]

Canon 345 lays down the modes of procedure when correction of abuses becomes necessary. There are two such modes, the paternal and the judiciary. The former consists in secretly admonishing the delinquent. This may be employed towards the clergy as well as the faithful. But it would not be paternal to threaten penalties in order to compel one to reveal crimes or transgressions,[9] or to make a public admonition serve as a preliminary to criminal procedure.[10]

Much less in keeping with the bishop's office as a father would be the infliction of ecclesiastical censures. Penances which have no judiciary character, e. g., a retreat, would not exceed paternal correction. If the bishop proceeds paternally, no appeal is allowed, because no sentence has been given; but recourse is permitted in devolutivo; that is to say, the correction must be accepted and the injunctions carried out, until the superior judge reverses the sentence.

Metropolitans should not accept any recourse against a bishop's paternal procedure as long as the latter has remained within the limits prescribed by law.[11]

What are the aliae causae mentioned in canon 345? We presume them to be such as do not fall directly under

7 Can. 1382.
8 Can. 1261.
9 Barbosa, l. c., P. III, alleg. 73, n. 29.
10 Can. 2309.
11 Trid., Sess. 13, c. 1 de ref.; Richter, l. c., p. 71, n. 1 f.; Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, §§ 6, 10, 19, 21.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the objects of an episcopal visitation, especially those which require a formal trial, e. g., the removal of a parish priest, the procedure against pastors refusing to comply with the law of residence, although a mere precept concerning that point would not exceed the paternal method;[12] lastly, all criminal cases requiring trials.

Can. 346 repeats the old and oft inculcated duty not to make the episcopal visitation disagreeable for those concerned, and more especially establishes the remuneration allowed by law.[13] The Code permits the procurationes and expenses of the journey. By procurationes are understood food and lodging. No prescription is admissible against this lawful claim of the visiting bishop.[14] However, those who would have to furnish the procurationes may pay their equivalent in money.[15] With the exception of this support, and the expenses of the journey, neither the bishop nor his companions are allowed to demand or accept any gifts or donations.

It has been decided by the S. C. Concilii that nuns (moniales), who have no regular ecclesiastical benefice, are not obliged to offer the procurationes to the visiting bishop.[16] However, as the Code says, custom may in that case admit the acceptance of a decent support. But on the other hand the canons as well as legal decisions[17] admonish the bishop not to be too exacting. Now-a-days there is not so much danger of excesses in this as there used to be.

12 Barbosa, l. c., n. 37.

13 C. 16, X, I, 31; c. 23, X, III, 39; cc. 1 f, 6°, III, 20; Trid., Sess. 24, c. de ref.

14 C. 16, X, II, 26 de praescript.

15 Barbosa, l. c., n. 56.

16 S. C. Conc. Nov. 13, 1638 (Richter, Trid., p. 333, n. 9).

17 Richter, l. c., p. 335, n. 17; this decision obliges the bishop to restitution.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PRECEDENCE

CAN. 347

In suo territorio Episcopus praecedit omnibus Archiepiscopis et Episcopis, exceptis Cardinalibus, Legatis Pontificiis et proprio Metropolita; extra territorium serventur normae traditae in can. 106.

TITULAR BISHOPS

CAN. 348

§ 1. Episcopi titulares nullam possunt exercere potestatem in sua dioecesi, cuius nec possessionem capiunt.

§ 2. Decet ex caritate, citra tamen obligationem, ut aliquando Missae sacrificium pro sua dioecesi applicent.

EPISCOPAL PRIVILEGES

CAN. 349

§ 1. Ab accepta authentica notitia peractae canonicae provisionis, Episcopi sive residentiales sive titulares:

1.° Praeter alia privilegia quae suis in titulis recensentur, fruuntur privilegiis de quibus in can. 239, § -, nn. 7–12; nec non n. 2, etiam quod spectat ad casus Ordinario loci reservatos; n. 3, cum consensu saltem praesumpto Ordinarii loci; n. 4, dummodo non teneantur celebrare in cathedrali; nn. 5, 6, ritibus tamen ab Ecclesia praescriptis;

2.° Ius habent deferendi insignia episcopalia ad normam legum liturgicarum.

§ 2. A capta vero possessione Episcopi residentiales habent praeterea ius:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Percipiendi reditus mensae episcopalis;

2.° Concedendi indulgentias quinquaginta dierum in suae iurisdictionis locis;

3.° Elevandi in omnibus ecclesiis suae dioecesis thronum cum baldachino.

Can. 349 enumerates some of the privileges and rights of bishops. The following they hold in common with cardinals: the right of a portable altar,[18] the right to celebrate Mass on board of vessels, the right of applying the indulgences of a personally privileged altar, the right to gain indulgences in their private chapels, and the right to bless the people everywhere. As to the celebration of Mass on board a vessel the conditions are: that the sea be calm and the ship not rolling, that it be far from the coast and another priest or deacon be present to hold the chalice in case of great agitation of the ship.[19]

As to the privileges mentioned under n. 2, canon 239, § 1, the confessor chosen by the Ordinary for himself and his dependents may also absolve from cases which the same Ordinary has reserved to himself; and with regard to n. 3, concerning preaching in a strange diocese, the consent of the Ordinary must at least be presumed, i. e., it must be probable from common indications that he is not unwilling to grant it, or known that he never refused his consent before when asked for it. As to n. 4, Christmas would be concerned and also Holy Thursday; but on the latter day the bishops generally bless the holy oils. On Christmas day, according to can. 338, § 3, they should not be absent from their cathedrals, but this does not exclude the use of the privilege about the masses; at least a bishop may celebrate two masses or have them

18 S. R. C., June 8, 1896.

19 Cfr. Göpfert, Moral-Theologie, 1898, III, 138.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

celebrated in his private chapel. About nn. 5 and 6, the bishops must follow the ritual in blessing devotional articles and erecting stations of the cross.

The episcopal insignia are: the mitre, the crosier or pastoral staff, the pectoral cross, the pontifical ring, dalmatics and tunicella, gloves and sandals.[20] Leo XIII added the skullcap of violet color for all.[21] The crosier is certainly the oldest and most significant episcopal ornament, in use since the fifth century, whilst the mitre (taenia = a priestly band) only dates to the tenth century, but is mentioned in several papal letters and in the decretals.[22] Besides, the residential bishop's name must be mentioned in the canon.

A residential bishop, from the day that he takes possession of his diocese, enjoys the reditus mensae episcopalis,[23] which means the income of the bishopric of which he is the sole administrator. This income comprises the salary proper, the cathedraticum, the procurationes, the synodicum, etc., or whatever belongs to him as chief pastor of the diocese, of whose table he is to live.[24] The bishop has the right of erecting a throne with a baldachino or canopy over it in every church of the diocese,[25] even those of exempt religious.

20 Cf. c. 15, X, III, 1; c. 7, X, 1, 8; cf. Jaffé, Reg Pontf., ed. 2, 1882, where since the 10th century many privileges occur to that effect.

21 "Praeclaro," Feb., 1888.

22 Cf. Cath. Encycl., under the various catchwords; Smith-Cheltham, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, s. v. "Mitre," "Staff."

23 Mensa episcopalis occurs since the 12th century; and in the sense of property or support, since the 9th century; see Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Mensa."

24 I Cor. 10, 21; cfr. Barbosa, l. c., P. III, alleg. 95, n. 67; Martin V, "Inter cunctas" (Denzinger, Enchiridion, n. 504).

25 Barbosa, Summa Decis. Apost., s. v. "Baldachinum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

COADJUTORS AND AUXILIARY BISHOPS

1. Bishops had helpers in the discharge of their pastoral duties as early as the third and fourth centuries. Thus St. Augustine is said to have been the coadjutor of Valerius. This custom, humane as it is,[1] had consequences against which the law had to guard, especially that two bishops should rule one and the same diocese. Therefore resort was had to the expedient of constituting a visitator or quasi administrator. For various reasons, especially to prevent a troubled election and to preserve episcopal sees against the invasion of territorial usurpers, it was often found necessary to appoint a coadjutor for a bishop yet living and active, whose see the coadjutor should occupy after the death of the incumbent. This practice was acknowledged by the Popes, who reserved the right of granting such coadjutors.[2]

2. In the Orient as well as in the Occident there was a species of bishops called chorepiscopi (country bishops), who were consecrated and exercised episcopal functions often to the detriment of the diocese.[3] At the end of the fourth century the chorepiscopi were supplanted by visitators. In the Occident, especially in France, "country bishops," whose jurisdiction often appears doubtful,

1 According to the saying: "afflicto afflictio non est addenda," c. 3, c. 7, q. 1; c. 5, X, III, 6.

2 C. un. 6°, III, 5; Trid., Sess. 35, c, 7 de ref.; Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., 13, 10, 22 ff.

3 Cf. Conc. Encyc., c. 13; Sardic., c. 6; Laodic., c. 57.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

became more generally known in the eighth century, and in the following century incurred the censure of Pseudo-Isidor, whose influence dealt a deadly blow to the institution.

3. A last kind of quasi-bishops were those who owed their canonical position to the invasion of the Saracens, especially in Spain and the Orient, where many episcopal sees and cities were seized by the Islamic hordes and the bishops driven away. These exiled bishops sought refuge with other bishops, who often employed them in the discharge of diocesan functions. In Germany such refugees were commonly known as episcopi titulares, annulares, nullatenses, auxiliares, suffraganei, vicarii in pontificalibus. Their appointment was reserved[4] to the Holy See by Clement V. Furthermore it must be remembered that after the later crusades many bishops, though not resident at their sees, were ordained to bishoprics retained by schismatics or infidels; such bishops were called "episcopi in partibus infidelium."[5]

The Code distinguishes two kinds of coadjutors, viz.: coadjutors proper and auxiliaries. A coadjutor proper may be given to the see or to the bishop personally. However, we must confess that we have not so far read in any author of a coadjutor given to a see, unless he be identified with the coadjutor cum iure successionis.

CAN. 350

§ 1. Unius Romani Pontificis est Episcopo Coadiutorem constituere.

§ 2. Coadiutor dari solet personae Episcopi cum iure successionis; sed nonnunquam datur quoque sedi.

[4] C. 5, Clem. I, 3.

[5] Since 1882 called simply "in partibus"; Aichner, l. c., § 124; v. Scherer, K.-R., I, p. 597.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Coadiutor, datus personae Episcopi sine iure successionis, speciali nomine dicitur Auxiliaris.

The principle laid down in § 1 was formulated by Boniface VIII and adopted by the Tridentine Council,[6] which also allowed coadjutors to abbots. Benedict XIV granted the bishops of Ireland the right to ask for a coadjutor if by reason of advanced age or infirmity they were unable to comply with the law of residence.[7] However, circumstances like those arising at Cologne[8] and elsewhere in the thirties of the last century might prompt the idea of giving a coadjutor to the see, not to the person of the bishop, especially if he is in the hands of the enemies of the Church. A coadjutor is supposed to be given to a see only in case it becomes vacant; because the contrary assumption that two bishops can hold one and the same see at the same time, would be uncanonical; one must be titular of another see, otherwise the connubium spirituale would be jeopardized.

RIGHTS OF COADJUTORS

CAN. 351

§ 1. Iura Coadiutoris dati personae Episcopi desumantur ex litteris apostolicis, quibus constituitur.

§ 2. Nisi aliud in his litteris caveatur, Coadiutor qui datur Episcopo prorsus inhabili, habet omnia iura ac officia episcopalia; ceteri tantum possunt quantum Episcopus eisdem commiserit.

§ 3. Quae Coadiutor potest et vult exercere, Episcopus habitualiter alii ne deleget.

[6] C. un. 6°, III, 5; Trid., Sess. 25, c. 7 de ref.

[7] "Grave," Aug. 15, 1741, § 8.

[8] Brück, Gesch. d. kath. Kirche in Deutschland im XIX. Jahrh., 1889, II, 371.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Coadiutor, iusto impedimento non detentus, debet, quoties fuerit a Coadiuto requisitus, pontificalia et alias functiones obire, ad quas Episcopus ipse teneretur.

CAN. 352

Coadiutor sedi datus potest in territorio ea quae sunt ordinis episcopalis exercere, excepta sacra ordinatione; aliis in rebus tantum potest, quantum eidem a Sancta Sede vel ab Episcopo fuerit commissum.

These two canons state the powers of coadjutors. These powers depend first on the Apostolic letters of appointment, and secondly on the condition of the bishop in need of assistance. If the latter is able to perform his episcopal duties, his will must be respected. On the other hand, it would be unnatural and, as it were, offensive to the Holy See, if a bishop having a coadjutor would call in another bishop to perform pontifical functions which his coadjutor is able and willing to perform.

A bishop cannot punish or repeal acts which his coadjutor has lawfully performed.[9]

A coadjutor, unless permitted to do so by virtue of the Apostolic letters or the consent of his bishop, should not use the pastoral staff, because this is the special sign of jurisdiction; but he may bless the people, like the bishop.[10]

CAN. 353

§ 1. Quilibet Coadiutor, ut canonicam sui officii possessionem capiat, necesse est litteras apostolicas ostendat Episcopo.

§ 2. Coadiutor cum futura successione et Coadiutor

9 S. C. Conc., Feb. 18, 1623; Wernz, l. c., II, p. 1009 (ed. 1.).

10 Barbosa, Summa Decis. Apost., s. v. "Coadjutor," nn. 3, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sedi datus debent praeterea easdem ostendere Capitulo ad normam can. 334, § 3.

§ 3. Si Episcopus eum in statum inciderit ut eliciendi actus humani sit impos, praetermisso praescripto § 1, solum praescriptum § 2 ab omnibus Coadiutoribus servetur.

This canon appears to confirm the general teaching of canonists [11] that a coadjutor with the right of succession, who is ordinarily elected by a chapter, is given by the Roman Pontiff only upon the previous consent of that chapter. But the Code in canon 350, § 1, is silent about that consent, and in the U. S. it is of little practical value. However, in our country, too, a bishop coadjutor with the right of succession must present his papers of appointment to the assembled consultors, who take the place of the chapter.[12] To the bishop the coadjutor must show the Apostolic letters only if the former is mentally and physically able to perform human acts,— in other words, as long as he realizes the meaning of the ceremony.

RESIDENCE

CAN. 354

Coadiutor quilibet obligatione tenetur, sicut Episcopus, residendi in dioecesi, e qua, extra tempus vacationum, ad normam can. 338, ipsi non licet, nisi ad breve tempus, Coadiuto permittente, discedere.

What is meant by "a short time" may be deduced from can. 405, § 5 f., where mention is made of a shorter 11 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, c. 10, n. 24.

12 Can. 427.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google time than a week in connection with residence. Hence, in round terms, we may say, about six days.

CAN. 355

§ 1. Coadiutor cum iure successionis, vacante sede episcopali, statim evadit Ordinarius dioecesis, pro qua fuerat constitutus, dummodo possessionem legitime ceperit, ad normam can. 353, §§ 2, 3.

§ 2. Cum Episcopi munere exspirat Auxiliaris officium, nisi aliud in litteris apostolicis caveatur.

§ 3. Si Coadiutor datus fuerit sedi, eius officium etiam sede vacante perdurat.

This canon states how a coadjutorship is ended; viz.: (1) If the episcopal see becomes vacant the coadjutor appointed for that diocese becomes Ordinary of the same immediately after taking canonical possession thereof; (2) With the office of the bishop that of the auxiliary also expires, unless provided otherwise in the Apostolic letters; (3) If the coadjutor was given to the see, his office continues during the vacancy of the diocese.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER III

DIOCESAN SYNODS

The first diocesan synod, or gathering of the clergy of a diocese of which we have knowledge, was held by Pope Siricius about 387 in Rome.[1] The holding of synods became customary in the Eternal City, and Innocent III was wont to convoke a synod twice or three times a week. These synods were, however, rather forerunners of the consistory, to which foreign bishops were admitted. In the Frankish kingdom diocesan synods were not infrequent in the sixth century, to judge from the seventh canon of the synod of Auxerre, A. D. 578, which set up the rule that in the middle of May all the priests, and on the first of November all the abbots should meet annually in the episcopal city.[2] These synods turned out to be mixed meetings in which both ecclesiastical and civil matters were debated. The fourth Lateran Council (1215) ordered synods to be held annually to promulgate the decrees of provincial councils to the clergy.[3] The same decree, with the addition of disciplinary injunctions concerning profession of faith and the appointment of synodal judges and examiners, was adopted by the Council of Trent.[4] The pseudo-council of Pistoja, 1786, 1 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., I, 1, 6. The Council of Alexandria, 320/321, mentioned by Wernz (II, 1096) was attended by nearly 100 bishops (Hefele, Conc.-Gesch., I, 325), which sounds more like a provincial council than a diocesan synod.

2 Hefele, l. c., III, 38 f.

3 C. 25, X, V, 1.

4 Sess. 24, c. 2; 25, c. 2; 24, c. 18 de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

adopted certain false propositions concerning the importance and authority of synods and the power of parish priests, which were condemned by the Church.[5]

CAN. 356

§ 1. In singulis dioecesibus celebranda est decimo saltem quoque anno dioecesana Synodus, in qua de iis tantum agendum quae ad particulares cleri populique dioecesis necessitates vel utilitates referuntur.

§ 2. Si Episcopus plures dioeceses aeque principaliter unitas regat, aut unam habeat in titulum, alteram aliasve in perpetuam administrationem, potest unam tantum dioecesanam Synodum ex omnibus dioecesibus convocare.

CAN. 357

§ 1. Synodum dioecesanam convocat eique praeest Episcopus, non autem Vicarius Generalis sine mandato speciali nec Vicarius Capitularis.

§ 2. Celebranda est in ecclesia cathedrali, nisi aliud rationabilis causa suadeat.

The date from which the ten years are to be reckoned is not explicitly stated. However, since the Code went into effect in 1918, it appears reasonable to take this year as the starting-point. As it is very probable that a plenary council will be held in this country in the near future, if conditions permit, diocesan synods could be conveniently held soon thereafter and repeated every ten years. Most probably further instructions will be issued by the Holy See on this point.

The matter or subjects to be treated at the diocesan [5] Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, nn. 9–11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

synod are the needs and welfare of clergy and people. They are outlined in the classic work of Benedict XIV on the diocesan synod. He mentions:

(1) Public prayers, allocutions, and sermons;

(2) The decrees to be read and the profession of faith to be pronounced (according to the formula given in the Code);

(3) The election of synodal judges and examiners and the appointment of diocesan officials;

(4) The cases to be reserved (now no more than three or four) for atrocious crimes;

(5) The cathedraticum, taxes, stole fees, etc., to be determined;

(6) The alms for mass-stipends and abuses concerning them;

(7) Rendering of an account for the diocesan seminary.[6]

We might add pastoral conferences, the administration of church property, and, above all, the inculcation of the new Code.

As to § 2 of canon 356, observe that the S. C. Conc. formerly allowed two synods to be held for each of several dioceses aeque principaliter united (e. g., Viterbo-Toscanella).[7] Benedict XIV, however, wished that only one synod be held for such dioceses (e. g., Giovinozzo-Terlizzi, now Molfetta in Apulia), but alternately in the one and the other;[8] which is not excluded by the Code.

Can. 357 states the authority that convokes a synod is the bishop who has been confirmed by Rome and taken possession of the diocese, even though he be not yet consecrated. If he be a metropolitan he may convoke a

6 L. V, De Syn. Dioec.

7 Jan. 11, 1789 (Richter, Trid., p. 35, n. 6).

8 "Unigenitus," Nov. 26, 1749, § 9; De Syn. Dioec. I, 5, 3 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

synod before the reception of the pallium.[9] We say that he must have taken possession of the diocese, on account of can. 334, § 2, which rules that before that act he is not allowed to take a hand in the government of the diocese. The name of Ordinary in this case includes Apostolic administrators, Apostolic vicars, abbots and prelates nullius,[10] but not vicars-general without a special commission, nor vicars-capitular, who are entirely excluded because they can have no mandate.[11]

As to the place, it is becoming that the cathedral church, as "the mother and head of the other churches,"[12] be chosen for the synod, although any good reason may suffice for choosing another. Such reasons would be repairs in the cathedral church or the holding of a retreat for the clergy.

CAN. 358

§ 1. Ad Synodum vocandi sunt ad eamque venire debent:

1.° Vicarius Generalis;

2.° Canonici ecclesiae cathedralis aut consultores dioecesani;

3.° Rector Seminarii dioecesani saltem maioris;

4.° Vicarii foranei;

5.° Deputatus uniuscuiusque collegialis ecclesiae a Capitulo eiusdem ecclesiae e gremio eligendus;

6.° Parochi civitatis in qua Synodus celebratur;

7.° Unus saltem parochus ex unoquoque vicariatu foraneo eligendus ab omnibus qui curam animarum

9 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 5; Wernz, l. c., II, p. 1099, who remarks that the metropolitan is not allowed to wear the pallium at his archdiocesan synod.

10 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec. II, cc. 10 f.

11 Benedict XIV, l. c., c. 8.

12 Ibid., I, 5, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

actu inibi habeant; parochus autem electus debet pro tempore absentiae vicarium substitutum sibi sufficere ad normam can. 465, § 4;

8.° Abbates de regimine et unus e Superioribus cuiusque religionis clericalis qui in dioecesi commorentur, designatus a Superiore provinciali, nisi domus provincialis sit in dioecesi et Superior provincialis interesse ipse maluerit.

§ 2. Episcopus, si opportunum iudicaverit, potest ad Synodum vocare alios quoque et etiam omnes canonicos, parochos, Superiores religiosos, imo et singulos suae dioecesis saeculares sacerdotes, iis tamen exceptis qui necessarii sunt ne in paroeciis animarum cura desit; invitati autem ius suffragii in omnibus habent, perinde ac ceteri, nisi Episcopus in invitatione aliud expresse caverit.

CAN. 359

§ 1. Iis qui ad Synodum venire debent, si legitimo impedimento detineantur, non licet mittere procuratorem qui eorum nomine Synodo intersit; sed Episcopum de impedimento certiorem faciant.

§ 2. Negligentes Episcopus potest iustis poenis compellere et punire, nisi de religiosis exemptis agatur qui parochi non sunt.

The text of the two canons is explicit enough, but one point has surprised us somewhat. It is n. 8 about the abbates regiminis. For the Council of Trent,[13] strongly defended by Benedict XIV in his work De Synodo Dioecesana,[14] and again upheld by Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," had established that only those abbots have [13] Sess. 24, c. 2 de ref. [14] Lib. III, c. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to attend the synod who either exercise the care of souls as pastors of a parish, or whose monasteries are not united with a congregation and subject to a general chapter. Hence, since the Benedictines form congregations and celebrate general chapters, it would follow that the bishop had no right to call their abbots to the diocesan synod. But the Code subjects all governing abbots to the episcopal call. On the other hand the new law does insist less vigorously on the attendance of exempt religious exercising the care of souls, whom the old law strictly obliged to attend. Perhaps the Code wants the abbots to take the place of their subjects.

In order to make the invitation and will of the bishop more efficacious, canon 359, § 2, gives the Ordinary the right to proceed against recalcitrants with ecclesiastical penalties. These comprise, besides the privation of active and passive suffrage, excommunication and other punishments to be inflicted at the good pleasure of the bishop.[15] This procedure affects governing abbots and exempt religious only if they are actual pastors of parishes.

CAN. 360

§ 1. Episcopus, si id ipsi expedire videatur, opportuno ante Synodum tempore, unam vel plures e clero civitatis et dioecesis commissiones nominet, seu coetus virorum qui res in Synodo tractandas parent.

§ 2. Ante Synodi sessiones Episcopus omnibus qui convocati sunt et convenerunt, decretorum schema tradendum curet.

CAN. 361

Propositae quaestiones omnes, praesidente vel per

15 S. C. Conc., Nov. 19, 1604; Benedict XIV, l. c., III, 1, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

se vel per alium Episcopo, liberae adstantium disceptationi in sessionibus praeparatoriis subiiciantur.

CAN. 362

Unicus est in Synodo legislator Episcopus, ceteris votum tantum consultivum habentibus; unus ipse subscribit synodalibus constitutionibus; quae, si in Synodo promulgentur, eo ipso obligare incipiunt, nisi aliud expresse caveatur.

Since the bishop is the sole ruler of the diocese, and alone endowed with legislative power in foro externo, it is evident that all synodal decrees made in conformity with the common law of the Church need no approbation or signature on the part of the diocesan consultors, or the synodal judges, or the rest of the clergy. The clergy, both secular and regular, must, however, carry out the decrees made at a synod. Any other theory would pervert the true idea of hierarchic jurisdiction.[16] At the same time it may be well to call attention to Benedict XIV's rule that nothing should be enacted in a synod which would be detrimental to the privileges of exempt religious, because these are granted by the Supreme Pontiff.[17]

16 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, cc. 1 ff.

17 Ibid.,. IX, c. 15; Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, nn. 9 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

THE DIOCESAN COURT

A reproduction, on a smaller scale, of the Roman Curia is the diocesan court, whose importance grows in proportion to the extent of the territory and the number of the faithful in the diocese.

CAN. 363

§ 1. Curia dioecesana constat illis personis quae Episcopo aliive qui, loco Episcopi, dioecesim regit, opem praestant in regimine totius dioecesis.

§ 2. Quare ad eam pertinent Vicarius Generalis, officialis, cancellarius, promotor iustitiae, defensor vinculi, synodales iudices et examinatores, parochi consultores, auditores, notarii, cursores et apparitores.

The diocesan court, then, consists of those persons who assist the bishop or his representative in the government of the whole diocese. It is made up of the vicar-general, the official chancellor, the promotor justitiae or diocesan attorney, the defender of the marriage bond, synodal judges and examiners, parish consultors, auditors, notaries, couriers and beadles.

The official, who holds the first place after the vicar-general and must be chosen by the bishop (can. 1573, § 1), is a functionary distinct from the vicar-general. His importance will become manifest later. The promotor iustitiae, the couriers and beadles will also be dealt with infra. The latter two offices, being similar to that of ushers (cf. can. 1591), may be committed to laymen and one man may hold both.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 364

§ 1. Nominatio eorum qui praedicta officia vel munera exercent, scripto consignetur, ad normam can. 159.

§ 2. Nominati vero debent:

1.° In manibus Episcopi iusiurandum praestare de munere fideliter exercendo, quavis personarum acceptione posthabita;

2.° Negotia ad se spectantia sub auctoritate Episcopi tractare ad normam iuris;

3.° Secretum servare intra fines et secundum modum a iure vel ab Episcopo determinatum.

The appointment of all these officials must be made in writing, but before entering upon their respective offices they (1) are bound to swear in the hands of the bishop that they will discharge their duties faithfully and without human respect; (2) and when performing their duties, they must do so under the supervision of the bishop, according to the norms laid down in the following canons. Besides they are strictly bound to secrecy within the limits and to the extent set by law or by the bishop.

The secret they are obliged to keep is called official; it attaches to their office and hence might also be styled with a legal term, "privileged knowledge," i. e., knowledge the manifestation of which cannot be legally exacted. The obligation arising from this secret is based upon the natural law, but its measure and extent may be determined by positive norms, which are as broad as the matter involved and as wide as the necessity of the office, which is subject to the law and the will of the superior. Therefore, if a higher or more stringent reason, e. g., the public welfare or a superior command, should demand of these officials the revealing of a secret, they would have to obey. On the other hand, they are never allowed to reveal anything to persons not legally, or not at all, involved or interested, and even to parties interested they cannot communicate anything which would be detrimental to another, unless they are legally called upon to do so by reason of their office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 365

De officiali, promotore iustitiae, defensore vinculi, iudicibus synodalibus, auditoribus, cursoribus et apparitoribus, serventur praescripta can. 1573–1593; de Vicario Generali, cancellario aliisque notariis, examinatoribus synodalibus et parochis consultoribus, praescripta canonum qui sequuntur.

The special duties of these several officers are pointed out partly in the immediately following canons, partly in the fourth book on legal procedure (cc. 1573–1593). Here more particular attention is given to the important office of the vicar-general.

ARTICLE I

THE VICAR-GENERAL

The historical development of this office proceeded by slow degrees, until it assumed its present status. Not all countries show the same process of evolution, and hence it is dangerous to generalize. The former office of archdeacon, to some extent, resembles that of the vicar-general. In Rome as well as in other large cities, one of the deacons was called archdeacon, a title which is already given to St. Lawrence.[1] The office was closely connected with temporal affairs. The archdeacon grew in importance as the chorepiscopus decreased in power. Since the IXth century there was more than one archdeacon, especially in larger dioceses, and they gradually seem to have absorbed the powers of the archpriest, whose functions concentrated upon baptismal and other spiritual powers. The archdeacons often acted against the bishop's wishes, and consequently the bishops endeavored to restrict the archdeacons' aggrandizement of power. That their power was ordinary, without a mandate or delegation from the bishop, is nowhere stated in the Decretals of Gregory IX, although this has been asserted.[2] The decretals[3] call him vicar of the bishop, attribute to him the supervision and correction of the clergy, care of the sacred vestments, the office of master of ceremonies, and the visitation of the diocese. But without a special mandate of the bishop archdeacons cannot appoint parish priests or pronounce excommunication, although they may hear the quarrels of single individuals. This is sufficient concerning the power given by the Gregorian Decretals to the archdeacon. Soon afterwards appears an officialis, who may be identified with the present vicar-general. In the Liber Sextus Innocent IV (A. D. 1250) laid down rules for this official.[4] His power is not, at least in its full extent, ordinary, otherwise procedure and appointment to benefices would not be ex-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1 Liber Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, 1886, I, 155.

2 Thus Sägmüller, K.-R., 1900, p. 368.

3 Cf. tit. 23.— A Vicar is mentioned in c. 14, X, I, 31 as constituted for different rites and languages, but subject to the bishop.

4 Tit. 13 in 6° de officio vicarii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cepted therefrom. The bishops meanwhile continued their opposition to the archdeacons by appointing officiales foranei, or rural deans, who with the permission of the bishop exercised a certain jurisdiction in their districts, but were removable ad nutum. In England there arose a distinction between the vicar-general, to whom the administration or voluntary jurisdiction was entrusted, and the official, who had contentious or criminal jurisdiction. The Council of Trent[5] paid no attention to this distinction, but curtailed the power of the archdeacons, who became an appendage of the cathedral chapters with merely honorary rights, whilst the vicar-general became more important. Under the new Code the officialis of former times reappears, as will be seen in Book IV.

CAN. 366

§ 1. Quoties rectum dioecesis regimen id exigat, constituendus est ab Episcopo Vicarius Generalis, qui ipsum potestate ordinaria in toto territorio adiuvet.

§ 2. Vicarius Generalis libere ab Episcopo designatur, qui eum potest ad nutum removere.

§ 3. Unus tantum constituatur, nisi vel rituum diversitas vel amplitudo dioecesis aliud exigat; sed, Vicario Generali absente vel impedito, Episcopus alium constituere potest qui eius vices suppleat.

Whenever the right government of a diocese requires, the bishop shall appoint a vicar-general to aid him, with ordinary power, in the whole diocese.

5 Trid., Sess. 24, cc. 3, 20; Sess. 25, c. 14 de ref.; concerning the history cfr. Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Disciplina circa Beneficia et Beneficiarios, Magontiaci, 1787, P. I, lib. II, cc. 7 ff.; Hinschius, System des Kath. Kirchenrechts, II, 183.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The vicar-general is freely designated by the bishop and may be removed by him at pleasure.

Only one vicar-general may be appointed, unless a diversity of rites, or the size of the diocese, should require more. If the vicar-general is absent or prevented, the bishop may temporarily appoint another priest in his place.

This canon enjoins the bishop to choose a vicar-general under certain circumstances, namely, when this is necessary for the right government of the diocese. Hence the bishop is not absolutely, but only relatively obliged to appoint a vicar-general. The judgment of the necessity lies with the bishop himself. If gross neglect of episcopal duties or protracted absence should cause considerable damage to a diocese, the Holy See might force the bishop to accept either a vicar-general or apostolic administrator.[6]

The appointment of a vicar-general is one of the free and uncontested rights of the bishop, and in exercising it he is not bound by the consent or advice of his chapter or consultors, much less by insinuations or pressure on the part of the civil government, unless the latter is accorded definite privileges by a concordat.

The bishop can exercise the right of appointing a vicar only after the papal nomination or provision has been received.[7]

The removal of a vicar-general depends entirely on the good pleasure of the bishop, who may take the office away, with or without reason, and without any formality, summary or solemn procedure.

The number of vicars-general is limited to one, except in dioceses where diversity of rites or territorial extent

[6] Cf. Wernz, Jus Decret., II. p. 982.

[7] Cf. can. 334, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google make it advisable to have several. Innocent III decreed that a bishop should select several vicars for diverse rites and language..[8] Such vicars resemble auxiliary bishops, who would be able to celebrate the sacred mysteries in the respective rite, whilst our Code speaks of vicars-general only and does not mention diversity of language. The second reason for having several vicars-general is "amplitudo dioeceseos." Amplitudo has the meaning of extension as well as greatness or number of parishes and souls. On that score the metropolitans of most of our American archdioceses may safely appoint several vicars-general, who per concomitantiam may divide their labors according to linguistic denominations. If a bishop has two dioceses to govern, either as two sees with equal rights (aeque principaliter unitae), or one as his proper see and the other as administrator, he may appoint two vicars-general, i. e., one for each diocese, if this latter measure should be found more expedient or perhaps necessary for "right administration."[9]

CAN. 367

§ 1. Vicarius Generalis sit sacerdos e clero saeculari, annos natus non minus triginta, in theologia et iure canonico doctor aut licentiatus vel saltem earum disciplinarum vere peritus, sana doctrina, probitate, prudentia ac rerum gerendarum experientia commendatus.

§ 2. Si dioecesis alicui religioni commissa fuerit, Vicarius Generalis potest esse eiusdem religionis alumnus.

8 Cf. c. 14, X, I, 31, de officio judicis ord.

9 Bouix, Tractatus de Judiciis Ecci., 1855, t. I, p. 411 f., says that if the other diocese would be very distant, the bishop would be obliged to appoint a vicar-general.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Vicarii Generalis munus ne committatur canonico poenitentiario, aut Episcopi consanguineis praesertim in primo gradu vel in secundo mixto cum primo, aut, exclusa necessitate, parocho ceterisque curam animarum habentibus; sed non prohibetur Episcopus Vicarium ex ipsa dioecesi assumere.

The Code next proceeds to determine the qualities of the vicar-general, which are modified somewhat in comparison with the old law:

The vicar-general must be a member of the secular clergy, at least thirty years of age, a doctor or licentiate of sacred theology and canon law, or at least well versed in said branches, of sound doctrine, righteousness, prudence, and experienced in administrative matters.

If the diocese has been entrusted to a religious order, the vicar-general may be a member of that order.

The office of vicar-general cannot be committed to the canon penitentiary, nor to one related to the bishop by blood in the first, or second touching the first, degree, nor, except in case of necessity, to a parish priest or any one occupied in the care of souls.

The first paragraph of Can. 367 appears to be taken almost verbally from the schema of the Vatican Council,[10] which, however, required the academic degree only in either theology or canon law. Our Code dispenses with the degrees, if a candidate is otherwise fit and has the required age, which is raised to thirty years.[11]

The second paragraph regards dioceses entrusted to religious orders. This may be done in such a way that the diocese becomes an abbatia nullius, which is possible only if the community itself is an abbey; or that religious

10 Cfr. Granderath-Kirch, Geschichte des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, II, 162.

11 Cfr. Bouix, l. c., p. 388 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have entire charge of the diocese, whose head is a religious, though not necessarily the superior of the community. Attention must be paid to the text, which says: "if the diocese is entrusted." Hence, if a religious is elected bishop of a diocese, this does not mean that the diocese is committed to the care of religious or that the vicar-general should be a religious; for the first paragraph requires the vicar-general to be a member of the secular clergy.

The question whether a regular with solemn vows may be appointed vicar-general seems, according to our view, to be settled in the negative by the first paragraph of our canon, which demands a secular priest. The reason for this law doubtless lies in the fact that religious should reside in their convents, at least habitually, unless they are compelled for good reasons to dwell outside, e. g., as pastors. Hence a bishop who would wish to have a regular for his vicar-general, would have to apply to the Holy See. But a religious with simple vows, whose institute permits its members to dwell outside the convent, especially if they have given only the promise of obedience, provided he has the permission of his superior, needs no papal indult to accept the office of vicar-general.[12]

The last paragraph excludes three kinds of otherwise qualified priests from the vicar-generalship,— the poenitentarius canonicus of a cathedral, the next relations of the bishop, and pastors. As to the first-named, he must reside at the cathedral and hence, since he was formerly to be taken from a strange diocese, he could hold the office of vicar-general; but the office of cathedral confessor, and the delicacy of confessional trust, require full 12 Cf. can. 606, § 2. Cf. Bouix, l. c., p. 392 ff. It is true, as we read in many responses to questions given by the S. C. EE. et RR., that the Roman practice never favored appointing religious as vicars-general.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

attention. The same holds good concerning parish priests and others, chaplains or assistants, occupied with the care of souls. However, in case of necessity, e. g., where there is a lack of fit persons, or penuria sacerdotum, even a parish priest, provided he is not canonicus poenitentarius, may be appointed. In no case, however, can a brother or nephew of the bishop be chosen vicar-general.[13] The old doctrine [14] that no one who was born in, or was a citizen or an inhabitant of, the diocese for which he was to be appointed, could be vicar-general thereof, is now discarded. The last clause of the last paragraph simply states that the bishop may choose a priest of the diocese, and consequently also of the episcopal city.

The powers of the vicar-general are described, or rather outlined, in the following canon.

CAN. 368

§ 1. Vicario Generali, vi officii, ea competit in universa dioecesi iurisdictio in spiritualibus ac temporalibus, quae ad Episcopum iure ordinario pertinet, exceptis iis quae Episcopus sibi reservaverit, vel quae ex iure requirant speciale Episcopi mandatum.

§ 2. Nisi aliud expresse cautum fuerit, Vicarius Generalis exsequi potest rescripta apostolica quae Episcopo vel praecedenti rectori dioecesis remissa sint, ac generatim ad ipsum quoque pertinent facultates habituales Ordinario loci a Sancta Sede concessae, ad normam can. 66.

The vicar-general, by virtue of his office, enjoys that 13 The first degree would also include the bishop's son and father, which cases, however, are rare.

14 Cf. Bouix, l. c., p. 396 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

temporal and spiritual jurisdiction in the whole diocese which the bishop as Ordinary possesses iure ordinario, except that which the bishop reserves to himself, or which by law requires a special mandate from him.

Unless expressly provided to the contrary, the vicar-general can be executor of Apostolic rescripts sent to the bishop or his predecessor in the administration of the diocese. He also enjoys the habitual faculties granted by the Holy See to the ordinarius loci.

Hence there is now [15] no longer any doubt as to the character of the vicar-general's power. It is an ordinary power, conferred by the very act of appointment, and, therefore, coextensive with the ordinary power of the bishop himself in matters spiritual and temporal. Wherefore, let it be said by the way, the custom of appointing two vicars-general, one in temporalibus and one in spiritualibus, is not to be admitted, although, as stated above, two vicars-general in solidum may be appointed.

From the ordinary powers of the vicar-general the Code exempts that which the bishop has reserved, and that for which the law requires a special mandate. As to the first clause, it should be remembered that Regula iuris 81, in 6°, states: "In generali concessione nequaquam illa veniunt, quae non esset quis verisimiliter in specie concessurus." Some authors give a list of such cases,[16] which, however, is of little value, since the bishop must state the reservations he wishes to make to the vicar-general, otherwise the latter acts validly and licitly if he proceeds in such cases. Of greater importance is the second clause. A special mandate is required under the 15 We say now, for doubts were previously entertained as to the nature of that power. Cfr. Wernz, l. c., II, p. 987 f. (1 ed.).

16 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., l. II, c. 8; Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. III, allegatio 54, nn. 83 ff. (ed. Lugd. 1665, t. II, p. 123 ff.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

new Code for the appointment to offices (can. 152), the conferring of benefices (can. 1432, § 2), the granting of litterae dimissoriales (can. 950, § 2), and the convoking of a synod (can. 357, § 1). Certain other cases that formerly required a special mandate are not mentioned in our Code.[17]

Concerning rescripts and faculties enough has been said in Bk. I. We merely note here that habitual, i. e., triennial or quinquennial faculties, if such are issued again after the decree of the S. C. Consist. of April 25, 1918, are understood, but not such as are granted for a special case or for extraordinary occasions.

CAN. 369

§ 1. Vicarius Generalis praecipua acta Curiae ad Episcopum referat, ipsumque certiorem faciat de iis quae gesta aut gerenda sint ad tuendam in clero et populo disciplinam.

§ 2. Caveat ne suis potestatibus utatur contra mentem et voluntatem sui Episcopi, firmo praescripto can. 44, § 2.

In order that the old principle may be maintained, that the bishop and his vicar-general form one and the same person and tribunal, the Code demands that the vicar-general report the chief affairs (acta) of the Curia to the bishop and inform him of what was done or is to be done to safeguard the discipline of the clergy and the people, and that he should not use his powers against the intention and will of his bishop.

This canon was evidently added to obtain uniformity

17 For instance, to dispense from irregularities arising from an occult delict, (cfr. can. 998), to visit the diocese (can. 343), etc. Of course, this latter only in case the bishop is impeded.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and unity of government. It forbids the vicar-general, under pain of nullity, to grant a favor denied by the bishop. How far prudence and charity are to be guides, must be left to personal judgment. We only add that the canon does not mean to make the vicar-general the policeman (in an odious sense) of the diocese.

CAN. 370

§ 1. Praesente etiam Episcopo, Vicarius Generalis publice privatimque praecedentiae ius habet super omnibus dioecesis clericis, non exclusis dignitatibus et canonicis ecclesiae cathedralis, etiam in choro et actibus capitularibus nisi clericus charactere episcopali praefulgeat, et Vicarius Generalis eodem careat.

§ 2. Si Vicarius Generalis sit Episcopus, omnia honorifica privilegia Episcoporum titularium obtinet; secus durante munere habet tantum privilegia et insignia Protonotarii apostolici titularis.

The honorary rights of the vicar-general are the following: He takes precedence over the whole clergy of the diocese at public and private occasions, even if the bishop is present, and over all dignitaries and cathedral canons in choir as well as in chapter meetings, unless there is a clergyman endowed with episcopal character and the vicar-general lacks that character. If the vicar-general is a bishop he enjoys all the honorary privileges of titular bishops. If he is not a bishop, he is entitled, during the time he serves as vicar-general, to all the privileges and insignia of a titular protonotary apostolic.

The first paragraph of can. 370[18] regulates the prece-

18 Formerly a distinction was made as to whether the vicar-general was a canon or not, whether he assisted in his insignia or not, etc. Cfr. Bouix, De Capitulis, 1852, p. 524 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dence of the vicar-general on all ecclesiastical occasions. As he takes precedence over all prelates not endowed with the episcopal character, he ranks above protonotaries and abbots, actual and titular. Of the honorary privileges of a vicar-general who has received episcopal consecration, and hence ranks as a titular bishop, enough has been said. If the vicar-general is not a bishop, he is entitled to the privileges and insignia of a titular protonotary apostolic, the lowest class of the protonotaries' college, as remodeled by Pius X in his Motu proprio, "Inter multiplices," Feb. 21, 1905. Vicars-general enjoy the title and privileges of this class of prelates by right during the whole tenure of their office as vicars, and are, therefore, called monsignori. Their dress is a black cassock which may have a trail (but not unfolded) with a silk belt and two pendants (flocculi) on the left, a rochet, mantelet, and biretta, all black. They do not genuflect but only bow to the bishop or the cross; and are incensed duplici ductu; they say Mass as ordinary priests, but have the right to use the bugia or hand-light. Over their daily dress, on solemn occasions, including audiences with the Pope, they may wear a silken belt with a black fringe, a hat with a band and tassels of black color. On their coat-of-arms they may place a hat of black color with ribbons or strings and six tassels on each side, all black (not purple or red).[19]

CAN. 371

Exspirat Vicarii Generalis iurisdictio per ipsius renuntiationem ad normam can. 183–191, aut revocationem ei ab Episcopo intimatam, aut sedis episcopalis 19 Cfr. Amer. Eccl. Review, 1905, Vol. XXXII, p. 625 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vacationem; suspenditur vero suspensa episcopali iurisdictione.

The jurisdiction of the vicar-general expires by resignation, by revocation on the part of the bishop, or by vacancy of the episcopal see. When the bishop's jurisdiction is suspended, that of the vicar-general also ceases.

As to resignation enough has been said above. If the bishop wishes to remove his vicar-general, he has to make the fact formally known to him, for a tacit recall is not valid nor does it affect the validity of the acts of the vicar-general. The best way is in writing, although this mode of recall is not strictly involved in the term "intimata," which signifies to make something known to someone in a legal way. Hence the notification may be made orally by courier or any other official, but the bishop must assure himself that the notice was received by the vicar-general. No reason [20] need be given for the removal, for the vicar-general is removable "ad nutum episcopi."

If the episcopal see becomes vacant the jurisdiction of the vicar-general ceases, because bishop and vicar-general are considered one tribunal. However, if a common error concerning the death of the bishop should occur, the official acts performed by the vicar-general during the supposed vacancy would be valid.[21]

The jurisdiction of the vicar-general is suspended if the bishop is suspended from jurisdiction, or excommunicated, or smitten with the personal interdict. But a mere suspensio a divinis of the bishop would not suspend the jurisdiction of his vicar-general.

20 Bouix, De Judiciis, I, p. 443, and others hold that recourse may be had to the Holy See; but now this seems out of place, as stated in the text.

21 Cf. Wernz, Jus Decret., II, p. 994.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ARTICLE II

THE CHANCELLOR AND OTHER NOTARIES — THE EPISCOPAL ARCHIVES

The following canons attest the great care which the Church wishes to be taken of all the more important documents pertaining to diocesan government. She herself has set a shining example. From the earliest time of her existence, Rome had its regional notaries, who were employed partly in collecting the acts of the martyrs, and partly in writing and preserving documents for the papal archives. The latter existed as early as the fourth century,[22] as we learn from the Liber Pontificalis that the popes preserved their official, legislative, and disciplinary documents in archivio ecclesiae.[23] The care of these archives required persons of trust and ability, who would scrupulously record the documents and watch over them. For this purpose a host of scribes (called notarii, scriniarii, chartularii) were employed at the papal court, who not seldom rose to dignities and held high rank in the pontifical family, to which in later centuries especially belonged the protonotaries.

All this goes to prove the importance of ecclesiastical archives and makes the following enactments more intelligible. As the episcopal court forms part of the universal machinery of the Church, those who are entrusted with the diocesan archives should bestow upon them minute and loving care.

CAN. 372

§ 1. In qualibet Curia constituatur ab Episcopo cancellarius qui sit sacerdos, cuius praecipuum munus

22 Cf. Hieronymi Opp., Migne, P. L., 23, 549; Phillips, Kirchenrecht, 1864, t. VI, p. 362 ff.

23 Liber Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, I, CXXX, CLII, 230, 238

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sit acta Curiae in archivo custodire, ordine chronologico disponere et de eisdem indicis tabulam conficere.

§ 2. Poscente necessitate, adiutor ei dari potest, cui nomen sit vice-cancellarii seu vice-tabularii.

§ 3. Cancellarius est eo ipso notarius.

Every episcopal Curia should have a chancellor, a priest appointed by the bishop, whose chief business it is to file official documents in the archives, keep them in chronological order and properly indexed. If necessary, the chancellor should be given an assistant, with the name of vice-chancellor or vice-recorder. The chancellor, by reason of his office, is also a notary.

The documents may be indexed according to the names of parishes, or topically, according to the subject-matter; for instance, appointments, assistants, charitable institutions, marriages, ordinations, parish priests, religious, sisterhoods, etc. The chronological order had best be kept according to the calendar year.

CAN. 373

§ 1. Episcopus praeter cancellarium potest alios quoque notarios constituere, quorum scriptura aut subscriptio publicam fidem facit.

§ 2. Iidem constitui possunt aut ad quaelibet acta, aut ad acta iudicialia dumtaxat, aut ad acta tantummodo certae causae vel negotii conficienda.

§ 3. Si clerici desint, possunt e laicis assumi; sed notarius in criminalibus clericorum causis debet esse sacerdos.

§ 4. Cancellarius aliique notarii debent esse integrae famae et omni suspicione maiores.

§ 5. Omnes possunt removeri aut suspendi ab eo

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

qui illos constituit aut ab eius successore aut Superiore, non autem a Vicario Capitulari, nisi de consensu Capituli.

Besides the chancellor, the bishop may appoint other ecclesiastical notaries, who may act in all ecclesiastical matters without discrimination, or only in judicial affairs, or in certain cases, or for a certain kind of cases, as the bishop deems proper. Where there is a lack of clerics, laymen may be chosen for this office; but the notary in all criminal cases of the clergy must be a priest.

The chancellor and the other notaries must be men of good reputation and beyond suspicion concerning their character and trustworthiness.

All of them may be removed or suspended by the one who appointed them, or by his successor or superior, but not by the vicar-capitular, except with the consent of the chapter.

These officials may be removed by the bishop for any or no reason and without appeal to a higher authority. They may also be suspended [24] for a time, according to the good pleasure of the bishop. The right of removing and suspending the chancellor and other ecclesiastical notaries belongs to the bishop, to his successor, and to his superior. The superior of the bishop, in the canonical sense, is the Pope, not the metropolitan, who cannot therefore remove the aforesaid officials. Neither should the vicar-capitular or administrator remove or suspend them, for the old title in the Decretals (III, 9) that nothing should be changed during a vacancy, still holds good (can. 436). Therefore our canon demands, not only the advice, but the consent of the chapter or diocesan consultors.

24 Suspension is here to be taken as temporary cessation, not as ecclesiastical censure, because it may be inflicted on lay notaries.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 374

§ 1. Officium notariorum est:

1.° Conscribere acta seu instrumenta circa dispositiones, obligationes, citationes et intimationes iudiciales, decreta, sententias aliave circa quae eorum opera requiritur;

2.° In scriptis fideliter redigere quae geruntur eaque cum significatione loci, diei, mensis et anni subsignare;

3.° Acta vel instrumenta legitime petenti ex regesto, servatis servandis, exhibere et eorum exemplaria cum autographo conformia declarare.

§ 2. Conscribere acta nequit notarius nisi in territorio illius Episcopi a quo est electus aut pro negotio ad quod est legitime constitutus.

This canon defines the functions of ecclesiastical notaries. They are:

(1) To put in writing all episcopal acts or documents concerning enactments (dispositiones), orders, and engagements (obligationes), all judicial summons and intimations, all decrees and sentences, and whatever else requires their cooperation;

(2) To record all important events with name of place and date,— day, month and year;

(3) To show the acts or documents contained in the diocesan archives to those who rightfully ask to see them, and to furnish authenticated copies of the originals.

A notary can make official records only in the territory of the bishop by whom he is appointed, and in matters with which he is lawfully entrusted. The office of notary is thus not only legal, but partly that of a historiographer. Legal acts are the orders issued by the bishop (dispositiones), e. g., concerning appointments to offices,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conferences and arrangements for confirmation. Likewise the obligationes, which imply all kinds of material and spiritual engagements, for instance, (1) title deeds, mortgages on church property, etc., (2) foundations for masses, legacies or bequests, especially last wills. Legal in the strictest sense are those acts which belong to judiciary procedure, summons, intimations, sentences, etc., all of which must be composed and recorded very carefully because their validity might otherwise be jeopardized.

As the historiographer of the diocese the chancellor or notary should record the erection of parishes, the labors of priests, the work done by institutions of charity and religion, etc. Historical records are very important, inter alia, for ascertaining prescription and custom. Wherefore the chancellor, in doing his duty conscientiously, serves History, which "teaches by example."

Here we would draw attention to the necessity of using durable and specially prepared ink. It is an unfortunate fact that many, especially typewritten papers, in course of time become almost illegible, whereas manuscripts of the ninth and tenth century can still be read with little difficulty.

The last paragraph of our canon limits the activity of notaries to the territory of the bishop to whom they owe their appointment. This rule is based on the nature of espiscopal jurisdiction, which is strictly limited in regard to territory, according to the principle: "Extra territorium ius dicenti impune non paretur." [25] A notary who would attempt to perform judicial functions in a strange territory would lack authority and therefore act invalidly.[26] Besides, a notary can write or compose only such documents for which he has been authorized; whence

[25] Cfr. c. 2, 6°, I, 2, de const.

[26] Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 262, de fide instrum.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a judicial act or document composed by a notary who was assigned to administrative affairs only, would be invalid.

CUSTODY OF ARCHIVES

CAN. 375

§ 1. Episcopi in loco tuto ac commodo archivum seu tabularium dioecesanum erigant, in quo instrumenta et scripturae, quae negotia dioecesana tum spiritualia tum temporalia spectant, apte dispositae et diligenter clausae custodiantur.

§ 2. Omni diligentia ac sollicitudine conficiatur inventarium seu catalogus documentorum quae in archivo continentur cum brevi singularum scripturarum synopsi.

CAN. 376

§ 1. Quotannis, primo bimestri, inventario seu catalogo illae scripturae adiungantur, quae anno praecedenti confectae vel alias neglectae fuerunt.

§ 2. Ordinarii sedulo inquirant chartas et scripturas forte alio distractas atque dispersas; et quaelibet necessaria remedia adhibeant ut eaedem scripturae archivo restituantur.

CAN. 377

§ 1. Archivum clausum sit oportet et nemini illud ingredi liceat sine Episcopi aut Vicarii Generalis et cancellarii licentia.

§ 2. Unus cancellarius illius clavem habeat.

CAN. 378

§ 1. Ex archivo non licet efferre scripturas sine Episcopi vel Vicarii Generalis consensu eaedemque post

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

triduum in suum locum referantur. Ordinario autem reservatur facultas prorogandi hoc tempus, quae tamen prorogatio nonnisi moderate concedatur.

§ 2. Qui aliquam scripturam ex archivo effert, syngrapham sua manu signatam, hoc ipsum significantem, cancellario relinquat.

The bishop must provide a safe and convenient place for the diocesan archives, where all documents pertaining to the spiritual and temporal affairs of his diocese may be properly arranged and safely kept under lock and key. A careful inventory or list of documents kept in the archives should be made, as well as a brief summary of each. Within the first two months of every year should be added to the catalogue such new papers as have accumulated in the course of the preceding year or been found neglected elsewhere.

The Ordinaries are instructed to make a careful search for documents and papers which may have gone astray or been scattered, and to employ every feasible means to have them restored to the diocesan archives.

The archives are to be locked, and no one is allowed to enter the place where they are kept without the permission of the bishop or of both the vicar-general and the chancellor. The chancellor shall keep the key.

No one is allowed to take papers out of the archives without the consent of either the bishop or the vicar-general; and if any papers are taken out, they must be returned after three days, unless the Ordinary permits them to be kept out for a longer time. Such permission, however, should be granted but rarely. Whoever takes out a paper from the archives must leave a signed receipt in his own handwriting with the chancellor.

This canon is intended as a safeguard to prevent documents from being scattered, and at the same time offers to students of history, or others who may be interested in episcopal records, an opportunity to use them. Of course, bishops will see to it that the documents are not put to wrong uses.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECRET ARCHIVES

CAN. 379

§ 1. Habeant praeterea Episcopi aliud archivum secretum vel saltem in communi archivo armarium seu scrinium omnino clausum et obseratum, quod de loco amoveri nequeat. In eo scripturae secreto servandae cautissime custodiantur; sed singulis annis quamprimum comburantur documenta causarum criminalium in materia morum, quarum rei vita cesserint vel quae a decennio sententia condemnatoria absolutae sunt, retento facti brevi summario cum textu sententiae definitivae.

§ 2. Etiam huius secreti archivi vel armarii inventarium seu catalogus conficiatur ad normam can. 375, § 2.

§ 3. Hoc archivum vel armarium duabus clavibus inter se diversis aperiatur, quarum altera apud Episcopum vel Administratorem Apostolicum, altera apud Vicarium Generalem vel, eo deficiente, Curiae cancellarium asservetur.

§ 4. Episcopus vel Administrator Apostolicus, repetita altera clave, ipse solus, nemine adstante, archivum vel armarium secretum, ubi opus fuerit, aperire et inspicere potest, quod deinde utraque clavi iterum claudatur.

CAN. 380

Statim a capta possessione, Episcopus sacerdotem

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

designet, qui, sede vacante aut impedita, clavem secreti tabularii seu armarii quae apud Episcopum erat, assumat.

CAN. 381

§ 1. Nisi Administrator Apostolicus dioecesi datus fuerit:

1.° Sede impedita ad normam can. 429, § 1, sacerdos ab Episcopo designatus, si quidem regimen dioecesis sit penes virum ecclesiasticum ab Episcopo delegatum, clavem eidem remittat; si penes Vicarium Generalem, eam ipse retineat;

2.° Sede vero vacante aut impedita ad normam cit. can. 429, § 3, idem sacerdos clavem remittat Vicario Capitulari statim post eius designationem; Vicarius vero Generalis vel cancellarius aliam clavem a se retentam remittere eodem tempore debet primae Capituli dignitati vel consultori dioecesano munere antiquiori.

§ 2. Antequam claves iis, quibus tradi debent ad normam § 1, remissae fuerint, Vicarius Generalis vel cancellarius et sacerdos, ut supra, ab Episcopo designatus, tabularium vel armarium sigillis Curiae obsignent.

CAN. 382

§ 1. Tabularium vel armarium nunquam aperiatur nec sigilla ab eo removeantur, nisi urgente necessitate et ab ipso Vicario Capitulari coram duobus canonicis vel dioecesanis consultoribus, qui evigilent ne qua scriptura e tabulario auferatur; solus autem Vicarius Capitularis documenta in tabulario asservata potest, iisdem canonicis vel consultoribus adstantibus, inspicere, nunquam tamen auferre. Archivum autem, post inspectionem, iterum sigillis obsignetur.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Advenienti novo Episcopo, si sigilla remota fuerint et tabularium aut armarium apertum, Vicarius Capitularis rationem reddat urgentis necessitatis, qua ad hoc motus fuerit.

What was said in the preceding canons concerns the common archives of the diocese. Besides this there should be a strictly secret one. At least the bishop must provide for a special safe or chest, capable of being locked and immovable (safe or safety vault), wherein all secret papers should be carefully preserved. Documents pertaining to criminal cases and moral matters which have reference to deceased defendants or to cases settled by condemnatory sentence over ten years ago, should be burnt every year, only a brief summary of each case with the text of the final sentence being retained.

Of the contents of these secret archives or chests an inventory or catalogue must be made according to can. 375, § 2.

These archives (or safe) must be locked with two different keys, one of which is kept by the bishop or Apostolic administrator, the other by the vicar-general, or, if there is no vicar-general, by the chancellor.

The bishop or Apostolic administrator, after having procured the other key from the vicar-general or chancellor, may, if necessary, open and inspect the secret archives alone and without witnesses, and should again lock it with both keys.

§ 1 of canon 379 safeguards the reputation of the dead and prevents the accumulation of useless papers.

The reason why the Apostolic administrator is specially mentioned in § 3 and § 4 is because these officials have sometimes been excluded not only from episcopal palaces, but also from the diocesan archives.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Canon 380 provides that the bishop, immediately after taking possession of his diocese, shall appoint a priest who, during a possible vacancy of the see or enforced absence of the bishop (sede impedita), shall take possession of the key. How careful the Church wishes the bishop to be with these archives is apparent from this canon. The secret archives of a bishop resemble diplomatic archives, and the last nuncio of Paris, if he were still alive, might tell a strange tale. Hence the law provides that a special custodian is appointed for the secret archives,— the chapter, which is otherwise competent in such matters, being discarded for good reasons.

Canon 381 says that, when a diocese has no Apostolic administrator during the vacancy of the see or enforced absence of the bishop, the custodian of the secret archives shall hand over the key to the temporary ruler of the diocese, if he be an ecclesiastic designated by the bishop; but if the government is in the hands of the vicar-general, he shall retain the key. The key shall be handed over to the vicar-capitular as soon as one is appointed, and at the same time the vicar-general or chancellor shall give up the other key to the first dignitary of the diocesan chapter or the oldest in rank among the diocesan consultors.

Before the keys are handed over to the persons designated in § 1, the vicar-general (or chancellor) and the custodian appointed by the bishop shall seal the archives, including the secret chests, with the seal of the episcopal Curia.

Canon 382 rules that the secret archives (tabularium, armarium) shall never be opened or unsealed except in urgent cases, by the vicar-capitular in the presence of two canons or diocesan consultors, who shall watch that no papers are carried off. The vicar-capitular may examine the papers alone in the presence of said canons or con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sultors, but he is not allowed to take any of them away, and the archives must again be sealed after inspection. If the seals were removed and the archives opened, the vicar-capitular must report to the new bishop the reason which urged him to open the archives.

OTHER ARCHIVES OF THE DIOCESE

CAN. 383

§ 1. Curent Episcopi ut archivorum quoque ecclesiarum cathedralium, collegiatarum, paroecialium, necnon confraternitatum et piorum locorum inventaria seu catalogi conficiantur duobus exemplaribus, quorum alterum in proprio archivo, alterum in archivo episcopali servetur, firmo praescripto can. 470, § 3, 1522, nn. 2, 3, 1523, n. 6.

§ 2. Documenta originalia ex praedictis archivis ne efferantur, nisi ad normam can. 378.

CAN. 384

§ 1. Documenta quae in paroeciarum et Curiarum archivis sub secreto servanda non sunt, fit cuilibet cuius intersit inspiciendi potestas; itemque postulandi ut sua impensa sibi legitimum eorum exemplar exscribatur et tradatur.

§ 2. Cancellarii autem Curiarum, parochi, aliique archivorum custodes in communicandis documentis et eorum exemplaribus describendis tradendisque regulas servent a legitima auctoritate ecclesiastica datas, et in casibus dubiis loci Ordinarium consulant.

Canon 383 urges the bishop to take care that all documents concerning the cathedral, collegiate and parish churches, as well as confraternities and pious institutions,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be made out in duplicate and that one copy be kept in the archives of the respective church or institution, whilst the other is preserved in the episcopal archives. No papers are to be taken from these archives except under the conditions stated in can. 378.

Canon 383 refers to three other canons, viz., 470, 1522, and 1523, which pertain to the parish books and inventories procured by the diocesan trustees. Of these a copy must be sent to, and kept in, the episcopal archives. It is evident that parishes in charge of exempt religious must comply with this law only in so far as parish affairs are concerned.

According to canon 384, the papers which need not be kept secret in parochial and episcopal archives may be inspected by any one who is interested in them, and authentic copies may be made by any one at his own expense. The chancellors of the various Curiae, parish priests and other custodians, in communicating documents or copies from the archives entrusted to their care, shall follow the rules laid down by legitimate ecclesiastical authority, and in doubtful cases consult their ordinaries.

The laws embodied in this part of the Code may serve as a pattern for more elaborate rules, which, if properly observed, will prevent abuses and unpleasantness.

ARTICLE III

SYNODAL EXAMINERS AND CONSULTORS

CAN. 385

§ 1. In quavis dioecesi habeantur examinatores synodales et parochi consultores qui omnes in Synodo constituantur, propositi ab Episcopo, a Synodo approbati.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Tot eligantur quot Episcopus prudenti suo iudicio necessarios iudicaverit, non tamen infra quatuor, nec ultra duodecim.

CAN. 386

§ 1. Examinatoribus et parochis consultoribus medio tempore inter unam et aliam Synodum demortuis vel alia ratione a munere cessantibus, alios pro-synodales Episcopus substituat de consilio Capituli cathedralis.

§ 2. Quae regula servetur quoque in examinatoribus et parochis consultoribus constituendis quoties Synodus non habeatur.

The Council of Trent [27] decreed that at each diocesan synod examiners should be chosen for the concursus of parish priests. The same council [28] advised bishops to have regular examiners for examining candidates for the priesthood and priests asking for the faculty to hear confessions. Diocesan synods having gone into desuetude, and for other reasons, examiners are now also selected outside the synod. Hence two kinds of examiners synodales, i. e., those chosen at a diocesan synod, and prosynodales, i. e., those chosen outside.

The parochi consultores,[29] have but a short history; for, if we mistake not, they were "canonized" by the Motu proprio of Pius X, "Maxima cura," Aug. 20, 1910, 27 Cf. Trid., Sess. 24 c. 18, de ref. and Bened. XIV, De Synod. Dioec., l. IV, c. 7; decisions cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 378 ff.

28 Trid., Sess. 23, cc. 7, 15 de ref.

29 In the Catholic Directory the term "parochi consultores" is sometimes translated by "parish-consultors," which may be accepted for brevity's sake, but is not entirely correct, for these consultors are quasi assessors of the parish priests, not of the parishes, which, of course, are concerned indirectly.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and now figure in the procedure of administrative removal of parish priests.

The Code ordains that there should be in every diocese synodal examiners and parish priest consultors, all to be appointed at and approved by a synod but proposed by the bishop; that the number of examiners and consultors is left to the prudent judgment of the bishop, but should not be less than four nor more than twelve.

These officials should be elected by those attending the synod after the bishop has proposed several names. The balloting may be secret or open; but a majority of votes is required for election. Hence, if one or the other, or even all proposed by the bishop do not receive the necessary majority, the bishop must propose other names for those rejected, until the number of appointees has been reached.[80] This number is determined by the bishop, preferably at the synod. The maximum and minimum are settled by law.

Canon 386 provides that, if any examiner or parish priest consultor should die or go out of office during the time intervening between synods, the bishop, with the advice of the cathedral chapter [or the diocesan consultors] shall appoint another in his stead and that the same rule shall be observed in the appointment of examiners and consultors, if no synod is held.

This enactment precludes the idea that the office of consultor or examiner may be attached to a parish, dignity, or office in such a way that the successor in that parish, etc., would eo ipso be examiner or consultor because his predecessor held that office.[81]

The second paragraph provides for extraordinary

80 Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., l. IV, c. 7, n. 3.

81 Ibid., n. 5, where an example from the diocese of Toledo in Spain is stated covering the text.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cases, which may arise where synods are not held at all or at irregular intervals.

CAN. 387

§ 1. Examinatores et parochi consultores, sive in Synodo sive extra Synodum constituti, post decennium ab incepto munere vel etiam prius, adveniente nova Synodo, officio cadunt; possunt tamen negotium iam coeptum ad exitum perducere et, servatis de iure servandis, denuo constitui.

§ 2. Qui loco examinatorum ac parochorum consultorum deficientium constituantur, in officio persistunt dumtaxat quousque perstitissent ii quibus substituti fuerunt.

CAN. 388

Removeri ab Episcopo nequeunt, nisi ex gravi causa et de consilio Capituli cathedralis.

CAN. 389

§ 1. Examinatores synodales operam suam diligenter navent praesertim experimentis habendis ad provisionem paroeciarum nec non processibus de quibus in can. 2147 seqq.

§ 2. Pro experimentis vero habendis ad clericorum ordinationem et approbationem sacerdotum qui petunt facultatem excipiendi sacramentales confessiones aut sacras conciones habendi, et pro examinibus de quibus in can. 130, integrum est Episcopo vel examinatorum synodalium vel aliorum opera uti.

CAN. 390

Idem potest esse examinator et parochus consultor, non autem in eadem causa.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Under can. 387 examiners and consultors, whether synodal or prosynodal, go out of office ten years from the date of their appointment, or, if a synod is held, even sooner. However, they may finish cases already begun, and, with due observance of the prescribed regulations, may be re-elected.

Those who are appointed in the place of deceased or retiring examiners and consultors shall merely fill the unexpired terms of those whose place they take.

A synod, according to can. 356, should be held every ten years, and this period is the normal term of office for the officials in question. Hence, if a consultor or examiner is appointed extrasynodically, say five years after the last synod, he can remain in office five years only, i. e., up to the time of the next synod. However, he as well as those who have served a full ten years' term, may be re-elected at the synod according to the rules established in can. 385.

If they have commenced to treat an ecclesiastical matter, say the removal of a parish priest, they may finish the case, even if they are not re-elected. In the example stated, the cause would have "commenced," so far as the examiner is concerned, as soon as the invitation to resign has been issued (can. 2148). For a consultor a "business" (negotium) has "commenced" when the parish priest thus asked to resign has taken recourse to the Ordinary (can. 2153). In other affairs, such as examinations, a sudden interruption is not likely to occur; but if an examiner has commenced to examine, he must finish the job.

Canon 388 provides that examiners and consultors cannot be removed from office by the bishop except for weighty reasons and with the advice of the cathedral

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

chapter (or diocesan consultors). This canon is but a consequence of the mode of their appointment, as the express wish of the synod would be slighted if the bishop were to remove these officials arbitrarily. Hence a weighty reason is required. Such a reason would be, e. g., fraud committed at an examination, or a bribe accepted. Besides, the reasons that justify the removal of a parish priest would also justify the removal of an examiner or consultor. Note that the advice, not the consent of the chapter or consultors is required. Hence a removal without solid reason, or without the advice of the chapter or board of consultors, would be valid, and the person removed could have recourse, but could not appeal to a higher authority.

Canon 389 makes it obligatory for the synodal (or pro-synodal) examiners to perform their task diligently, especially at the examinations which are held for the provision of parishes and in the course of procedures aiming at the removal of pastors. For the examination of candidates for Holy Orders and of such priests as desire the faculty of hearing confessions and preaching, and also of newly ordained priests for three years after ordination, the bishop is at liberty to employ the synodal examiners or others. These points shall be explained in connection with can. 459, where definite rules are laid down.

Can. 390 permits the same person to be examiner and consultor, but not in the same cause. Hence in the canonical process for the removal of parish priests, one who holds both offices can act in only one capacity, either as examiner or as consultor.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

CHAPTERS OF CANONS

Ancient documents testify to the fact that the bishops at an early date in the Church's history made use of their clergy in the government of the diocese, as helpers and counselors, so that the body of the clergy formed, as it were, a senate about their chief pastor. St. Jerome could say: "We, too, in the Church possess our own senate, the assembly of the clergy."[1] However, this coöperation did not imply a life in common (vita communis), as led by the monks. St. Augustine, indeed, endeavored to gather his priests under one roof and have them lead a community life;[2] and his example found followers, not only in Africa, but beyond the shores of the Mediterranean, at Tours (567) and Toledo (633).[3] A fresh impetus to community life was given by Chrodegang of Metz, who composed a special rule for his canons, as he called them.[4] This name had a double signification. Originally it meant one immatriculated or inscribed in the canon or list of names which was preserved in the churches either for liturgical or administrative purposes. In the eighth and ninth centuries, the term signified a person who lived according to a canonical rule, i. e., one

1 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., XIII, 1, 4.

2 Vita S. Aug., by Possidius, in Migne, P. L., 32, col. 37 ff.

3 Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, 1855, III, 75 and 21.

4 The rule of Chrodegang is published in Mansi, Coll. Conc., t. XIV, 313 ff.; it is in part taken verbally from the rule of St. Benedict. Amalarius of Metz published an enlarged edition of the rule of Chrodegang.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

supposed to be taken from the canons of church councils; hence, vita canonica or canonical life. Various synods, as well as Charlemagne, had decreed that all clergymen should be canons[5] and live within the claustrum of the bishop, to which no women were admitted.[6] The superior par excellence was the bishop himself, his chief assistants the arch-deacon, the precentor,[7] and prelates, who went by various names, the first in rank being sometimes called provost (praepositus), and the second, dean or arch-priest. The younger clerics, called domicellares, were trained by a scholasticus and employed as singers. This was the institute of canons, which Louis the Pious wished to introduce into his empire. But in course of time some of the clergy grew tired of the life in common, especially since their private property remained to them, and their prebends or benefices permitted, nay often compelled them to remain outside the community house. Yet, though they lived in private houses, they long retained the rule of Chrodegang[8] that they should attend the chapter or capitulum, in order to hear a chapter from the rule or a homily, and to receive orders and corrections. This praiseworthy custom was about all that was left of the ancient canonical life, and despite the efforts of saintly men[9] to restore it, the chapters of canons remained independent, nay obtained many additional prerogatives in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. It certainly was more than a mere accident that the popes wished to favor the chapters in that 5 Cf. Hefele, Conciliensgeschichte, III, pp. 551, 561, 585, 627, 683, 693.

6 Regula Canonica, cc. 117, 144; Hefele, l. c., IV, pp. 10, 13.

7 Regula Chrodeg., cc. 9, 24; Mansi, l. c., XIV, 317, 325.

8 Regula Chrodeg., c. 8; Mansi, l. c., XIV, 318.

9 Yvo of Chartres, and especially S. Norbert, succeeded in establishing the order of canons regular, so-called, to distinguish them from the canons secular.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google memorable struggle concerning investitures. Hence it need not surprise us that, under Alexander III (1159–81), the canons controlled the episcopal elections,[10] and that the Decretals accept this as a matter of fact.[11] Besides electing the bishop, the chapter, through its vicar-capitular, governed the diocese during the vacancy of the episcopal see.

Thus, the cathedral chapter in course of time became a powerful corporation, which asserted its influence throughout the diocese no less than within its bosom (gremium). To it belonged the right to receive new members and to determine their number, to create new prebends, etc. Thus, the canonicus theologus and the canonicus poenitentiarius, in existence since the thirteenth century, obtained a legal status at the Council of Trent[12] and were looked upon as important officials. Some canons were supranumerary or honorary, whilst others were full-fledged (in fructibus et floribus). Besides a distinction was sometimes made between dignities in the proper sense, including precedence and jurisdiction, personatus, which gave only precedence, and officia, which had neither precedence nor jurisdiction. But unfortunately these terms are often used promiscuously.[13] If dignitas is taken in the strict sense, to wit, as including precedence and jurisdiction in foro externo, it would include the bishop and the vicar-general, and perhaps other officials. However, the bishop and the vicar-general are not considered canons under the law. The new Code admits a twofold gradation: dignitates and canonicatus, the former being nothing else than the an-

10 Can. 35, Dist. 63.

11 Cf. tit. 6, de electione, passim.

12 Sess. 5, c. 1, de ref.; sess. 24, c. 8 de ref.; Bouix, De Capitulis, 1852; Aichner, Compendium Juris. Eccl., § 121; Wernz, Jus Dec., II, 921 ff. v. Scherer, Kirchenrecht, I, 565 ff.; Sägmüller, K.-R., § 95.

13 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn., III, 3. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cient personatus, involving mere precedence or honorary rights, while the latter connotes administration or office, with, of course, some honorary prerogatives to distinguish the holder from the rest of the clergy.[14]

Mention must finally be made of the fact that after the canonical life had completely vanished, the chapters fixed a certain number of canons to be admitted, and a chapter, if filled, was called "closed" (capitulum clausum).

In order to make their burden more bearable, the canons admitted, not indeed into the chapter or to participation in its honorary rights, other clerics, who went by various names: beneficiarii, capellani, portionarii, mansionarii. These received a certain portion of the revenues and were actual coadjutors of the canons,[15] though without the latters' prerogatives.

After these explanations, which were necessary to enable the reader to understand the following canons, we now proceed.

CAN. 391

§ 1. Capitulum canonicorum sive cathedrale sive collegiale seu collegiatum est clericorum collegium ideo institutum ut sollemniorem cultum Deo in ecclesia exhibeat et, si agatur de Capitulo cathedrali, ut Episcopum, ad normam sacrorum canonum, tanquam eiusdem senatus et consilium, adiuvet, ac, sede vacante, eius vices suppleat in dioecesis regimine.

§ 2. Capitulum collegiale appellatur insigne aut

14 Cf. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 79 ff.; Wernz, Jus. Decret., III, 934 f., who appropriately remarks that, in order to get at the true distinction of these various offices, one would have to study the several chapters. This occupation we leave to others.

15 Cf. Bouix, l. c., p. 68, p. 139 ff.; mansionarii, they were called because of their permanent service; portionarii, because they received a portion of the revenues.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

perinsigne, si hoc titulo ex apostolico privilegio vel ab immemorabili gaudeat.

A chapter of canons, either cathedral or collegiate, is a corporation of clerics, instituted for the purpose of more solemnly celebrating the divine service. A cathedral chapter has the additional function of assisting the bishop as his senate and council and governing the diocese during a vacancy of the episcopal see.

A collegiate chapter is called distinguished or very distinguished (insigne aut perinsigne), if it has received that title from the Apostolic See or enjoys it by immemorial custom.

A collegiate chapter is a corporation of canons, which is established, not at the cathedral, or, as the ancient term has it, in domo episcopi, but in some other conspicuous place or church. Such chapters are often found in episcopal cities. In Rome, for instance, there are several of them, e. g., S. Maria in Cosmedin, S. Lorenzo in Lucina, etc.

The character insignis (distinguished) is derived either from the will of the Supreme Pontiff or from immemorial custom. The former needs no reason, but generally follows the rule either of antiquity or excellence attached to the place or church. Custom, therefore, has distinguished certain chapters either by the significance of the place or importance of the church (sanctuary) or the fame of the canons.[16]

Can. 392

Capitulorum tum cathedralium tum collegialium institutio seu erectio, innovatio ac suppressio Sedi Apostolicae reservatur.

16 Bouix, l. c., p. 55 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cathedral as well as collegiate chapters may be erected, changed, or suppressed only by the Apostolic See. This has been the practice of the popes since the eighteenth century; indeed, we might say, to some extent, since the Tridentine Council.[17]

CAN. 393

§ 1. In qualibet ecclesia capitulari sint dignitates et canonici inter quos varia officia distribuantur; possunt esse etiam alia minora beneficia in uno vel pluribus gradibus.

§ 2. Capitulum constat dignitatibus et canonicis, nisi, ad dignitates quod attinet, aliud ex capitularibus constitutionibus eruatur; non autem inferioribus beneficiariis seu mansionariis, qui canonicis auxilium praestant.

§ 3. Canonicatus sine adnexis emolumentis ne instituantur sine speciali Apostolicae Sedis concessione.

In every chapter church there should be dignitaries and canons to discharge the various offices. There may also be minor benefices of the same or several kinds (gradibus).

A chapter consists of dignitaries and canons, unless the constitution of the chapter provides otherwise concerning the dignities; but not of beneficiaries or mansionarii who are assistants to the canons.

No canonicate lacking the necessary revenues can be established without the special permission of the Apostolic See.

§ 1 declares the intention of the legislator that there should be two kinds of canons in every chapter: digni-

17 Cf. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 81 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

taries and simple canons; but § 2 admits the old custom that dignitaries proper are not de capitulo.[17] A plurality of minor benefices either in the dignitaries or canons is admitted, whereas beneficiaries or vicars of canons are excluded from the chapter.

CAN. 394

§ 1. In Capitulis numeratis tot sint praebendati, quot praebendae; in non numeratis, quot ex proventibus decenter sustentari posse, Episcopus, audito Capitulo, iudicaverit.

§ 2. Erectio dignitatum Sedi Apostolicae reservatur; sed est in Episcopi potestate, consentiente Capitulo, exstinctas forte dignitates restituere et praebendis in Capitulo iam exstantibus alias sive canonicales sive beneficiales addere.

§ 3. In ecclesiis cathedralibus et collegialibus insignibus ubi adeo tenues praebendae sunt una cum distributionibus quotidianis, ut sustinendo canonicorum decori plane sint impares, Episcopi, audito Capitulo et impetrata Sanctae Sedis licentia, vel beneficia aliquot simplicia praebendis uniant, vel, si hac ratione provideri non possit, aliquibus praebendis suppressis, cum patronorum consensu, si de iure patronatus laicorum sint, quarum fructus et proventus reliquarum praebendarum distributionibus quotidianis applicentur, eas ad minorem numerum reducant, ita tamen ut tot supersint, quot divino cultui celebrando ac dignitati ecclesiae commode respondeant.

In closed chapters there should be as many prebendaries as there are prebends;[18] in chapters which have no

17 Cf. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 81 ff.

18 In the established church of England, the chapter was said to consist of canons or prebendaries. Blackstone-Cooley, Commentary, I, p. 381.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google fixed number of members, there may be as many as in the bishop's judgment (to be formed after hearing the chapter) can be decently supported from the revenues.

The establishing of dignities is reserved to the Holy See; but the bishop, with the consent of the chapter, may restore extinct dignities and add to the prebends already existing in the chapter others, either of canons or beneficiaries.

Should the prebends, even with the daily distributions added, become so meagre in any cathedral or distinguished collegiate church, that they prove entirely inadequate for maintaining the decorum of the canons, then the bishop may, after having heard the chapter (advice) and obtained the permission of the Holy See, add some simple benefices to the prebends, or, should this prove impracticable, suppress some of the prebends — (if these belong to a lay patron, their suppression requires the consent of the patron) — and apply the income thus saved to the daily distributions among the remaining prebendaries; provided, however, that enough prebends are left to ensure the worthy celebration of the divine service and the maintenance of the dignity of the church.

Note the difference between the first and second clause. To unite benefices requires the beneplacitum apostolicum; whereas to suppress insufficient prebends does not.

Since the daily distributions play a conspicuous part in chapters, a few words of explanation regarding them may not be amiss. Ivo of Chartres was probably not the first bishop who had trouble in making the canons live up to their duty of personally assisting at the choir service. To make the negligent more diligent and the slothful more assiduous in the performance of their canonical duties, he says, I have decided to give them half of the income of a provostry, in order to make thereof a daily pittance, that those whom the sweetness of the spiritual food does not move, may be stimulated by the temporal bread.[19] This custom was accepted and entered the Decretals as a law.[20] The Council of Trent[21] ordered bishops to set aside the third part of all the fruits, revenues, and income from all the prebends for daily distribution among those who personally and actively assist at the divine service. Of these we shall hear more in the following canons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 395

§ 1. In ecclesiis tam cathedralibus quam collegialibus in quibus nullae sunt quotidianae distributiones vel ita tenues ut verisimiliter negligantur, Episcopi tertiam partem separent fructuum, proventuum, obventionum quae ex dignitatibus, canonicatibus, officiis aliisque illius ecclesiae beneficiis percipiuntur et in distributiones quotidianas convertant.

§ 2. Si distributiones quavis de causa introduci nequeant, Episcopus in dignitates, canonicos ac beneficiarios negligentes pecuniarias constituat mulctas, quae distributionibus respondeant earumque locum teneant.

§ 3. Distributiones cedunt diligentibus, quavis collusione aut remissione exclusa; si vero dignitates habeant proventus a massa seu bonis canonicorum diversos et separatos, distributiones ab eis amissae cedunt aliis dignitatibus praesentibus, si adsint, secus fabricae ecclesiae, quatenus indigeat, aut alii pio loco, Episcopi arbitrio.

19 Cf. Benedict XIV, Institutiones Iuris Eccl., 207, § 7; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 170 f.

20 Cf. c. 32, X, III, 5 de praeb.; c. un. 6° III, 3 de clericis non resid.

21 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 3; Sess. 22, c. 3 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Ab unoquoque Capitulo, secundum sua cuiusque statuta, unus vel plures censores, seu punctatores nominentur, qui absentes a divinis officiis quotidie notent, praestito prius coram Capitulo vel eius praeside iureiurando de suo munere fideliter obeundo; quibus Episcopus alium addere potest punctatorem; quod si abfuerint punctatores, senior e canonicis qui adsunt, illorum vices suppleat.

In those cathedral as well as collegiate churches in which no daily distributions take place or where they are so meagre as to count for nothing, the bishop shall set apart the third part of all the profits, incomes, and revenues [22] received from the dignities, canonships, offices and other church benefices, and turn them into daily distributions.

If, for any reason, such distributions cannot be arranged, the bishop shall impose upon the negligent dignitaries, canons and beneficiaries, pecuniary fines in proportion to the distributions of which they shall take the place.

These distributions are for the benefit of the diligent and there must be no secret agreements or abatement of fines. If any dignitaries have an income separate from the common possession of the canons, the distributions forfeited by them must be given to the dignitaries present, or if none are present, they should be applied, according to the pleasure of the bishop, to the church building, if in need, or to any other pious institution.

22 These three terms, which often recur, signify respectively, fructus, the produce of the cultivated soil, thence victuals, proventus, income, revenue, also salary (in classical language also crop); obventiones, that income which is beyond expectation, what the Italians call incerti (Sporteln, fees), or, in the language of the Pandects, the revenues not including the fruits of the field. However, the three terms are often used promiscuously.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Every chapter shall, according to its own statutes, appoint censors or punctatores, whose duty it is daily to make note of those absent from the divine offices. Before entering upon their office these punctatores must promise under oath before the chapter or its presiding officer to perform their duty faithfully. The bishop may add another punctator to those set up by the chapter. If the punctatores are absent, the senior of the canons present shall take their place.

The punctatores (or obedientiales, as they were formerly called) must write down the names of the absentees, also note those who come late (if they arrive after the Kyrie, they are taken for absentees), and who talk or do not chant, or leave the choir too often.[23] That this office is not very agreeable goes without saying. Hence the right of the bishop to appoint a censor of his own, in order to prevent secret agreements.

CAN. 396

§ 1. Collatio dignitatum tum in Capitulis cathedralibus tum in collegialibus Sedi Apostolicae reservatur.

§ 2. Prohibetur optio, reprobata contraria consuetudine, sed salva fundationis lege.

§ 3. Prima saltem dignitas in Capitulo cathedrali, quantum fieri potest et ceteris paribus, laurea doctorali in sacra theologia vel iure canonico polleat.

The conferring of dignities in cathedral as well as collegiate chapters is reserved to the Apostolic See.

Optioning is prohibited, notwithstanding any contrary custom, but with due regard to the law of foundation.

23 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn., IV, 4, where the oath to be taken is reproduced (n. 3, according to St. Charles Borrom.) Boux, l. c., pp. 135–139.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first dignitary of the cathedral chapter should, if possible and other things being equal, be a doctor of divinity or canon law.

Optioning means the right of choosing a vacant canonicate, whether a dignity or simple canonship, belonging to the senior canon.[24] It does not differ from the ius optandi of the cardinals. But canons no longer enjoy this right, unless it was expressly stipulated at the foundation of the chapter. The requisites (§ 3) for the first dignitas, whatever it be, according to the statutes of the respective chapter, are taken from the Council of Trent.[25] What "ceteris paribus" means, must be deduced, like the other qualities required, either from common law, or from particular statutes.

CAN. 397

Nisi aliud in statutis capitularibus caveatur, dignitatibus et canonicis secundum ordinem praecedentiae ius et officium est:

1.° Episcopi vicem supplere in peragendis functionibus sacris in sollemnioribus anni festivitatibus;

2.° Episcopo celebranti in pontificalibus, aspersorium in ingressu ecclesiae porrigere et presbyteri assistentis fungi officio;

3.° Eidem decumbenti ministrare Sacramenta; defuncto iusta funebria persolvere;

4.° Convocare Capitulum eique praeesse ac praescribere et ordinare quae ad chori directionem referantur, dummodo dignitas sit de gremio Capituli.

After the constitutive elements have been laid down, the duties of canons are now defined.

24 Cf. Bouix, l. c., p. 169 f.

25 Sess. 24, c. 12 de ref., Richter, Trid., p. 348 ff., where various decisions are inserted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Unless otherwise provided in the chapter statutes, the dignitaries and canons, according to their respective rank and order of precedence, have the following rights and duties:

(1) They take the bishop's place in the celebration of the sacred functions on the more solemn feasts of the year;

(2) When the bishop celebrates pontifically, they must offer him the sprinkler at the entrance of the church, and one of them act as assistant priest;

(3) When the bishop is ill, they must administer to him the sacraments, and after his death, hold the funeral services;

(4) They shall convoke the chapter and preside over it, they shall prescribe and regulate whatever pertains to the direction of the choir service, provided the dignity belongs to the chapter. This conditional clause supposes that dignitaries may not belong to the chapter. Hence the meaning is that a dignitary who does not belong to the chapter has no right to convoke it; and if there should be no dignitary at all in the whole chapter, a canon, who acts as praeses capituli, may call the meeting. Generally, however, the chapter is called by the provost or dean.[26]

THE CANONICUS THEOLOGUS AND THE POENITENTIARIUS

CAN. 398

§ 1. In nulla ecclesia cathedrali desit officium canonici theologi et, ubi id fieri poterit, canonici poenitentiarii.

§ 2. Etiam in collegialibus, praesertim insignibus,

26 Cf. Bouix, l. c., p. 192 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

officium canonici theologi et poenitentiarii constitui potest.

CAN. 399

§ 1. Canonicus theologus et poenitentiarius eligantur qui aptiores pro loci qualitate ad propria munera adimplenda reperiantur; sed, ceteris paribus, praeferantur doctores in sacra theologia, si agatur de canonico theologo, in sacra theologia vel iure canonico, si de poenitentiario; expedit praeterea ut canonicus poenitentiarius aetatis annum tricesimum expleverit.

§ 2. Praebenda theologalis et poenitentiaria ne conferantur, nisi prius de vita, moribus, doctrina candidatorum plane constiterit, salva lege concursus, ubi sit constituta.

§ 3. Canonicus poenitentiarius prohibetur aliud simul officium in dioecesi suscipere aut exercere, cui adnexa sit iurisdictio in foro externo.

CAN. 400

§ 1. Canonici theologi est, diebus et horis ab Episcopo cum Capituli consilio designatis, publice in ecclesia explanare sacram Scripturam; sed Episcopus, si id utilius iudicet, potest eidem alia doctrinae catholicae argumenta in ecclesia explicanda committere.

§ 2. Canonicus theologus munus expleat suum ipse per se, vel, si ultra sex menses fuerit impeditus, propriis expensis per alium sacerdotem ab Episcopo deputandum.

§ 3. Episcopus gravi de causa potest canonico theologo committere ut, loco lectionum in ecclesia, sacras disciplinas in Seminario doceat.

CAN. 401

§ 1. Poenitentiarius canonicus tum ecclesiae cathe-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dralis tum ecclesiae collegialis obtinet a iure potestatem ordinariam, quam tamen aliis delegare non potest, absolvendi etiam a peccatis et a censuris Episcopo reservatis, in dioecesi extraneos quoque, et dioecesanos extra territorium quoque dioecesis.

§ 2. Debet in sede excipiendis confessionibus sibi in capitulari ecclesia destinata residere tempore ad fidelium commoditatem, iudicio Episcopi, opportuniore et praesto esse iis qui ad confitenda sua peccata accedunt ipso quoque divinorum officiorum tempore.

CAN. 402

Si Capitulo adnexa sit cura animarum, haec exerceatur a vicario paroeciali ad normam can. 471.

In every cathedral church there should be a canon theologian, and, wherever possible, also a canon penitentiary (confessor).

Also in the collegiate churches, especially the distinguished ones, there may be both a canon theologian and a canon penitentiary.

The canon theologian and the penitentiary should be chosen from among those who are best fitted for their respective tasks; but, other things being equal, a doctor of divinity is to be preferred for canon theologian, and a doctor of divinity or canon law for penitentiary. It is also becoming that the penitentiary shall have completed the thirtieth year of age.

The prebends of a theologian and poenitentiarius shall never be conferred on any candidate until an investigation has been made as to his life, moral conduct and knowledge, and by observing the concursus, if this be the law.

The canon penitentiary is not allowed to hold or exercise any office in the diocese which has attached to it jurisdiction in foro externo.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The office of the canon theologian is to expound Holy Scripture publicly in church, on days and at hours designated by the bishop with the advice of the chapter. The bishop may also entrust him with the exposition of other doctrinal matter.

The canon theologian must fulfill his office personally, and in case he is prevented for more than six months, he must employ at his own expense another priest, to be designated by the bishop.

For urgent reasons, the bishop may employ the canon theologian as professor in the theological seminary, instead of lecturer in the church.

If a comparison be allowed between the old and the new law,[27] a certain mitigation is here noticeable, whether for better or for worse is not our business to determine. The old law excluded all other employment, even in the seminary, while the new permits the theologian to be professor of a theological — not petit — seminary. Probably new conditions, especially the lack of fit men and scarcity of priests, required the mitigation.

The canon poenitentiarius of a cathedral or collegiate church enjoys the ordinary power (which, however, he cannot delegate to others) of absolving all, even strangers in the diocese, from sins and censures reserved to the bishop. Outside his own territory he may absolve the subjects of his diocese.

He must sit in the confessional assigned to him in the capitular church at the time which, according to the judgment of the bishop, is most convenient for the faithful, and must be ready to hear confessions even during divine service.

27 Cf. Trid., Sess. 5, c. 1, de ref. and the decisions of the S.C.C. in Richter, Trid., p. 16 ff.; Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., XIII, 9, 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The faculties of this official are enlarged under the Code, especially concerning strangers and strange territory and as to cases reserved to the bishop.[28] Reserved to the bishop are those cases prescribed by law and designated as such by the bishop himself (cfr. Title IV, Book III).

If the chapter has charge of souls (cura) this must be entrusted to a vicar, according to canon 471.

THE APPOINTMENT TO CANONICATES

CAN. 403

Exceptis dignitatibus, ad Episcopum pertinet, audito Capitulo, conferre omnia et singula beneficia ac canonicatus in ecclesiis tum cathedralibus tum collegialibus, reprobata quavis contraria consuetudine et revocato quolibet contrario privilegio, sed firma contraria fundationis lege et praescripto can. 1435.

CAN. 404

§ 1. Canonicatus Episcopus conferat sacerdotibus doctrina vitaeque integritate praestantibus.

§ 2. In canonicatuum collatione, ceteris paribus, ratio habeatur illorum qui doctores in sacra theologia vel iure canonico renuntiati fuerint in aliquo athenaeo, vel laudabiliter ministerium ecclesiasticum aut magisterium exercuerint, firmo praescripto can. 130, § 2.

CAN. 405

§ 1. Dignitates, canonici et beneficiarii, capta legitime beneficii sui possessione ad normam can. 1443–

28 Cfr. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 8, de ref. Richter, Trid., p. 344 f.; Bouix, l. c., p. 125 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1445, statim pro gradu suo acquirunt, praeter insignia ac privilegia propria, scamnum in choro, ius percipiendi fructus ac distributiones, ac vocem in capitulo ad normam can. 411, § 3.

§ 2. De fidei professione ab ipsis ante captam possessionem emittenda servetur praescriptum can. 1406–1408.

The dignities excepted, all benefices and canonicates in cathedral and collegiate chapters are conferred by the bishop after hearing the chapter. All customs to the contrary are rejected and all privileges revoked, but the law of foundation as well as foundations made in Rome (can. 1435, § 3) remain in force.

The bishop should confer canonries on priests who are distinguished for learning and virtuous life. Other things being equal, those candidates should be preferred who are doctors of divinity or of canon law, or have distinguished themselves in the sacred ministry or as professors.

Dignitaries, canons and beneficiaries, after having duly taken possession of their office (can. 1443–1445), besides their insignia and privileges, immediately obtain a seat in the choir (stall), the right of receiving their income and sharing in the daily distributions, and a voice in the chapter, according to can. 411, § 3

As to the profession of faith to be pronounced before their taking possession, see can. 1406–1408.

HONORARY CANONS

CAN. 406

§ 1. Episcopo, non autem Vicario Generali, nec Vicario Capitulari, ius est canonicos ad honorem nomi-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nandi sive dioecesanos sive extra-dioecesanos cum consilio Capituli cui canonicus est adscribendus, sed Episcopus raro et caute hoc iure utatur.

§ 2. Sacerdotem alienae dioecesis canonicum ad honorem nominaturus, Episcopus, praeter Capituli sui consilium, Ordinarii, cui subiectus est nominandus, assensum impetret, sub poena nominationis irritae, eundemque Ordinarium insignia edoceat ac privilegia quorum usum nominandus exinde habiturus sit.

§ 3. Canonici ad honorem extra dioecesim in qua nominati sunt degentes, numero sint tertia parte minores canonicis titularibus.

CAN. 407

§ 1. Canonici ad honorem alicuius basilicae vel ecclesiae collegialis almae Urbis, privilegiis et insignibus uti possunt tantum intra eiusdem basilicae vel collegiatae ecclesiae eiusque filialium ambitum; canonici vero ad honorem aliarum ecclesiarum extra Urbem, privilegiis et insignibus utantur in dioecesi tantum ubi nominati sunt, non autem extra dioecesim, nisi ad normam can. 409, § 2.

§ 2. Canonici ad honorem, praeter insignia et privilegia seu iura honorifica, obtinent etiam scamnum in choro.

The bishop (not the vicar-general or the vicar-capitular) has the right of nominating, with the advice of the chapter, honorary canons, either from his own or a strange diocese; but this right should be used rarely and with caution. In appointing a priest of a strange diocese honorary canon, the bishop must, besides the advice of his chapter, have the consent of the Ordinary to whom the priest is subject, under penalty of the nomination being null and void; besides, the bishop must inform the strange ordinary as to the insignia and privileges which the honorary canon shall enjoy.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The number of honorary canons living outside the diocese for which they are named must be one-third less than of the titular canons (such as hold a canonship in titulum; cfr. can. 1439).

The honorary canons of basilicas and collegiate churches of the city of Rome enjoy their privileges and insignia only within the precincts of the respective basilica or collegiate church and their dependencies. Honorary canons of churches outside of Rome may use their privileges and insignia only in the diocese for which they are named, but not in another, except when they accompany the bishop or represent the bishop at occasions mentioned in can. 409, § 2.

Honorary canons, besides their insignia and privileges (honorary rights) are also entitled to a seat (stall) in the choir.

The order of precedence in chapters and for single canons is established as follows:

CAN. 408

§ 1. Capitulum cathedrale praecedit collegiali, etiam insigni, in ipsa quoque collegiali ecclesia; Capitulum insigne praecedit non insigni; in eodem Capitulo, salvis peculiaribus statutis, vel legitimis consuetudinibus, dignitates, servato inter se praecedentiae ordine, praecedunt canonicis; canonici antiquiores, qui nempe prius possessionem ceperunt, posterioribus; canonici titulares, honorariis; honorarii, beneficiariis; dignitates vero aut capitulares charactere episcopali ornati omni-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bus dignitatibus ac canonicis in presbyterali tantum ordine constitutis praecedunt.

§ 2. In Capitulis in quibus habentur distinctae praebendae presbyterales, diaconales, subdiaconales, servetur praecedentia ordinis; et in eodem ordine praecedentia receptionis in ordinem, non autem in Capitulum.

The cathedral chapter takes precedence over the collegiate chapter, even though this be a distinguished one and in its own church; a distinguished chapter over the one which does not enjoy that prerogative. In the same chapter, unless particular statutes and customs rule otherwise, the dignitaries have precedence over the canons; the senior canons over the junior, according to the time of possession; the titular canons over the honorary; the honorary canons over the beneficiaries. Dignitaries or capitularies endowed with the episcopal character take precedence over all other dignitaries and canons who are only priests.

In chapters which have distinct classes of priests, deacons, and subdeacons, precedence is regulated according to these orders, and, in the same order, according to the time of ordination, not the date of reception into the chapter.

INSIGNIA

CAN. 409

§ 1. In unaquaque ecclesia tum cathedrali tum collegiali, qui in dignitate episcopali sunt constituti, deferant in choro vestem episcopalem; ceteri omnes, dignitates, canonici et beneficiarii, vestem sibi in bulla erectionis assignatam vel apostolico indulto concessam; secus censeantur tanquam absentes.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Vestem choralem aut specialia insignia capitularia adhibere possunt in tota dioecesi in qua est Capitulum, sed, reprobata contraria consuetudine, non extra dioecesim, nisi vel Episcopum comitentur vel Episcopum aut Capitulum repraesentent in Conciliis aliisve sollemnitatibus.

Bishops wear the episcopal dress in choir; all others, dignitaries, canons, and beneficiaries, the dress assigned to them in the document of erection or granted by Apostolic indult. If they appear in any other garb, they are to be considered as absent.

Members of the chapter may wear their choir dress or special insignia throughout the diocese, but not outside of it, except when they accompany their bishop or represent him at a council or other solemnities. All contrary customs are abolished.

The dress of canons generally — for the Code admits prerogatives established by written law — consists of the rochet, mozzetta, cappa, and almutium.[29] The latter two appear united in the manteletta with a small hood. The new Code allows the canons to wear this choir dress in all the churches of the diocese, which is an extension of their former rights. For formerly,[30] unless they appeared in a body, the canons could wear this dress only in their own churches. Now they are entitled to wear it in the whole diocese, including the churches of exempt religious; for the text makes no distinction.

29 The word rochet is said to be derived from the Greek ron chiton, i. e., soft tunic; mozzetta from the Italian moza, i.e., cap, whilst almutium is said to be derived from almuz (Mütze), a late medieval German word; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 504 ff.

30 Bouix, l. c., p. 512 f. There are many decisions concerning our subject to be found in the Decreta Auth. S. R. I. C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

STATUTES AND MEETINGS

CAN. 410

§ 1. Sua cuique Capitulo statuta ne desint, ab omnibus dignitatibus, canonicis, beneficiariis religiose servanda.

§ 2. Statuta capitularia, per legitimum actum capitularem condita, approbanda subiiciantur Episcopo, sine cuius auctoritate postea nec abrogari possunt nec mutari.

§ 3. Si, Episcopo edicente ut statuta conficiantur, Capitulum id praestare neglexerit, exacto sexto ab intimatione mense, Episcopus eadem conficiat imponatque Capitulo.

CAN. 411

§ 1. Stato tempore ac loco conveniat canonicorum coetus de suae ecclesiae et Capituli negotiis acturus; alii praeterea conventus haberi poterunt, quoties id aut Episcopo aut Capituli praesidi aut maiori canonicorum parti expedire videatur.

§ 2. Ad habendum coetum ordinarium non est necessaria specialis convocatio; quae tamen ad extraordinarium requiritur, et facienda est secundum statuta capitularia.

§ 3. In capitulis vocem habent canonici, exclusis honorariis, et dignitates, si una cum canonicis Capitulum constituant ad normam can. 393, § 2.

Every chapter must have its statutes, which are to be observed conscientiously by all, dignitaries, canons, and beneficiaries.

The statutes, after having been established by a legiti-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google mate capitular act, must be submitted for approval to the bishop, without whose authority no change can afterwards be made.

If the chapter, though admonished thereto by an episcopal edict, neglects to adopt statutes, the bishop, after six months from the date of the edict being intimated, should himself compose statutes and impose them on the chapter.

Formerly a chapter could make statutes either in writing or by way of custom, and they needed no appproval by the bishop as long as they touched the canons' own affairs.[81] But now no statutes can be enacted without episcopal approval. Besides, the chapters are obliged to write down their statutes, and may be compelled thereto by an episcopal edict, i. e., a peremptory admonition issued in writing and brought to the notice of the canons in a canonical way. No abrogation or change is allowed without the knowledge and approval of the bishop.

A capitular act is one concluded and agreed upon by the majority of canons assembled in chapter.

The chapter should meet at stated times and places in order to deliberate on the affairs of the church and chapter.

Besides these regular meetings, others may be held as often as the bishop, or the president of the chapter, or the majority of the canons, deem it opportune.

For a regular meeting no special summons is necessary, but for an extraordinary assembly summons must be issued according to the statutes of the chapter.

In the chapter all canons, except the honorary, as well as the dignitaries, if the latter belong to the body of 81 Cfr. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 408 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

canons, enjoy the right to vote. (Cfr. can. 393, § 2.)

As the matter is of importance for our diocesan consultors, a few notes may further illustrate the text.

The regular meetings should be established by statutory agreement, in order that the canons do not incur the danger of being condemned in contumaciam if they fail to appear.

Extraordinary meetings may be called as often as important affairs require it, by the bishop, by the president of the chapter (provost, dean), or by the majority of the members.

The majority is taken relatively to those who do not desire a chapter meeting; for instance, if the chapter consists of eight canons, five are a majority.

For the ordinary or regular meetings, no special summons is required. Hence the absentees lose their vote and cannot demand a rehearsal of the proceedings.

Two-thirds always form a quorum, but at regular meetings two-thirds are not required if only three members are present, according to the saying, "tres faciunt collegium." We presuppose, of course, that the statutes contain nothing to the contrary. To extraordinary meetings, all the capitulars must be called. The summons must mention the time and place of the meeting, and if necessary, also the subject-matter to be considered. Should any member be unlawfully neglected by the one who calls the meeting, he may remonstrate against any decision made at that meeting and have it nullified.[32] Hence, whenever the bishop is ordered to ask the chapter to meet for affairs designated as requiring the chapter's cooperation, he must call a meeting,— not simply ask the advice or consent of the members in writing,— because [32] This is the doctrine commonly held by canonists. Cfr. Bouix, l. c., p. 182 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the chapter signifies the meeting of the whole body, not the vote of single canons or consultors.

Whether the vote is to be taken secretly or viva voce, is not determined, except for elections, and therefore balloting may take place either way, unless the statutes prescribe or the consultors by previous vote have adopted a specified mode.

The majority of votes is calculated in proportion to those present and relative to the number of yeas and nays; for instance, if thirteen are present, seven affirmative votes carry the resolution against the six contradictory votes.

What the Code says concerning dignitaries is to be understood of such as do not by right belong to the chapter according to its constitution; for instance, the vicar-general as such is not counted to be of the chapter in many cathedral chapters. But this depends upon the statutes.

DUTIES OF CANONS

CAN. 412

§ 1. Canonici sive ecclesiae cathedralis sive collegialis Episcopo solemniter Missam celebranti aut alia pontificalia exercenti, etiam in aliis ecclesiis civitatis aut suburbii, ab eodem invitati, assistere et inservire debent, dummodo iudicio Episcopi sufficiens canonicorum et ministrorum in ecclesia numerus maneat: et eundem accedentem ad ecclesiam cathedralem et redeuntem comitari ad normam Caeremonialis Episcoporum.

§ 2. Epicopus potest duos e Capitulo sive cathedrali sive collegiali assumere ac retinere ut sibi in ecclesiastico ministerio ac dioecesis servitio assistant.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 413

§ 1. Quodlibet Capitulum obligatione tenetur quotidie divina officia in choro rite persolvendi, salvis fundationis legibus.

§ 2. Divinum officium comprehendit psalmodiam horarum canonicarum et celebrationem cum cantu Missae conventualis, praeter alias Missas vel secundum rubricas Missalis vel ex piis fundationibus celebrandas.

§ 3. Missam conventualem sine cantu celebrare licet hebdomadario, cum in ecclesia, pontificali ritu, Episcopus vel alius loco Episcopi celebrat.

CAN. 414

Omnes et singuli qui chorale beneficium obtinent, tenentur in ipso choro divina officia persolvere singulis diebus, nisi servitium per turnum a Sede Apostolica aut fundationis legibus fuerit indultum.

CAN. 415

§ 1. Si ecclesia cathedralis aut collegialis simul sit paroecialis, relationes iuridicae inter Capitulum et parochum reguntur normis quae sequuntur, nisi aliud ferat aut Sedis Apostolicae indultum aut particularis conventio in erectione paroeciae inita et a loci Ordinario legitime probata.

§ 2. Ad parochum spectat:

1.° Applicare Missam pro populo et, debito tempore, praedicare ac christianam doctrinam fideles edocere;

2.° Custodire libros paroeciales et ex iis attestationes extrahere;

3.° Functiones paroeciales peragere de quibus in can.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

462. Iusta funebria, in ecclesia ad normam iuris peragenda, non exclusa Missa exsequiali, persolvere ad Capitulum pertinet tantum in casu quo de funere agatur alicuius dignitatis, vel canonici, etiam honorarii tantum, vel beneficiarii;

4.° Alias functiones non stricte paroeciales peragere quae in paroeciis fieri solent, modo non impediatur chorale servitium, nec Capitulum easdem functiones peragat;

5.° Eleemosynas in bonum paroecianorum colligere, easdem directe vel indirecte oblatas recipere, administrare et secundum offerentium voluntatem distribuere.

§ 3. Ad Capitulum spectat:

1.° Custodire sanctissimum Eucharistiae Sacramentum; sed altera sacri ciborii clavis apud parochum servari debet;

2.° Invigilare ut in functionibus a parocho in capitulari ecclesia peragendis leges liturgicae observentur;

3.° Ecclesiae curam habere eiusque bona administrare cum piis legatis.

§ 4. Nec parochus capitulares nec Capitulum paroeciales functiones et munera impediat; exorto autem conflictu, quaestionem dirimat loci Ordinarius, qui in primis curare debet ut catechetica instructio et Evangelii explicatio hora fidelibus commodiore semper habeatur.

§ 5. Non solum Capitulum impedire nequit parochum in exercenda paroeciali cura, sed insuper sciant capitulares se ex caritate teneri, maxime si designati coadiutores desint, eidem adiutricem operam navare, secundum modum ab Ordinario loci determinandum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 416

In statutis capitularibus iusta designetur norma, ad quam canonici et beneficiarii in servitio altaris fungantur per turnum tum officio celebrantis tum etiam ministerio diaconi ac subdiaconi, exclusis tamen ab hoc ministerio dignitatibus, canonico theologo, poenitentiario et, si praebendae distinctae habeantur, canonicis ordinis presbyteralis.

The canons of a cathedral or collegiate chapter, if invited, are obliged to assist and serve the bishop at the celebration of pontifical High Mass or other pontifical functions in other churches of the city or its suburbs, provided that a sufficient number of canons and ministers, according to the bishop's judgment, is left at the cathedral or collegiate church. Besides, they must accompany the bishop on his way to and from the cathedral according to the Caeremoniale Episcoporum.[33]

The bishop is entitled to assume and retain two members of either the cathedral or collegiate chapter to assist him in the ecclesiastical ministry and diocesan service.

Every chapter is bound to recite the divine office daily and properly in the choir, with due regard to the laws of foundation.

The divine service comprises the singing of the canonical hours and the celebration of a conventual high mass, besides other masses to be celebrated according to the rubrics of the Missal or the laws of foundation.

A low Mass may be celebrated as conventual mass by the hebdomadarian, if the bishop, or another bishop in his place, sings a pontifical Mass in the church.

33 Cfr. the decisions of the S. C. Conc., in Richter, Trid., p. 354 f. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 266 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

All who hold a choir benefice are bound to perform the divine service in the choir every day, unless the Apostolic See or the law of foundation allows the service to be performed per turnum (by turns).

Choir service means, of course, not only personal presence, but active coöperation in the recitation and singing. This has been expressly decided by the S. C. Concilii on various occasions.[34] Hither also belongs some knowledge of the Gregorian Chant.[35]

If the cathedral or collegiate church serves as parish church, the following rules must be observed. (Exceptions are admitted only if an Apostolic indult has been obtained to that effect, or an agreement lawfully approved by the Ordinary entered upon at the time the parish was erected). The rules are:

The parish priest has the following obligations:

(1) To apply the Mass for the people and to preach and teach catechism at the times prescribed;

(2) To keep the parochial books and take from them the attestations required;

(3) To perform the funeral services (cfr. can. 462); the chapter may hold funeral services, Mass not excluded, only for a dignitary, a canon, an honorary canon, or a beneficiary;

(4) To perform such other functions as are usually held in parish churches, provided, however, that the choir services do not interfere, or that the chapter perform the same;

(5) To collect alms for the good of the parishioners and accept such as are either directly or indirectly of-

34 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 3, 8; XIII, 9, 11; Instit. Eccl., 107, § 3.

35 "Ipsi tenentur ex vi sui muneris addiscere cantum quem vocamus Gregorianum." (Thus Garzia et Pignatelli) Bouix, l. c., p. 323.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fered, to administer and distribute them according to the donor's intention.

The chapter on its part is bound:

(1) To take care of the Blessed Sacrament, but leave one key with the parish priest;

(2) To see to it that the liturgical rules are observed by the parish priest in the performance of all functions in the chapter church;

(3) To take care of the church and administer its possessions and legacies.

The parish priest shall not interfere with the functions of the chapter, nor the chapter with the parochial functions. Should a conflict arise, the Ordinary should settle the question. He shall also take special care that catechetical instructions and gospel explanations be given at an hour most convenient for the faithful.

Not only should the chapter not interfere with the parish priest in the exercise of his parochial duties, but the capitulars should also remember that charity obliges them to lend a helping hand to the parish priest, according to the ways and means established by the Ordinary, especially if no sufficient number of assistants is available.

The chapter statutes should prescribe a just rule, according to which the canons and beneficiaries shall take turns in serving at the altar, either as celebrants, or as deacons and subdeacons; but the dignitaries, the canon theologian and the canon penitentiary, as also the canon priest, if there are distinct prebends, should not act as deacons and subdeacons.

CAN. 417

§ 1. Missa conventualis applicanda est pro benefactoribus in genere.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Capitularis infirmitate detentus non tenetur eleemosynam praebere sacerdoti capitulari, qui ipsius vicem supplet in Missae conventualis celebratione et applicatione, nisi statuta capitularia vel particularis consuetudo aliud ferant.

§ 3. Servari potest consuetudo praebendi stipem celebranti vel ex cumulo distributionum vel ex reditibus omnium praebendarum per contributum.

The conventual Mass must be applied for the benefactors in general.

A capitular prevented by illness is not obliged to offer a stipend for the Mass celebrated and applied by another capitular in his stead, unless the statutes of the chapter or a particular custom so prescribe.

The custom of offering a stipend to the celebrant either from the distributions or from the contributions accruing out of all the prebends, may be retained.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES OF CANONS

CAN. 418

§ 1. Reprobata contraria consuetudine, canonici ac beneficiarii quotidiano choro adstricti, possunt singuli abesse tres tantum menses in anno, sive continuos sive intermissos, dummodo propriae ecclesiae statuta aut legitima consuetudo servitium diuturnius non requirant.

§ 2. Sine causa legitima et speciali Episcopi licentia nec feriari licet Quadragesimae et Adventus tempore, aut in praecipuis anni sollemnitatibus de quibus in can. 338, § 3; nec permittitur uno eodemque tempore capitulares ultra tertiam partem abesse.

§ 3. Tempore vacationum omne genus distributio-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google nes amittuntur, non obstante remissione ab aliis capitularibus facta; sed percipiuntur praebendae proventus aut duae tertiae distributionum partes, si omnes praebendae proventus in distributionibus consistant.

CAN. 419

§ 1. In ecclesiis in quibus non omnes simul choro intersunt, qui ad eum adstringuntur nequeunt per alium huic obligationi satisfacere, nisi in casibus particularibus, iusta ac rationabili de causa, et modo substitutus eodem tempore servitio chori non sit adstrictus, et sit in eadem ecclesia canonicus, si agatur de supplenda vice canonici, beneficiarius, si de beneficiarii; qui vero ad chorum non adstringuntur, obligatione residendi in loco beneficii non tenentur per dies quibus a choro absunt.

§ 2. Si quis eodem die urgeatur onere utriusque Missae et pro populo et conventuali, hanc ipse celebret applicetque per se, illam per alium vel per se die sequenti.

CAN. 420

§ 1. Ita excusantur a choro ut percipiant fructus praebendae ac distributiones quotidianas:

1.° Capitulares iubilati ad normam can. 422, § 2;

2.° Canonicus theologus singulis diebus quibus suo munere fungitur;

3.° Canonicus poenitentiarius dum tempore chori vacat confessionibus audiendis;

4.° Vicarius paroecialis aliusve e Capitulo sive parochus sive coadiutor ab Episcopo deputatus, dum paroecialibus vacat officiis;

5.° Qui infirmitate aliove physico impedimento choro prohibentur assistere;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6.° Qui pontificia legatione alibi funguntur aut personae Romani Pontificis actu inserviunt;

7.° Qui piis exercitiis vacant ad normam can. 126; quo tamen indulto semel tantum in anno chori servitio liberantur;

8.° Accedentes una cum Episcopo aut eiusdem vice ad visitanda Limina Apostolorum;

9.° Qui ab Episcopo vel Capitulo mittuntur ad Concilium Oecumenicum, plenarium, provinciale aut ad Synodum dioecesanam;

10.° Qui de Capituli consensu, non contradicente Episcopo, absunt a choro ob Capituli seu propriae ecclesiae utilitatem;

11.° Qui Episcopo sacra peragenti assistunt ad normam can. 412, § 1;

12.° Qui Episcopum comitantur in visitatione dioecesis vel visitationem ipsam eius nomine et mandato peragunt;

13.° Qui operam navant conficiendis processibus in causis de quibus in can. 1999 seqq., vel uti testes in his causis vocati sunt, pro diebus et horis quibus hoc officium praestant;

14.° Parochi consultores, examinatores et iudices synodales, dum proprio munere funguntur.

§ 2. Distributiones vero quae inter praesentes dicuntur, ii tantum percipiunt, qui in § 1, nn. 7, 11, 13, enumerantur, nisi obstet fundatorum expressa voluntas.

CAN. 421

§ 1. Excusantur a choro, sed percipiunt praebendae fructus dumtaxat, non autem distributiones:

1.° Qui de licentia Ordinarii loci publice docent in scholis ab Ecclesia recognitis sacram theologiam aut

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ius canonicum;

2.° Dantes operam studio sacrae theologiae aut iuris canonici in publicis scholis ab Ecclesia probatis, de Ordinarii licentia;

3.° Vicarius Capitularis, Vicarius Generalis, officialis ac cancellarius, si de gremio sint, dum suis muneribus vacant;

4.° Canonici qui Episcopo inserviunt ad normam can. 412, § 2.

§ 2. Quod si omnes praebendae fructus consistant in distributionibus, vel adeo sint tenues ut tertiam distributionum partem non attingant, tunc memorati omnes duas tantum tertias partes distributionum lucrantur, cumulatas ex fructibus praebendae ac distributionibus.

CAN. 422

§ 1. Praebenda fruentes ab Apostolica tantum Sede impetrare possunt indultum emeriti seu, ut aiunt, iubilationis post continuum et laudabile quadraginta annorum in eadem vel distinctis ecclesiis eiusdem civitatis vel saltem dioecesis chori servitium.

§ 2. Iubilatus, etiamsi in loco beneficii non resideat, percipit tum fructus praebendae tum distributiones etiam inter praesentes, nisi obstent expressa fundatorum vel oblatorum voluntas, ecclesiae statuta aut consuetudo.

§ 3. Ius optandi, si ex lege fundationis competat, non est capitulari iubilato.

Canons and beneficiaries who are obliged to choir service may take a three months' vacation every year, either at once, or with interruptions, unless the statutes of their church or legitimate custom require a more protracted

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google service, every other custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

Without a lawful reason and the special permission of the bishop, no holidays are allowed during Lent and Advent and on the principal feastdays of the year (can. 338, § 3); neither are more than one-third of the chapter members permitted to be absent at one time.

During vacation all distributions are lost, notwithstanding any remittance (condonation) made by the other capitulars; but the income from the prebends or two-thirds of the distributions, if the whole salary consists in such, is to be granted.

In churches which do not require the attendance of all the capitulars at the same time, those who would be obliged to assist are not allowed to send a substitute, except in particular cases and for a legitimate and reasonable cause. The substitute must not be one who is himself at the same time obliged to choir service; he must not be a canon of the same church if he takes the place of a canon, or a beneficiary of the same church if he supplies a beneficiary.[86]

If one is under obligation of saying two Masses on the same day, one for the people and the other as conventual Mass, he shall himself celebrate and apply the conventual Mass, and say the Mass for the people on the following day, or he may engage a substitute to apply it for him (of course, we suppose, by giving him a stipend).

Although receiving the income from their prebend and the daily distributions, the following are excused from choir service:

(1) The capitulars who are jubilarians (cf. can. 422, § 2);

86 Cf. Trid., Sess. 24, c. 12, de ref. and the decisions in Richter, Trid., p. 359; Bouix, l. c., p. 326 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(2) The canon theologian on the days when he performs his special office;

(3) The canon penitentiary if he hears confessions during choir service;

(4) The parish priest, or any member of the chapter appointed by the bishop as parish priest or assistant, while occupied in parochial duties;

(5) Those who are prevented from attending choir by sickness or any other physical obstacle;

(6) Those who act as papal legates or are in the personal service of the Roman Pontiff;

(7) Those who are in retreat (can. 126), for which reason, however, they are excused only once a year;

(8) Those who visit with the bishop, or in his place, the sacra limina (Rome);

(9) Those who are sent by the bishop or chapter to a general, plenary, or provincial council, or to a diocesan synod;

(10) Those who are absent from choir with the consent of the chapter, without the bishop objecting to it, for the utility of their chapter or church;

(11) Those who assist the bishop when pontificating (can. 412);

(12) Those who accompany the bishop on a diocesan visitation or make such visitation in his name and by his mandate;

(13) Those who are employed in the lawsuits mentioned in can. 1999 ff., or on the witness-stand, but only while actually so employed;

(14) The parish priests who are consultors, as well as examiners and synodal judges, whilst occupied in their office.

However, the distributions, which are strictly reserved

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to those present, can be gained only by those mentioned under nn. 1, 7, 11, 13, unless the will of the founders contains a contrary clause.

The following are excused from choir service, and receive only the salary of the prebend, but no share in the distributions:

(1) Those who, with the permission of the Ordinary, teach dogmatic or moral theology (scripture, church history) or canon law in a Catholic school;

(2) Those who study any of these sciences in a school recognized by the Church, with the permission of the Ordinary;

(3) The vicar-capitular, the vicar-general, the officialis, and the chancellor, if they belong to the chapter, whilst occupied in their office;

(4) The canons serving the bishop.

If the whole income of a prebend consists of the distributions, or if it is so small that it would not amount to the third part of the distributions, then the aforesaid (§ I, 1–4) clergymen receive two-thirds of the distributions which are accumulated from the revenues of prebends and distributions.

Prebendaries can obtain the indult of iubilatio from the Apostolic See after a continuous and praiseworthy choir service of forty years either in the same church, or in different churches of the same city, or, at least, of the same diocese.

A jubilarian, although not residing at the place where his benefice requires him to reside, receives the whole income as well as the daily distributions, even those otherwise given only to attendants in choir, unless the express law of foundation, or the will of the founder, or the statutes, or a custom of the chapter, prohibit this.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The right of optioning, although permissible by the law of foundation, cannot be claimed by a jubilarian.[87]

87 Cf. Richter, Trid., p. 360 ff. Benedict XIV, De Synod. Dioec., XIII, 9, 15. Formerly iubilatio was merely a custom, for no law existed about it.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER VI

DIOCESAN CONSULTORS

It must be gratifying to the church in the U. S. to see embodied in the new Code an institution which the Plenary Councils of Baltimore introduced. The Fathers of these councils realized, on the one hand, that — not to speak of the penuria sacerdotum — the ecclesiastical funds were not in a condition to permit the establishment of regular chapters, and, on the other hand, many of the bishops were overburdened with work. Hence the appeal of the II Plenary Council for helpers and counsellors on whom the bishops might unload a part of their burden.[1] In establishing diocesan boards of consultors, they followed the custom of other dioceses in similar condition, and, not improbably, the acts of the Council of Lebanon[2] offered an example. The new Code in a special chapter treats of these diocesan consultors, whose existence, of course, is the result of peculiar conditions.

CAN. 423

In quibus dioecesibus nondum constitui potuit restituive cathedrale canonicorum Capitulum, instituantur ab Episcopo, salvis peculiaribus Apostolicae Sedis praescriptis, consultores dioecesani, hoc est sacerdotes pietate, moribus, doctrina ac prudentia commendati.

1 Cfr. Concilii Plenarii Baltimorensis II. Acta et Decreta, Baltimore 1868, p. 53 f.

2 Printed in Rome, 1820.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 424

Consultores nominat Episcopus, firmo praescripto can. 426.

CAN. 425

§ 1. Consultores dioecesani numero sint saltem sex; in dioecesibus ubi pauci sint sacerdotes, saltem quatuor; iidemque omnes in civitate episcopali vel in locis vicinioribus commorentur.

§ 2. Antequam munus huiusmodi suscipiant, iusiurandum interponant de officio fideliter exsequendo sine ulla acceptione personarum.

CAN. 426

§ 1. Officium consultorum est ad triennium.

§ 2. Exacto triennio, Episcopus vel alios in eorum locum substituat, vel eosdem ad aliud triennium confirmet, quod idem servetur singulis trienniis.

§ 3. Deficiente, quavis de causa, aliquo consultore intra triennium, Episcopus alium de consilio ceterorum consultorum substituat, isque in officio maneat usque ad expletum idem triennium.

§ 4. Cum vero triennium excidisse contigerit vacante sede episcopali, consultores in officio maneant usque ad accessum novi Episcopi, qui intra sex menses ab inita possessione providere debet ad normam huius canonis.

§ 5. Si, sede vacante, aliquis consultor moriatur vel renuntiet, Vicarius Capitularis, de consensu aliorum consultorum, alium nominet, qui tamen, ut munere, sede plena, fungatur, indiget novi Episcopi confirmatione.

CAN. 427

Coetus consultorum dioecesanorum vices Capituli

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cathedralis, qua Episcopi senatus, supplet; quare quae canones ad gubernationem dioecesis, sive sede plena sive ea impedita aut vacante, Capitulo cathedrali tribuunt, ea de coetu quoque consultorum dioecesanorum intelligenda sunt.

CAN. 428

Durante munere, consultores ne removeantur, nisi ob iustam causam ac de consilio ceterorum consultorum.

APPOINTMENT OF CONSULTORS

Where a cathedral chapter cannot as yet be either established or restored, the bishop shall appoint diocesan consultors. These consultors shall be priests distinguished by piety, exemplary life, learning, and prudence.

The appointment of consultors belongs to the bishop, who, however, must observe the special regulations of the Apostolic See (salvis peculiaribus Apostolicae Sedis praescriptis) and the rules laid down in can. 426.

As we said above, the institution of diocesan consultors, though now formally approved by the Holy See, is the result of peculiar circumstances. The rule was and is that a regular cathedral chapter should surround the episcopal office and dignity. In the U. S. this cannot as yet be achieved, and in Great Britain, where chapters once flourished, they have not yet, so far as we are aware, been restored to their former condition, although the hierarchy was reëstablished Sept. 29, 1850, and canons are constituted as corporated bodies.

What the "peculiar regulations of the Apostolic See" are, is not expressly stated. Perhaps the reference is to a conference held in Rome in 1883, for the introduction of cathedral chapters according to the English fashion. The Cardinals of the Propaganda, however, recognized the present system of consultors.[3] But the Holy See reserves the right of changing the present boards of consultors into, say, a corporation or quasi-chapter with corporate rights. In that case, however, it will be natural to expect also a change of episcopal election or nomination, from which the consultors are now practically excluded.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

QUALITIES AND OBLIGATIONS

The qualities required in the consultors are almost verbally restated from the enactments of the second and third Plenary Councils of Baltimore.[4] These presupposed, the bishop, as long as Rome does not change the present laws, may freely name his consultors, and in doing so is not bound by the advice or consent of the counsellors, but need observe only what the Code demands in Can. 426.

There shall be at least six diocesan consultors, but four will suffice if the number of priests in the diocese is small. They should all live in the episcopal city, or near by.

Before they enter upon their office they must take an oath to discharge their duties faithfully without fear or favor. In large and populous dioceses the number of consultors may be more than six, for the canon says, "at least" six. But it can never be less than four, no matter how small the diocese may be. Therefore the rule of the III Council of Baltimore that there should be at least two,[5] must be corrected.

A leaning towards cathedral chapters is perceptible in

3 Cfr. Smith, Elements, I, p. 466.

4 Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. II., p. 53; Conc. Balti. III., tit. II, c. 2, n. 18, p. 14 f.

5 Balt. III., l. c. Besides, this council (n. 19) ruled that one-half of the number should be chosen upon the nomination of the clergy, but this clause is now void.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the injunction that the consultors should live in or near the episcopal city. The reason is not far to seek. Forming as they do the senate of the bishop, who has to call them to meetings, they must be near at hand. Living at a distance would interfere with a prompt answer to his call.

Before whom the consultors appointed have to take oath is not explicitly stated in this canon. However, taking into consideration the obligation of making the profession of faith before the ordinary or his delegate, and at the same time before the other consultors,[6] it seems proper that the oath of office should be taken into the hands of the bishop or his substitute ad hoc; and if the profession of faith is made at the same time, the other consultors must also be present. To take the oath by proxy is neither permitted nor valid.[7]

The office of consultor lasts three years. After the expiration of that term, the bishop may replace a consultor, or leave him in office, according to his good pleasure.

If a consultor, for any reason, goes out of office during his term, the bishop, with the advice of the other consultors, shall appoint in his place another priest, who will remain in office until the three years have expired.

If the three years expire when the episcopal see is vacant, the consultors of the last term remain in office until the arrival of the new bishop, who must make provision for a new board of consultors within six months from the date of taking possession of his see.

Should a consultor die or resign during a vacancy in the episcopal see, the vicar-capitular or administrator, with the consent of the other consultors, shall name an-

6 Cfr. can. 1406, § 1, 6°.

7 Cfr. can. 1316, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other, who must, however, have the approval of the n bishop (after being installed) in order to act as consult

The text is so plain as not to require any commer Attention may be drawn to the difference between t bishop and the vicar-capitular. The latter needs t consent of the consultors, while the former need on ask their advice. Consultors are free to resign, thoug they should not do so without a solid reason.

Can. 427 defines, in a general way, the functions of th diocesan consultors, for the body (coetus) of the dio cesan consultors, as the bishop's senate, takes the plac of the cathedral chapter, and hence whatever the canon attribute to the cathedral chapter in relation to the gov ernment of the diocese, either with the bishop or during a vacancy of the see, also applies to the diocesan consultors as a body.

Note the term "coetus consultorum," which we rendered by "the consultors as a body." Coetus is a wider term than societas, collegium, or corpus. These mean a juridical person, or at least a compact society, while coetus means any assembly or gathering.[8] Hence, though the consultors form a body or unit, they are not a chapter in the canonical sense. Still, since coetus also signifies united work and a gathering of persons into a body, it follows that the consultors must be called together whenever their advice or consent is required.[9] This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that the consultors take the place of the cathedral chapter, not of the single canons. For this reason, too, be it said in passing, consultors do not enjoy the privileges and insignia of canons. But their functions are not therefore unimportant. They form the senate of the bishop, who must in 8 Cfr. l. 2, Dig., 47, 11: "Coetus sub praetextu religionis"; l. 5, Dig., 48, 6.

9 Cfr. can. 105.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google certain instances ask their advice, and in other, more important affairs,[10] is bound by their consent, given in a body, as shall appear later.

Their functions during a vacancy or quasi-vacancy of the episcopal see are dealt with in the next chapter.

The consultors in the U. S. are not yet entitled to elect the administrator.[11]

Canon 428 rules that no consultor should be removed during his term of office without just reason and without the advice of the other consultors.

This law is taken almost verbally from the Third Council of Baltimore,[12] which enumerates some legitimate causes of removal, viz.: if a consultor, by reason of age or sickness, is unable to fulfill his duty, or if he has committed a crime that renders him unworthy of his office, or if his reputation has suffered considerably through his own fault. In such cases, therefore, the bishop may remove a consultor after having asked the advice of the other consultors. This means that no trial, not even a summary one in the strict sense of the term, is required; but the bishop is not on that account excused from the moral duty of at least making an investigation into the charges brought against a consultor.

10 Cfr., for instance, can. 1532, § 3 (alienation).

11 Cfr. can. 431, § 2; hence we cannot agree with the Eccles. Rev., Vol. 57, p. 367 (Oct. 1917).

12 Acta et Decreta, 1886, n. 21, p. 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VII

QUASI-VACANCY AND VACANCY OF THE EPISCOPAL SEE — THE VICAR-CAPITULAR

We use the term "quasi-vacancy" for "sedes impedita." The Decretals provide for the case of an episcopal see becoming vacant by the captivity of its occupant by "pagans or schismatics." Boniface VIII decreed that under such circumstances not the archbishop or metropolitan but the chapter should govern the diocese in spiritual and temporal affairs, "as if the see were vacant," and as soon as possible refer the matter to the Holy See.[1] This decretal was cited by the chapter of Cologne, in 1837, to justify their somewhat irregular election of a vicar-capitular against the will of the imprisoned Archbishop Clement August and the Holy See. The Cologne affair had no analogy with the captivity of a medieval bishop by pagans or schismatics, but was an act of sheer violence, perpetrated by the Prussian government without law or legal procedure, and it was branded as it deserved by Pope Gregory XVI.[2] Twenty-four years later Pius IX protested against the unlawful elections of vicars-capitular in the Kingdom of Naples and declared them null and void. The electors were declared to have incurred ecclesiastical censure and the elected vicar-capitulars were suspended and deprived of their benefices (May 3rd, 1862). The respective decree of S. C. EE. et RR. was extended to all dioceses where 1 Can. 3, 6°, I, 8 de supplenda negligentia.

2 Brevia Greg. XVI, Dec. 26, 1837; May 9, 1838; Allocutio, Sept. 13, 1838. Cfr. Brück, Gesch. d. Kath. Kirche in Deutschland im XIX. Jahrh., 1889, Vol. II, p. 329 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

such disorderly elections would take place.[3] This action by the Holy See was simply a defence of the freedom of the Church and of the rights of an unlawfully imprisoned prelate, who was still able to communicate with his diocese, although with great difficulty.

For the Vatican Council[4] a sketch had been prepared to throw light on the terms "sede vacante" and "sede impedita," which had up to that time been variously interpreted by canonists. The schema maintained that the see is vacant only if the bishop is really in captivity, but merely impedita in case of deportation or exile, and that in the latter case the vicar-general or any one assigned by the bishop should govern the diocese. This meant that the decretal of Boniface VIII cannot be applied to a sedes impedita.[5] We shall now see that the Code does not entirely reject either of the two opinions which were discussed at the Council, but tries to reconcile both.[6]

3 Bizzarri, Coll. S. C. EE. et RR., 1885, p. 153 f.

4 Cfr. Granderath-Kirch, Geschichte des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, II, 162.

5 Cfr. the schema as to the point at issue, ib. p. 163, which reads: "Ab hypothesi Sedis vacantis longe differre visa est hypothesis Sedis per Episcopi captivitatem vel relegationem aut exilium impeditae. Prae oculis habita fuit celeberrima Bonifacii VIII. Decretalis 'Si Episcopus a paganis' (cap. 3, De suppl. neglig. in VI°), qua decernitur in casu Episcopi capti ab infidelibus vel schismaticis Capitulum administrare ac si Sedes per mortem vacaret. Prae oculis habitae fuerunt discrepantes DD. opiniones, aliis illud idem applicantibus cuicunque casui Sedis simili modo impeditae, aliis illud ad solum praedictum casum restringentibus; quorum praeterea non pauci sentiunt, ipsi etiam Decretali Bonifacii VIII. locum non esse, ubi existit Generalis Episcopi Vicarius. Prae oculis demum habitae fuerunt ingentes difficultates et maxima pericula, quae hac in re contigerunt recentioribus temporibus praesertim in Germania, Hispania et Regno utriusque Siciliae. Quidquid autem de iure constituto sit existimandum, de iure saltem constituendo id visum est omnino decernendum, quod in proposito Decreto continetur. Capitulorum ausibus obstaculum ita ponitur; et praxi Ecclesiae conformis ea solutio est, ut liquet ex gestis anno 1838 occasione captivitatis Archiepiscopi Coloniensis et ex Decreto S. Congr. Ep. et Reg., 3 Maii, 1862, ad nonnulla Capitula Siciliae a SS. D. N. Pio IX. approbato." C. V. 654 b.

6 Cfr. can. 285.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 429

§ 1. Sede per Episcopi captivitatem, relegationem, exsilium, aut inhabilitatem ita impedita, ut ne per litteras quidem cum dioecesanis communicare ipse possit, dioecesis regimen, nisi Sancta Sedes aliter providerit, penes Episcopi Vicarium Generalem vel alium virum ecclesiasticum ab Episcopo delegatum esto.

§ 2. Potest in casu Epsicopus, gravi de causa, plures delegare, qui sibi invicem in munere succedant.

§ 3. His deficientibus, vel, uti supra dictum est, impeditis, Capitulum ecclesiae cathedralis suum Vicarium constituat, qui regimen assumat cum potestate Vicarii Capitularis.

§ 4. Qui dioecesim regendam, ut supra, suscepit, quamprimum Sanctam Sedem moneat de sede impedita ac de assumpto munere.

§ 5. Si Episcopus in excommunicationem, interdictum vel suspensionem inciderit, Metropolita, eoque deficiente, vel, si de eodem agatur, antiquior inter Suffraganeos ad Sedem Apostolicam illico recurrat, ut ipsa provideat; quod si de dioecesi agatur vel praelatura de quibus in can. 285, Metropolita qui fuit legitime electus, obligatione recurrendi tenetur.

This is the canon treating of the sedes impedita or quasi-vacancy, and it affords a splendid example of how the old has been combined with the new law. The ancient law [7] spoke only of captivity brought about by pagans and schismatics, but the new law uses four terms to comprise the state of "sedes impedita." They are: captivity, relegation, exile, incapacity or inability. The first three words signify substantially the same,[8] to wit: practical absence from the episcopal see, brought about either by force or by an act of the civil power, be it in war or peace. Inhabilitas is the physical or mental inability of the bishop, without any one's fault or coöperation. Such cases are mentioned in the Decree of Gratian; in one case the bishop suffered from severe headaches, in another, he was afflicted with an ailment not further specified. In both cases the popes, Gregory I and Nicholas I, decided that no successor should be elected but the priests and neighboring bishops should assist the infirm bishop.[9] That mental infirmity falls in the same category goes without saying.[10] Under such circumstances, therefore, the government of the diocese is put into the hands of the vicar-general, as the Schema Concilii Vaticani postulated, or the bishop, passing over the vicar-general, may appoint another ecclesiastic, or several to whom the government is entrusted.

7 Cfr. c. 3, 6°, I, 8, and above. 8 In Webster's Dictionary we

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This provision bridges the difference of opinion raised at the Vatican Council. For the new law, differing from the Schema, permits the election of a vicar-capitular, if the vicar-general and the appointment of episcopal legates is impracticable. In such a case the chapter, as will be seen, shall elect a vicar-capitular.[11] But whoever holds the government ad interim must report to Rome (to the S. C. Consist., or the Secretary of State, or the S. C. of Extraordinary Affairs).

The last paragraph treats of another case which may cause a see to be impedita, viz., the censure of the bishop (treated infra, Book IV). If a bishop is placed under censure, the Metropolitan is not allowed to interfere could not perceive an adequate distinction between relegation and exile.

9 Cfr. cc. 1, 4, C. 7, q. 1.

10 Reiffenstuel I, 10, n. 35 ff.

11 The S. C. C., Aug. 7, 1683 (Richter, Trid., p. 370) decided that if communication with the captured bishop was possible, his jurisdiction did not devolve on the chapter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

either with him or his vicar-general, nor is he called upon to appoint a vicar-capitular, because the old law [12] forbade such interference, and the new law does not abolish the old. But the Metropolitan is obliged in virtue of his office to inform the Holy See. If the Metropolitan is censured, the senior suffragan must make the report. If the prelate who is censured is immediately subject to the Holy See, the Metropolitan who has been chosen by the respective Prelate "semel pro semper," is obliged to have immediate recourse to Rome. In the meantime the vicar-general cannot continue to exercise his jurisdiction, because his power is suspended during the suspension of the bishop (can. 371). Hence, in such a case, the regular business of the episcopal curia will cease until Rome makes provision, which now-a-days, by reason of swift communication, can, as a rule, be done promptly. If any jurisdictional act should meanwhile be performed, which would give rise to a general error, the validity of such an act could not be doubted.

VACANCY PROPER

CAN. 430

§ 1. Sedes episcopalis vacat Episcopi morte, renuntiatione a Romano Pontifice acceptata, translatione ac privatione Episcopo intimata.

§ 2. Nihilominus, excepta collatione beneficiorum aut officiorum ecclesiasticorum, omnia vim habent quae gesta sunt a Vicario Generali, usque dum hic certam de obitu Episcopi notitiam acceperit, vel ab Episcopo

12 Cfr. c. 1, 6° I, 8, de negligentia supplenda. The reason why the Metropolitan is not allowed to draw the jurisdiction to himself lies in the danger of detriment accruing to the bishop and his subjects. Reiffenstuel, I, 10, 36 also mentions the expedient of recourse.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

aut Vicario Generali, usque dum certa de memoratis actibus pontificiis notitia ad eosdem pervenerit.

§ 3. A certa translationis notitia Episcopus intra quatuor menses debet dioecesim ad quam petere eiusdemque canonicam possessionem assumere ad normam can. 333, 334 et a die captae possessionis dioecesis a qua plene vacat; interim vero in eadem Episcopus:

1.° Vicarii Capitularis potestatem obtinet eisdemque obligationibus tenetur, cessante qualibet Vicarii Generalis potestate;

2.° Honorifica Episcoporum residentialium privilegia conservat;

3.° Integros percipit fructus mensae episcopalis ad normam can. 194, § 2.

The episcopal see becomes vacant by the death of the bishop, by his resignation as soon as accepted by the Roman Pontiff, or by his transfer and privation.

Nevertheless, with the exception of conferring ecclesiastical benefices or offices, all the official acts of the vicar-general are valid until he has received sure notice of the death of his bishop. Valid are also the acts of the bishop himself or of his vicar-general so long as they have not been duly notified of the vacancy.

Four months from the date of the notice of his transfer, the bishop must repair to the diocese to which he is transferred and take possession of it. From the date of his taking possession of the new diocese, his former see is fully vacant. Meanwhile, from the date of notice to that of his taking possession, the bishop

(1) enjoys the whole power of a vicar-capitular in the old diocese, while the power of the vicar-general ceases;

(2) retains all the honorary privileges of resident bishops, and

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(3) is entitled to all the episcopal revenues.

The four modes by which an episcopal see may become vacant are evidently taken taxative, as none other is imaginable.

In order to safeguard the validity of official acts, the second paragraph provides that the notice must be certa. First as to the case of death. If the bishop dies within the diocese, there will hardly be any difficulty. The vicar-general may receive the death notice a day or two after the bishop has expired.[13] But this matters little. More important is the manner in which the notice is given. This must be certain or sure. Certainty, we know, may be either physical or moral, according as it is derived from the bodily senses or based on reasons which leave no room for reasonable doubt. Besides, there is juridical certainty, obtained by means prescribed in law; for instance, peremptory admonition, official summons, or a document. The last-named kind of certainty is not required for the death notice of a bishop, because the text demands only certain notice, and "one who is already certain need not be further informed."[14] Moreover, the case does not fall under any heading of law requiring juridical certainty. Hence if the vicar-general receives notice through trustworthy witnesses, or by letter from one who is in a position to know and willing to tell the truth, he may be said to have certainty. But he is not obliged to believe the newspapers, as they sometimes report people dead when they are still among the living. Of course, the surest way of notifying the vicar-general is through the episcopal chancery (with the diocesan, not episcopal, seal).

13 Mors (the physical separation of soul and body) omnia solvit, but there is also a civil death and canonical death (excommunication).

14 Regular juris 31 in 6°: "Eum qui certus est, certiorari ulterius non debet." Cfr. Reiffenstuel, Cap. II in reg. cit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After he has received certain notice of the death of the bishop the vicar-general's office ceases; in fact, it has ceased de facto and de iure from the moment of the bishop's death with regard to the conferring of ecclesiastical benefices and offices. What is the reason for this difference between the conferring of benefices and other official acts? For the former, the vicar-general needs a special mandate, which the bishop cannot impart after death. It may be asked whether a vicar-general can put into effect after the bishop's death a mandate received before that event. The answer is no, because a "mandatum ab homine" expires with the death of the mandans, even if the latter should have commenced the settlement of the affair in question (re non amplius integrâ).[15]

The terms transfer and privation have been explained above (can. 183). Transfers[16] of bishops were not unusual in the Middle Ages, even against the will of the prelates. The pope clearly has the right to transfer bishops from one see to another. As the appointment is adduced by human factors which depend finally on the Supreme Pastor, so a change must be considered possible and dependent on the same cause. The spiritual marriage (connubium spirituale) which is supposedly contracted between the bishop and his diocese, cannot be urged against this right. Mysticism in the law is dangerous and to stretch that mystic symbol would lead to absurdities. Moreover, the assumption that there is only a matrimonium ratum would suffice to vindicate the right of the Pope to solve it. Now-a-days, however, transfers, properly so-called, are generally made only with the consent of the one transferred and for reasons

15 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, I, 2, n, 46.

16 Cfr. title 7 in Decretals: de translatione episcopi.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of evident utility or necessity affecting either the person of the bishop or the diocese.[17]

The bishop who resigns must be duly informed of the acceptance of his resignation by the S. Cong. Consistorialis. The bishop who is transferred must be certain that the translation was made in public consistory, and the bishop deprived of his bishopric must be certain that that penalty was inflicted. Here again, therefore, the question of certainty arises. But here the certainty required must be limited to juridical knowledge; for the resignation must be accepted by the Pope, on whose will the acceptance depends. Transfer, too, depends on the same factor; and privation is a judiciary act which must be ascertained judicially. Hence in all these cases an official document, or at least official notice, is required. If the notice of acceptance, resignation or transfer is transmitted by telegraph or telephone, it must be done by persons acting in an official capacity, in other words, by the Secretariate of State.[18] Hence we believe our term (§ 3) "authentic notice" is a correct translation. The rest of the canon will be explained in connection with the office of vicar-general.

CAN. 431

§ 1. Sede vacante, nisi adfuerit Administrator Apostolicus vel aliter a Sancta Sede provisum fuerit, ad Capitulum ecclesiae cathedralis regimen dioecesis devolvitur.

§ 2. Sicubi ex speciali Sanctae Sedis dispositione Archiepiscopus aliusve Episcopus Administratorem dioecesis vacantis designet, hic omnes et solas facul-

17 Cfr. Aichner, § 96, 2; Smith, Elements, I, nn. 391 ff.

18 The Secretariate of State, in virtue of its diplomatic character, is guaranteed free communication.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tates habet quae Vicario Capitulari competunt, eisdem obligationibus ac poenis obnoxius.

The first paragraph of this canon, with the exception of the clause concerning the administrator Apostolic,[19] is a repetition of the old law,[20] which entrusted the chapter with the diocesan government.

The second paragraph applies to the U. S. Our second Plenary Council[21] provided "that if a vacancy occurs by the death of the bishop, an administrator appointed by the bishop before his death shall govern the diocese." Nothing to this effect is found in the Code, and hence it would not be safe to follow this conciliar enactment in future. But another regulation still holds good, namely, that the archbishop (metropolitan) or another, generally the senior suffragan, should designate an administrator for the vacant see. Our contention that bishops are no longer entitled to appoint their own administrators is based on the laws of interpretation. The legislator knew of the existence of a special provision for our country — otherwise mention thereof would not be made — and as he omits a part of the former disposition, he plainly wishes to see the same corrected. The term "aliusve episcopus" cannot be advanced against this interpretation, for the very position of the phrase clearly shows that this "other bishop" is no one else but the "senior suffragan" mentioned in n. 97 of the Second Baltimore Council. But even aside from this interpretation, which is merely declaratory, not extensive nor corrective, the right of the bishop to appoint 19 Cfr. cc. 312 ff.

20 Cfr. c. 3, 6°, I, 8, de supplenda neglig.; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 16 de ref.

21 Cfr. Acta et Decreta II. Conc. Plen. Balt., n. 96 f.; p. 67 f. Smith, Elements I, n. 638, Brief of Pius IX, Jan. 13, 1854.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

an administrator was prejudicial to the clergy in general and the diocesan consultors in particular, a setting aside of the common law of the Church in an important disciplinary matter. Hence the Fathers of the Second Baltimore Council were naturally more anxious about the faculties than about the administrator, who enters upon the scene, as it were, only after the "vir ecclesiasticus" has been endowed with the faculties. Now these faculties [22] are granted in our Code to the administrator only in so far as the vicar-capitular possesses them, and no farther; and the administrator, like the vicar-capitular, is bound by the same obligations and subject to the same penalties.

THE VICAR-CAPITULAR

CAN. 432

§ 1. Capitulum ecclesiae cathedralis, sede vacante, intra octo dies ab accepta notitia vacationis, debet Vicarium Capitularem qui loco sui dioecesim regat et, si fructuum percipiendorum ei munus incumbat, oeconomum unum vel plures fideles ac diligentes constituere.

§ 2. Si Capitulum intra praescriptum tempus Vicarium aut oeconomum, quavis de causa, nullum deputaverit, deputatio ad Metropolitam devolvitur; si autem ecclesia ipsa metropolitana fuerit vacans vel metropolitana simul et suffraganea, ad antiquiorem ex Episcopis suffraganeis.

§ 3. Etiam vacante dioecesi aut abbatia vel praelatura de quibus in can. 285, si Capitulum intra octiduum Vicarium vel oeconomum non nominaverit, hunc Metropolita qui fuit legitime electus ad normam citati canonis, constituat, nisi in abbatia vel praelatura nullius religiosa aliter ad normam constitutionum provideatur.

22 Cfr. can. 60 and Vol. I, p. 1111.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Capitulum quantocius de morte Episcopi et deinde electus in Vicarium Capitularem de sua electione Sedem Apostolicam certiorem faciant.

In case of a vacancy in the episcopal see, the cathedral chapter, within eight days from the date of notice received, must appoint a vicar-capitular, who shall govern the diocese in the place of said chapter. If the chapter also administers the revenues, it must appoint one or more trustworthy and industrious persons as administrators thereof (oeconomi).

Should the chapter, for any reason, neglect to designate a vicar-capitular or oeconomus within the prescribed time, the right of making this appointment devolves on the metropolitan; and if the vacant see is a metropolitan see, or if the metropolitan see is vacant simultaneously with a suffragan see, the right of appointment passes to the senior suffragan.

If a diocese immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff, or an abbatia or praelatura nullius (can. 285) becomes vacant, and the chapter fails to appoint a vicar-capitular or oeconomus within the stated time, the metropolitan "semel pro semper" chosen designates the said officials, unless (in the case of an abbacy or prelature of religious) the respective constitutions provide otherwise.

The chapter should as soon as possible inform the Apostolic See of the death of the bishop, and the vicar-capitular should notify the same Apostolic See of a new election as soon as made.

The first paragraph of this canon is taken from the Council of Trent, which commands that a vicar-capitular and oeconomi[28] ("qui rerum ecclesiasticarum et proventuum curam gerant") be chosen, "ubi fructuum per-

[28] Trid., Sess. 24, c. 16 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cipiendorum ei munus incumbit." This latter clause is verbally inserted in our Code, while the former is omitted, but is connected with the office of administrator.

"In the United States," says Smith,[24] "no such procurators or administrators of the temporalities of vacant dioceses are appointed. Vacant sees are usually governed, both in temporalibus and spiritualibus, by one and the same administrator." This opinion may even now be held and followed, but only conditionally, viz., as long as the diocesan consultors are not concerned with the "munus percipiendorum fructuum"; because the Tridentine as well as the new law speak conditionally ("si" or "ubi"). Hence as long as the bishop with the administrators who must henceforth be chosen,[25] takes care of the temporalities, and not the diocesan consultors as such, the election of a procurator is not required in the U. S.

"Intra octo dies ab accepta notitia vacationis" implies any sufficiently trustworthy notice of the vacancy (either by death or transfer),[26] because the notice is not further described. For eight days, therefore, the cathedral chapter, or the diocesan consultors, as a body, are entrusted with the government of the diocese, as it was before the Council of Trent.[27]

The second paragraph treats of the devolution of the right of appointment to the metropolitan or the senior suffragan. Hence, if the cathedral chapter, for any reason (e. g., negligence or disagreement), fails to comply with the law laid down in our canon, the metropolitan may designate a vicar-capitular, and he is not bound to 24 Elements, I, n. 635, p. 393.

25 Cfr. cc. 1520 ff.
26 Barbosa, De Canonicis et Dignitatibus, c. ult., nn. 29 ff., ed. Lugd., 1668, p. 246.
27 Cfr. c. 14, X, I, 33; c. 2, X, III, 9; c. 3, 6°, I, 8; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 9, 2; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 539 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google notify the chapter of his intention, but merely of the person elected. The new law deviates from the old practice with regard to the senior suffragan. Formerly, if a suffragan see became vacant whilst the metropolitan see was also vacant, the metropolitan chapter was entitled to name a vicar-capitular for the vacant suffragan see.[28] Now the senior bishop designates the vicar-capitular in the cases mentioned.

But who is the senior suffragan? The text says "antiquior," which implies that this attribute has reference to the see rather than to the person of its incumbent, and therefore the senior bishop is the one whose diocese was erected before the others: "prior in tempore, potior in iure." [29]

The right of the metropolitan extends also to such vacant sees as are immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff and to abbatiae nullius. Exception, however, is made concerning the latter in case the Constitutions of the religious should provide otherwise. These generally determine that an administrator be chosen and admit no interference from outside. The clause safeguards the exemption as well as the authority of the Holy See to which such Constitutions must be submitted for approval.

CAN. 433

§ 1. Unus deputetur Vicarius Capitularis, reprobata contraria consuetudine; secus electio irrita est.

§ 2. Vicarii Capitularis et oeconomi constitutio fieri debet per actum capitularem ad normam can. 160–182, salvis peculiaribus huius Capitis normis, et ad eius 28 Cf. Richter, Trid., Sess. 24, c. 16, n. 24, p. 375; Benedict XIV, De Syn., II, 9, 2; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 583.

29 Cfr. tit. 33, Decret. de maioritate et obedientia; regula 54 iuris in 6°; Santi-Leitner, Praelectiones Juris Canonici, Vol. I, p. 379.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

validitatem requiritur numerus suffragiorum absolute maior demptis suffragiis nullis.

§ 3. Idem potest in Vicarium Capitularem et oeconomum deputari.

§ 1 of this canon deals a decisive blow against the opinion of those canonists [80] who (based on some decisions of S. C. C.) held that more than one vicar-capitular could be elected in dioceses where an immemorial custom existed to that effect. The Code reprobates all such customs and declares all elections performed contrary to the new law to be null and void.

§ 2 treats of the manner of voting, which must be the same as that prescribed for elections proper. An absolute majority is required for election. Hence, if the number of electors is six, four votes must be cast for the same person. Any vote which is extorted, or which is not secret, certain, absolute, and determined [81] is invalid, and must be subtracted from the total. Thus, if one vote out of six were null and void, there would remain five valid votes, and therefore the candidate would have to obtain three, in order to be elected.

QUALITIES OF THE VICAR-CAPITULAR

CAN. 434

§ 1. Ad Vicarii Capitularis munus deputari valide nequit clericus qui ad sacrum presbyteratus ordinem nondum fuerit promotus, aut tricesimum aetatis annum non expleverit, aut ad eandem vacantem sedem fuerit electus, nominatus vel praesentatus.

§ 2. Vicarius Capitularis sit praeterea in theologia

80 Cf. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 545; Wernz, Jus Decret., II, 1, p. 960.

81 Cfr. Can. 169; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 207.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

aut iure canonico doctor vel licentiatus aut saltem earundem disciplinarum vere peritus, in eoque morum integritas, pietas, sana doctrina cum prudentiae laude conspirent.

§ 3. Si praescriptae § 1 conditiones posthabitae fuerint, Metropolita, aut si ecclesia metropolitana vacans fuerit, vel de ipso Capitulo metropolitano agatur, antiquior provinciae Episcopus, agnita rei veritate, Vicarium pro ea vice deputet; actus autem illius qui a Capitulo electus fuerat, ipso iure sunt nulli.

No cleric can be validly elected vicar-capitular unless he be a priest, thirty years of age; no one who has been elected, nominated or presented to the vacant see may be chosen for the office of vicar-capitular.

Furthermore, the vicar-capitular must be a doctor of divinity or of canon law, or a licentiate thereof, or at least well versed in these sciences; besides, he must be distinguished by probity of life, piety, sound doctrine, and prudence.

If in any case the conditions prescribed in § 1 have been set aside, the metropolitan, or if the metropolitan see be vacant or it be question of electing a vicar-capitular for the metropolitan see, the senior bishop of the diocese shall designate the vicar-capitular, after having been duly informed of the election; all the official acts of the so-called chosen vicar are ipso iure null and void.

The Code here corrects the Tridentine law in more than one point. The Council [32] was satisfied with the clerical state in general and with the age of twenty-five; now the priesthood and the age of thirty years (completed) are required. Besides, the canon adds that no one can be elected vicar-capitular who is elected, nominated, or presented to the same vacant see, as decided by Pius IX, "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873.

[32] Cfr. Trid., Sess. 22, c. 4; Sess. 23, c. 23, c. 12; Sess. 24, c. 12, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

These three conditions affect the validity of the election and, if neglected, according to § 3, give the right of appointing a vicar-capitular to the metropolitan or senior suffragan. These latter cannot, however, proceed to the appointment unless they have been informed that the election was illegal; in other words, they must have verified the fact that the chosen candidate suffers from one of the three impediments stated in § 1 of this canon.

As in the case of the eight days having elapsed, the devolution takes place only for this one time (pro ea vice), and the metropolitan or senior suffragan cannot claim the right of interfering with the next election of a vicar-capitular to the same see. Hence, if those who are authorized to supply the illegal election should themselves choose an unfit candidate, the right of election would revert to the chapter. For the metropolitan and senior suffragan, too, are bound by the law. The reason for this assertion is that the law which urges all is nullifying and the law depriving the chapter of the right of election is penal.[33]

Concerning the other qualities required, the Code is not as strict as the former practice. The academic degrees are no longer strictly demanded for a valid election,[34] nor is that other requisite which the canonists set forth in agreement with the practice of the Roman Curia, to wit, that, ceteris paribus, a member of the chapter should be preferred to an outsider.[35] Therefore, should 33 Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. III, Alleg. 54, n. 164, ed. Lugd., 1665, t. II, p. 132.

34 Cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 373, n. 4 f.; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 546 ff., where the academic doctorate is described as one conferred in a public university (of course, Catholic), and the laurea iuris is said to be preferred to that in theology. But this must now be corrected.

35 Richter, l. c.; Bouix, l. c., p. 572 f.; Santi-Leitner, I, p. 248 (tit. 28, n. 51).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the chapter (or the consultors) disregard these requisites, the metropolitan or senior suffragan could not claim the right of devolution.

RIGHTS OF THE VICAR-CAPITULAR

CAN. 435

§ 1. Sicut ad Capitulum ante deputationem Vicarii Capitularis, ita deinde ad Vicarium Capitularem transit ordinaria Episcopi iurisdictio in spiritualibus et temporalibus, exceptis iis quae in iure expresse sunt eidem prohibita.

§ 2. Quare Capitulum et postea Vicarius Capitularis omnia possunt quae enumerata sunt can. 368, § 2; item facultate pollent exercitium pontificalium in dioecesi cuilibet Episcopo permittendi, imo, si Vicarius Capitularis sit Episcopus, potest ipse eadem exercere, excluso tamen usu throni cum baldachino.

§ 3. Vicario Capitulari et Capitulo non licet agere quidpiam quod vel dioecesi vel episcopalibus iuribus praeiudicium aliquod afferre possit; nominatim vero Vicarius Capitularis aliique sive de Capitulo sive extranei, clerici aut laici, per se vel per alium prohibentur Curiae episcopalis documenta quaelibet subtrahere vel destruere vel celare vel immutare.

CAN. 436

Sede vacante nihil innovetur.

CAN. 437

In Vicario constituendo nullam sibi iurisdictionis partem Capitulum retinere potest, nec gerendo muneri tempus praefinire aliasve restrictiones praestituere.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The ordinary jurisdiction of the bishop, in spiritual as well as temporal affairs, passes first to the chapter and then to the vicar-capitular, except in regard to matters which the law has expressly excepted.

Therefore, first the chapter, and then the vicar-capitular, enjoy all the powers enumerated in can. 368, § 2, and besides, have the faculties to grant the exercise of pontificals to any bishop; nay, if the vicar-capitular is endowed with the episcopal character himself, he may perform pontifical ceremonies, though without using the throne and canopy.

The vicar-capitular and the chapter are not allowed to do anything that might prove prejudicial to the diocese or to episcopal rights; especially are the vicar-capitular and others, either capitulars or outsiders, clergymen or laymen, forbidden, either themselves or through others, to withdraw or destroy or hide or change documents of the episcopal Curia.

Nothing is to be changed during the vacancy of a see.

The chapter, in appointing a vicar, cannot reserve to itself any part of the jurisdiction, or limit the term of his office, or make any other restrictions.

These three canons belong together and supplement one another. Benedict XIV said that the powers of the chapter and the vicar-capitular about equal those of the vicar-general;[36] and therefore, whatever the bishop can do as Ordinary of the diocese (unless he has expressly reserved some matters) can also be done by the vicar-capitular. § 2, therefore, refers to can. 368, where the powers of the vicar-general are described.

Ordinary jurisdiction is vested in the chapter from the moment when notice of the vacancy is received, and in [36] Cfr. De Syn. Dioec., II, 9, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the vicar-capitular as soon as he is lawfully appointed and has made his profession of faith.[37]

However, whilst the full ordinary power passes first to the chapter, and then to the vicar-capitular, our Code, following the old law, forbids both to enact or do anything which might be detrimental to the episcopal rights. Can. 436: "sede vacante nihil innovetur," is a repetition of the Decretals (III, § 9). Under this heading various acts enumerated by canonists, who gathered them from scattered sources, are prohibited, though there are some modifications under the Code. Thus the vicar-capitular (a) cannot convoke a diocesan synod.[38] This is now absolutely forbidden, because the Code makes no exception. This measure seems quite reasonable, as synods must be held every ten years only.[39] (b) He cannot confer benefices promiscuously or appoint to office, except in so far as the law permits him to exercise that right, which is determined in can. 455, § 2. (c) He cannot grant indulgences, and must abstain from using the faculty of granting such, should he possess it.[40] (d) He cannot alienate anything of value, as this would be detrimental to the mensa episcopalis or the diocese.[41] With regard to this point we cannot discover any change in the new Code. Hence the old prescriptions remain in full force. No doubt, however, the vicar-capitular may conclude a favorable financial deal, for instance, getting money at a lower rate of interest or converting bonds into more profitable ones. For this is not prejudicial to the diocese, and opportunities, especially on the money mar-

37 Ib., n. 4; cf. can. 438.

38 Cfr. can. 357, § 1.

39 Benedict XIV, l. c., n. 5 f., says that the vicar-capitular can convoke a synod if a year has elapsed since the last one.

40 Cfr. Trid., Sess. 7, c. 10 de ref.; Benedict XIV, l. c., II, 9, 7; Wernz, Jus Decret., II, 2, p. 969.

41 Cfr. c. 62, C. 12, q. 2; c. 1, X, III, 9; Bizzarri, Coll., p. 40 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ket, easily slip away. Of course, if required, formalities prescribed by Canon Law must be observed. (e) The vicar-capitular cannot grant litterae dimissoriales indiscriminately, but only in the cases established by can. 958, § 1, 3°. In cases which permit him to issue such documents he may also ordain those provided with litterae, if he himself is endowed with the episcopal character (can. 959). This is a logical consequence of can. 435, § 2, which grants the vicar-capitular, if he is a bishop, the right of exercising pontifical functions. Only the use of the throne with the baldachin is forbidden; wherefore a temporary throne, or rather faldstool (faldistorium), must be prepared. We conclude that the vicar-capitular, if a bishop, may also administer the sacrament of confirmation.[42]

As to letters of incardination and excardination see can. 113.

The following canon (437) rejects the opinion prevailing among some canonists,[43] and in the S. C. C., but never in S. C. EE. et RR., that the chapter can reserve to itself part of the episcopal jurisdiction. Neither is the chapter entitled to limit the term of office of the vicar-capitular, or to restrict his power, for instance, to certain acts. If the vicar-capitular should submit to such restrictions at his election, the election would be valid, but the vicar-capitular would be obliged neither in foro externo nor in foro interno to abide by these restrictions.[44]

42 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 28, n. 62 (Vol. I, p. 255).

43 Cfr. Benedict XIV, De Syn., IV, 8, 10; Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 556 ff.

44 Pius IX, "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873: "Totam ordinariam episcopi jurisdictionem, quae vacua sede episcopali in capitulum venerat, ad Vicarium ab eo rite constitutum transire, nec aliam huius jurisdictionis partem posse capitulum reservare, neque posse ad certum et definitum tempus vicarios constituere."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The time when the ordinary jurisdiction passes to the vicar-capitular is stated in the next canon.

CAN. 438

Vicarius Capitularis, edita fidei professione de qua in can. 1406–1408, statim iurisdictionem obtinet, quin necessaria sit ullius confirmatio.

The vicar-capitular, after having pronounced the profession of faith (can. 1406 ff.), immediately obtains jurisdiction and needs no confirmation from any one. This settles a point long in dispute among canonists.[45] The profession of faith is to be made before the chapter. Whether its omission by mere accident would invalidate the jurisdiction and thus render the official acts of the vicar-capitular null and void, is not stated in our canon or in the one treating of the professio fidei, or in the penal Code. Hence, salvo meliori iudicio, we should say that the clause "edita fidei professione" (ablative absolute) here stands for the perfect tense, meaning "after having made the profession," but not conditionally, if. It follows that the mere wording of the text permits us to assume that the professio fidei does not affect the jurisdiction itself, but only the point of time in a non-conditional sense. However, in view of the importance attached to the profession and its being placed before "iurisdictionem obtinet," we may conclude that the ratio legis lays stress on the profession, and this would seem to imply that it is a conditio sine qua non.

CAN. 439

Quae in can. 370 de Vicario Generali praescripta

[45] See Benedict XIV, De Syn., II, 9, 4; Barbosa thought otherwise.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sunt, eadem de Vicario quoque Capitulari dicta intelligantur.

Concerning precedence and honorary rights, whatever has been enacted about the vicar-general must be applied to the vicar-capitular.

CAN. 440

Vicarius Capitularis obligatione tenetur residendi in dioecesi et applicandae Missae pro populo ad normam can. 338, 339.

CAN. 441

Nisi aliter fuerit legitime provisum:

1.° Vicarius Capitularis et oeconomus ius habent ad congruam retributionem, in Concilio provinciali designatam vel recepta consuetudine concedi solitam, desumendam ex reditibus mensae episcopalis aut ex aliis emolumentis;

2.° Cetera emolumenta, quo tempore sedes episcopalis vacaverit, futuro Episcopo pro dioecesi necessitatibus reserventur, si ad Episcopum, ecclesia non vacante, pertinuissent.

The vicar-capitular is obliged to residence and to the application of the Mass according to can. 338 f.

Unless otherwise provided:

(1) the vicar-capitular and the procurator are entitled to a decent support, determined by the provincial council or by legitimate custom, and taken from the episcopal revenues or other sources.

(2) All other revenues accruing during the vacancy of the see, if they are of a kind that would belong to the bishop in case the see were not vacant, must be reserved for the future bishop.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In the U. S. the bishops receive their salary chiefly by means of the cathedraticum,[46] and hence the solution of the pecuniary question here is simple. In the old countries this matter is more intricate. It is to be settled, from time to time, in provincial councils. The vicar-capitular or administrator, therefore, is entitled to the cathedraticum pro rata temporis as well as to the income received from dispensations. For the rest, a plenary or provincial council shall further determine the ways and means for the support of the vicar-capitular.

CAN. 442

Oeconomus rerum ecclesiasticarum et proventuum curam et administrationem gerat, sub auctoritate tamen Vicarii Capitularis.

The procurator shall administer the temporal affairs and revenues of the diocese under the supervision of the vicar-capitular.

CAN. 443

§ 1. Vicarii Capitularis et oeconomi remotio Sanctae Sedi reservatur; renuntiatio authentica forma est exhibenda Capitulo, a quo tamen eam acceptari necesse non est, ut valeat; novi autem Vicarii vel oeconomi constitutio post prioris renuntiationem, obitum vel remotionem ad ipsum Capitulum pertinet, facienda ad normam can. 432.

§ 2. Cessat praeterea eorum munus per initam a novo Episcopo possessionem ad normam can. 334, § 3.

The removal of the vicar-capitular and the procurator is reserved to the Holy See, the resignation of either must [46] Cf. Conc. Balt. II, n. 100 (Actaet Decreta, p. 68 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be made in authentic form and presented to the chapter, whose acceptance, however, is not required for the validity of the act. After the resignation, death or removal of the vicar-capitular or procurator, a new one may be appointed by the same chapter, according to the rules laid down in can. 432.

The office of vicar-capitular or procurator ceases immediately after the new bishop has taken possession of his diocese, according to can. 334, § 3.

The removal of a vicar-capitular is logically reserved to the Holy See,[47] since the chapter has no jurisdiction over the vicar-capitular, and the whole ordinary power of the bishop passes to him at election. Neither is the metropolitan, if he has appointed a vicar-capitular, entitled to remove him, for that right is only an extraordinary means of appointment, nor does the appointment cause or create the jurisdiction, but only occasions it. Therefore the regula juris in the Decretals of Gregory, "Omnis res, per quascunque causas nascitur, per easdem dissolvitur," cannot be applied here. From the same principle, viz.: that the whole ordinary jurisdiction is transferred to the vicar-capitular, and nothing remains with the chapter, it follows that the chapter has no right to indict the vicar, or to judge him, or to demand an account from him.[48]

The resignation, says the canon, must be drawn up in authentic form, as described in can. 186. But the acceptance of the chapter is not required for its validity, which is again quite logical, because the chapter has no jurisdiction to accept the resignation of the vicar. But it has the power, as a means to an end, to appoint a new vicar-capitular, if the first appointee resigns, dies, or is 47 Cf. Pius IX, "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873.

48 Cf. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 609.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google removed. The election must again proceed canonically, according to time and mode, and if the chapter fails to perform its duty within eight days from the date of notice of the resignation, death or removal of the former vicar-capitular, the metropolitan or senior suffragan can again claim the right of appointment.

CAN. 444

§ 1. Novus Episcopus a Capitulo, a Vicario Capitulari, ab oeconomo et ab aliis officialibus, qui, sede vacante, fuerunt constituti, rationem exigere debet officiorum, iurisdictionis, administrationis munerisve ipsorum cuiuslibet, et in eos animadvertere, qui in suo officio seu administratione deliquerint, etiamsi, redditis rationibus, a Capitulo vel a Capituli deputatis absolutionem aut liberationem impetraverint.

§ 2. Iidem rationem reddant novo Episcopo scripturarum ad Ecclesiam pertinentium, si quae ad ipsos pervenerint.

The office of vicar-capitular having ceased ipso iure upon the new bishop's taking canonical possession of the diocese, the latter must demand an account of the chapter, the vicar-capitular, the procurator, and other officials appointed during the vacancy, concerning their office, jurisdiction, administration, and charges; and he must proceed against such as have been delinquent in the discharge of their duties and offices, even though they had given an account to the chapter and been absolved or acquitted by the same.

Besides, the aforesaid officials shall also render account to the new bishop of whatever church documents may have come into their hands.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon is almost verbally reproduced from the decrees of Trent (Sess. 24, c. 16, de ref.). But instead of the term "punire," found there, the canon uses the milder expression, "animadvertere," which means to heed or take notice, although in law it also signifies to proceed, to punish. The punishment to be meted out is left to the prudent judgment of the bishop. Attention must be paid to the word "debet," which implies that the bishop is not at liberty to forego asking an account.[49] He is not, however, obliged to employ assessors or witnesses to testify to the fact that he has demanded an account.[50]

§ 2 again proves the solicitude which the Church wishes to have bestowed on official and other (for instance, historical), documents pertaining to the diocese.

49 Cfr. Bouix, De Capitulis, p. 656 f., who quotes Monacelli and Fagnani as saying that it would be a grievous sin to omit that account.

50 S. C. C., April 14, 1725; Richter, Trid., p. 376, n. 25.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER VIII

RURAL DEANS

The term "rural deans" is here employed for the Latin expression "vicarii foranei," because the English render it thus and the practical significance of both terms is the same. Formerly their power was more extensive, and therefore the name "vicarius," approaching that of vicar-general, was quite suitable. Their origin was due partly to the arrogance of the chorepiscopi and partly to the extension of the parish system. The country bishops became fully extinct towards the tenth century and their place was taken by archpriests, who were assigned to the civilly or ecclesiastically more important churches of the diocese, and exercised a certain amount of jurisdiction, but only in minor cases of frequent occurrence. They also convoked the clergy of their district on the first day of each month to instruct the priests how to conduct themselves in the administration of the Sacraments, as we read in the acts of a provincial council of London, of 1237. Besides, they watched over the conduct of the clergy and the faithful and the administration of temporalities.[1] It was but natural, considering the tendency of that time towards association (guilds), that the clergy of the various districts of a diocese should form, as it were, a chapter en miniature and elect a set of officials, the head of whom was called dean. The deans had to render an

1 Cfr. Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Disciplina, P. I, lib. II, c. 3. (ed. Mogunt., 1787, II, p. 13 ff.); Benedict XIV, De Syn., III, 3, 5 ff.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

account each year to the bishop.[2] The Tridentine Council [3] enacted nothing special about them.

Can. 445

Vicarius foraneus est sacerdos qui vicariatui foraneo, de quo in can. 217, ab Episcopo praeficitur.

The rural dean is a priest appointed by the bishop over a limited part of the diocese (c. 217).

Can. 446

§ 1. Ad munus vicarii foranei Episcopus eligat sacerdotem quem dignum iudicaverit, praesertim inter rectores ecclesiarum paroecialium.

§ 2. Vicarius foraneus ad nutum Episcopi amoveri potest.

He should be a priest chosen from among the parish priests, and may be removed by the bishop at will.

Formerly the priestly character was not absolutely required, but now it is strictly insisted on. No special qualifications are laid down, but the choice as well as the removal is left entirely to the bishop, who is bound neither by the consent nor by the advice of his chapter or consultors.

Can. 447

§ 1. Vicario foraneo, praeter facultates quas ei tribuit Synodus provincialis vel dioecesana et secundum normas in eadem Synodo legitime statutas vel ab Episcopo statuendas, ius et officium est invigilandi potissimum:

2 v. Scherer, I, 618 f.; Sägmüller, l. c., § 100. The name dean is probably taken from the Rule of St. Benedict, c. 21.

3 Sess. 24, c. 20, de ref., exempts all matrimonial and criminal causes from the power of the deans.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Num ecclesiastici viri sui ambitus seu districtus vitam ducant ad normam sacrorum canonum suisque officiis diligenter satisfaciant, praesertim circa residentiae legem, divini verbi praedicationem, impertiendam pueris atque adultis catechesim et obligationem infirmis assistendi;

2.° Num decreta lata ab Episcopo in sacra visitatione exsecutioni mandentur;

3.° Num debitae cautelae circa materiam Sacrificii Eucharistici adhibeantur;

4.° Num decor et nitor ecclesiarum et sacrae supellectilis, maxime in custodia sanctissimi Sacramenti et in Missae celebratione, accurate servetur; an sacrae functiones secundum sacrae liturgiae praescripta celebrentur; bona ecclesiastica diligenter administrentur, adnexaque illis onera, in primis Missarum, rite impleantur; rectene conscribantur et asserventur libri paroeciales.

§ 2. De iis omnibus ut reddatur certior, vicarius foraneus debet, statutis ab Episcopo temporibus, sui districtus paroecias visitare.

§ 3. Pertinet etiam ad vicarium foraneum, statim atque audierit aliquem sui districtus parochum graviter aegrotare, operam dare ne spiritualibus ac materialibus auxiliis honestoque funere, cum decesserit, careat; et curare ne, eo aegrotante vel decedente, libri, documenta, sacra supellex aliaque quae ad ecclesiam pertinent, depereant aut asportentur.

This canon describes the office or functions of the rural dean as follows:

Besides the faculties granted him by the provincial or diocesan synod, to be used according to the norms laid down by the same or determined by the bishop, the rural

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dean enjoys the right and office of watching, especially:

(1) as to whether the clergy of his district live up to the requirements of the sacred canons and diligently perform their duties, particularly concerning residence, preaching the word of God, giving catechetical instruction to children and adults, and attending to sick calls;

(2) whether the clergy execute the decrees of the bishop given at the visitation;

(3) whether they take the necessary precautions concerning the matter of the Eucharistic sacrifice;

(4) whether the rules concerning the adornment and neatness of churches and sacred furniture, especially the custody of the Blessed Sacrament and the celebration of Mass, are accurately observed; whether the sacred functions are performed according to the rubrics; whether the church property is carefully administered, and the obligations, especially those accruing from Masses, are properly discharged, and, finally, whether the parochial books are correctly written and kept.

In order to inform himself of all this the rural dean shall, at stated times established by the bishop, visit the parishes of his district. As soon as he hears of the serious sickness of a parish priest of his district, he shall take care that the patient is properly provided for, materially as well as spiritually, and see to it that, in case of death, a decent funeral service be held. Furthermore, the dean shall watch that no parish books, papers, sacred furniture, or other things belonging to the church are lost or carried away during the sickness or at the death of a priest.

The beginning of the canon mentions faculties which may be granted to the rural dean either by the provincial or the diocesan synod. The Third Plenary Council of

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Baltimore advised the Ordinaries to give their rural deans "more or less extensive faculties," in order that they might administer their office more efficaciously.[4] But as far as we are aware, deans receive the same faculties as other priests employed in parish work,—that is, if the term faculties is taken in its usual sense. But "faculties" may also mean powers in general, in which sense it would involve a kind of participated jurisdiction. This seems to us to have been the intention of the Third Baltimore Council. If this surmise is correct, the enlarged powers of deans would naturally have reference to the correction of abuses existing in their districts, exclusive, however, of legal procedure. In some countries it was customary for the deans to dispense from the prohibition of servile work on forbidden days. The new Code grants this power to the parish priests in certain cases.[5]

Concerning the matters to which the vigilance of the deans should be directed, not much need be said. Several of them, e.g., residence, preaching, catechetical instruction, are explained under their respective headings. All these matters require a knowledge of Canon Law, which deans should possess. The III Plenary Council of Baltimore says they should be endowed, not only with piety and prudence, but also with learning.[6]

As to the "materia sacrificii Eucharistici," this seems an almost superfluous admonition, yet actual occurrences prove its necessity. Altar bread must be of wheat, and for licit celebration in the Latin Rite it must be unleavened. The wine must be pressed from grapes (vinum de vite), and, outside of cases of necessity, it should be fermented.[7] At the present time it is necessary to 4 Acta et Decreta, n. 29, p. 19.

5 Cfr. can. 1245, § 1.
6 Acta et Decreta, n. 30.
7 Cf. Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moralis, 1917, p. 563 ff.; p. 1095.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google combat an exaggerated prohibition movement, which, as the cases of Oklahoma and Arizona show, aims not only at curtailing personal liberty but at subverting the positive divine law.

With regard to n. 4°, concerning the adornment of churches and their neatness, and the proper observance of the rubrics, we must refer to Titles XV and XVIII of Book III. Accurate book-keeping is again insisted on.

In order to assure the execution of this canon, the bishop should assign certain days, on which the rural deans must visit the parishes of their respective districts. The day appointed need not be made public; in fact, a surprise-visit is sometimes more effective in manifesting real conditions.

Can. 448

§ 1. Vicarius foraneus debet, diebus ab Episcopo designatis, convocare presbyteros proprii districtus ad conventus seu collationes de quibus in can. 131 eisdemque praeesse; ubi vero plures habeantur huiusmodi coetus in variis districtus locis, invigilare ut rite celebrentur.

§ 2. Si non sit parochus, debet residere in territorio vicariatus vel alio in loco non valde distanti secundum normas ab Episcopo definiendas.

On the days assigned by the bishop each rural dean must call the priests of his district to a meeting or conference (see can. 131), at which he is to preside; if several meetings are held in different places of his district, the dean must see to it that they be properly conducted.

If the rural dean is not a parish priest, he must reside

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in his district, or at least near it, as determined by the bishop.

The clerical conferences here mentioned were dealt with above (can. 131); where several conferences are held in various places of the same district, as may be necessary in large or numerous dioceses, the dean is dispensed from personally attending all of them, even though they may be held on different days, in order not to overburden him, especially if he is engaged in parish work. He may appoint a substitute, or entrust any priest with the presidency; but he must see to it that these meetings are held in an orderly way and accomplish the purpose for which they are instituted.

CAN. 449

Saltem semel in anno vicarius foraneus proprii vicariatus rationem reddere debet Ordinario loci, exponens non solum quae intra annum bene gesta sint, sed etiam quae mala obrepserint, quae scandala exorta sint, quae remedia ad ea reparanda adhibita et quidquid agendum existimet ad ea radicitus exstirpanda.

At least once a year the rural dean must submit to the Ordinary an account of the condition of his district. In this report he shall freely point out the good that was done as well as the evils that have crept in, scandals and the means employed to uproot them, and make suggestions as to what had best be done to eradicate abuses.

This canon sanctions an old custom. The report of a rural dean is not limited to any one subject. He may freely descant on the frequentation of the sacraments and their administration (not only as far as the four points of can. 447 are concerned), on the condition of sodalities and schools, on the spread of sound literature,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and if he is a temperance apostle, he may also touch on that subject. But he should also note that the III Plenary Council of Baltimore [8] says that deans should watch discreetly, admonish paternally, report truthfully. They should not be overzealous tyrants, backbiters, or flatterers.

CAN. 450

§ 1. Vicarius foraneus sigillum habeat vicariatus proprium.

§ 2. Praecedit omnibus parochis aliisque sacerdotibus sui districtus.

The rural dean shall have a deanery seal, which should differ from that of other deaneries.

He enjoys precedence over all the priests of his district.

His precedence is limited, first to the district and then to the diocesan synod or provincial council; and finally to the diocese. Outside these cases the general rules of precedence obtain. What has been said of the deans with regard to the clergy, applies also to religious employed in parish work (not to other religious).

8 Acta et Decreta, n. 30.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER IX

PARISH PRIESTS

As said above (can. 215 f.), the whole diocese formerly went by the name of parish (παροικία), a term originally employed by the civil authority, and during the early centuries there was but one church in each district, which served as diocesan or parish church. The Council of Sardica (c. 6) forbade the stationing of bishops in villages and small towns, lest the episcopal dignity and authority should suffer.[1] But the chorepiscopi were wont to succour the faithful in places far removed from the episcopal city, where alone the Eucharistic Sacrifice was offered by the bishop.[2] Even in Rome, although we read of several titular churches, it was at the Lateran that the suburbicarian bishops, surrounded by their clergy, celebrated the sacred mysteries.

In the fifth century (Chalcedon) we hear of ministers dwelling in the country and appointed with a fixed tenure. They attended to the needs of the faithful after the pagans[3] had receded. This state of things caused the authorities and landed proprietors to erect appropriate edifices for divine worship and dwellings for the clergy, who soon gained more extensive powers in the administration of the Sacraments. One privilege especially now became 1 Cf. Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, I, p. 180.

2 Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Disciplina, P. I, l. II, c. 21, n. 7 (II, 153).

3 Paganism (from pagus, i. e., a country district) lasted longest in the country.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

attached to these rural churches, viz.: the right of possessing a baptismal font, which gradually came to be regarded as the mark of a full-fledged parish church. The landed proprietors, or landlords, either out of devotion, or for the sake of their subjects (slaves, serfs, vassals), erected churches on their estates, where priests could perform sacred functions. These churches, or rather oratories, were not endowed with the same privileges as the rural parish churches, but for the administration of baptism as well as for the celebration of Mass on feast-days depended on the parish church, to which they also had to pay tithes or make certain gifts. In the eighth century the entire rural clergy, like the clergy of the city, formed a sort of college or corporation and met at stated times.

In the cities progress was somewhat slower. For with the exception of Alexandria [4] and Rome,[5] where there were several baptismal and penitential churches, it was not until the eleventh century that the parish system was introduced in the larger cities. The reason for this tardiness must be sought in the fact that the bishop was considered the sole hierarch of the diocese, and especially of the episcopal city. The development proceeded gradually, until it assumed the present shape. But one feature must be added, viz., that of the beneficiary title attached to parishes. This means that the parish church, by reason of its foundation and dotation, was a moral entity, though not a corporation in the sense of Canon Law, and a stable (perpetua) portion of a larger organization, i. e., the diocese. The civil law endowed single parishes with a corporative character. The Latin names by which such parish churches went in former times, were ecclesia ru-

4 Thomassin, l. c., c. 22, n. 1.

5 For Rome we have the testimony of the Liber Pontificalis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sticana, parochitana, dioecesana, and a head-priest or arch-priest presided over each.

The oratories on private estates in course of time were turned into parish churches and attended by a plebanus, — a name sometimes also given to the parochus.[6]

Parishes were not seldom united with monasteries, universities, and confraternities, which were all more or less corporations or juridical persons. That monks were not considered incapable of ruling a parish is evident, not only from the fact that many settlements sprang up around their monasteries, but also from conciliary decrees. Thus we read in can. 14 of a synod held at Mayence in 847, under Rhabanus Maurus, that "no monk should presume to accept a parish without the consent of the bishop."[7] As long, however, as the monks, or at least the majority of them, were not endowed with the priestly character it was necessary for monasteries to designate and support a vicar who, in the name of the monastery and with the approval of the bishop, would govern the parish incorporated with the monastery. The same practice was followed by the universities, which also had incorporated parishes and appointed their vicars. Abuses, however, were not infrequent. Thus a synod of London complained that the regulars paid their vicars a miserly stipend.[8] The consequence was a frequent change of vicars to the detriment of orderly and effective government. Hence the Council of Trent wished to see permanent vicars placed over such parochial benefices as were united to corporations.[9]

6 Cfr. Nilles, Commentaria in Conc. Plen. Balt. III., 1890, p. II, p. 797.

7 Thomassin, l. c., P. I, l. II, c. 25, n. 8 (Vol. II, p. 182).

8 The IVth Lateran Council re-echoes this complaint, c. 30, X, III, 5, de praeb.

9 Sess. 7, c. 7; Sess. 21, c. 6; Sess. 24, c. 13, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Finally, mention must be made of a certain kind of parish priest introduced in France and Belgium. The concordat of 1801 required a reëstablishment of parishes in each diocese. Besides the regular parish priests, the bishops were allowed, if need be, to appoint succursalistes, — their number to be regulated conjointly by the bishop and the civil prefect. These succursalists (desservants) were appointed by the bishops and could be removed at their good pleasure. Thus it seemed that one essential element of the parish priest, viz., irremovability, was lacking in this kind of "vicaires et desservants," as the thirty-first of the organic articles called them. Yet Bouix maintains that they were true parish priests in the canonical sense of the word.[10] According to the Council of Trent,[11] not only the perpetuity of the parish title (perpetuitas obiectiva), but also the perpetuity of the parish priest's tenure (perpetuitas subiectiva) is a requisite of the canonically established parochus. That the term later on became broader must be looked upon as an innovation or a gradual development.

Now let us hear what the Code establishes concerning parish priests. There is first the definition:

Can. 451

§ 1. Parochus est sacerdos vel persona moralis cui paroecia collata est in titulum cum cura animarum sub Ordinarii loci auctoritate exercenda.

§ 2. Parochis aequiparantur cum omnibus iuribus et obligationibus paroecialibus et parochorum nomine in iure veniunt:

10 Bouix, De Parocho, 1855, p. 234 ff.

11 Cfr. Sess. 24, c. 13; Santi-Leitner, l. III, tit. 29, n. 6 (Vol. III, p. 269).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Quasi-parochi, qui quasi-paroecias regunt, de quibus in can. 216, § 3;

2.° Vicarii paroeciales, si plena potestate paroeciali sint praediti.

§ 3. Circa militum cappellanos sive maiores sive minores, standum peculiaribus Sanctae Sedis praescriptis.

A parish priest is a priest or moral person to whom a parish is entrusted with the care of souls, to be exercised under the authority of the Ordinary of the diocese.

The following are equal to parish priests as to parochial rights and obligations and in law are known by the name of parish priests:

(1) Priests who govern quasi-parishes, i. e., congregations of the faithful existing in vicariates and prefectures Apostolic (can. 216, § 3);

(2) Vicars of parishes who are endowed with full parochial powers.

Military chaplains, major and minor, are subject to special regulations by the Holy See.

There are four points in this canon which call for an explanation.

(a) A parochus may be "a priest or a moral person." In the first case, of course, he is a physical person, endowed with the sacerdotal character, which is now an essential requisite for a parish priest (can. 453). A moral person is a community consisting originally of at least three members, such as universities (in the ancient sense), monasteries, chapters, in a word, all corporations. But the term moral person may here also be taken in the sense of an institute, whose juridical nature is determined by, and which becomes the bearer of, rights bestowed for the end or purpose for which it is instituted, e. g., a hosptial,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

an orphanage. In this latter case the exercise of rights lies with the oeconomus or procurator, or, as he was formerly called, syndic. Both corporations and institutes, the latter, of course, represented by their procurators, may be what are called habitual parish priests (parochi habituales), in order to distinguish them from those (parochi actuales) who actually and de iure exercise the care of souls.

(b) Every parish must be entrusted to such a parish priest, as explained above (can. 216).

(c) A parish must be committed in titulum. A title may be defined as "the legitimate cause of possessing what otherwise does not belong to one."[12] It plays a conspicuous part in prescription and possession. To hold a parish in title, or the title to a parish, therefore, means to be the owner or possessor thereof. However, no parochus can be styled the owner or proprietor of a parish. We might say that the bishop is the proprietor of all the parishes in his diocese, especially if he holds them in fee simple. But here "title" must be restricted to possession by a legitimate cause. By holding a parish, then, "animi et corporis detentione et iuris adminiculo," a priest comes into the possession of a parish; and this suffices to say that the parish was given him "in title." For as long as the title holds good, the actual possessor cannot be deprived of it. However, it may happen that the title is not real, but only presumptive (titulus putativus or coloratus), i. e., it is believed to have been conferred, but was in fact never granted. For instance, a monastery may have held possession of a parish for a number of years sufficient to claim prescription, yet cannot show any document which proves that the parish

12 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 26, 127: "Titulus est iusta causa possidendi quod nostrum non est."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was duly united with the monastery. Does such a title hold good? Yes, because if the monastic chapter was bona fide convinced that the title was granted, there was a legitimate cause for believing that the parish belonged to it, and therefore the monastery has the right of prescription.[13]

Neither does our Code determine anything to the contrary, for it only states "in titulum," without describing the nature of the title. The only authority who can grant a title to secular, minor or parish benefices in any diocese is the bishop, and concerning the union of parishes with moral persons can. 452 must be consulted.

(d) The last but most important element of a parish priest is the care of souls (cura animarum), which comprises the whole range of the forum internum, apart from reserved cases. Consequently parish priests may be called pastors, although it is true what Bouix [14] says, that, in the strict sense, comprising the offices of teacher, sanctifier, and judge or ruler, the title of pastor belongs to the successors of the Apostles. But this does not detract from the honor and office of the parish priests. Their power is an ordinary power, given by virtue of their office, which the bishop cannot arbitrarily diminish, or take away, or limit to such an extent that it would be an empty title.[15] But it is also true, as the Code says, that their power is dependent upon, and subject to, that of the bishop and that therefore they must exercise the care of souls under the authority of the Ordinarius loci or bishop.[16] It follows that the institution of parish priests

13 Cfr. c. 6, X, II, 26; Engel, II, 26, n. 25.

14 Bouix, De Parocho, p. 149 ff. is somewhat extreme, but can be easily understood from his standpoint; he wrote against the Jansenists.

15 Benedict XIV, De Syn., V, 4, 3.

16 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or pastors of souls, in this limited sense, is not of divine law or origin, and that it is circumscribed by, and dependent upon, the authority of the bishop.[17]

§ 2 speaks of those who are equal to parish priests in regard to rights and obligations, and mentions two classes, viz: the quasi-parochi of Apostolic vicariates and prefectures, and the vicars of parishes. About the former nothing need be added. The vicarii paroeciales are further determined as such who are endowed with full parochial power. Of these the Code speaks in the next chapter (cc. 471 sqq.).

§ 3 adverts to military chaplains, of higher as well as lower rank. In Austria, for instance, there are a military vicar Apostolic with episcopal (titular) character, military parish priests and chaplains. The vicar receives ordinary and extraordinary faculties from the Apostolic See,[18] which are more freely communicated during the time of war. Similar conditions obtain in Germany and elsewhere. But all regulations concerning military chaplains must emanate directly from the Holy See, the bishop not being competent in this matter.

Does canon 451 apply to the parish priests of the U. S.? In order to decide this question[19] we must recur to the factors which, taken collectively, constitute a parish priest. They are: a priest holding a parish in titulum with the care of souls. That our pastors have the priestly character and exercise the care of souls no one will deny. But are our congregations parishes in the canonical sense? Returning to the definition of a parish as given in canon 216, we see that a territorially defined precinct, with a 17 Nilles, Comment. in Conc. Balt. III, P. II, p. 88.

18 Cfr. Aichner, l. c., § 112. There is now in the U. S. an Ordinarius Castrensis.

19 Putzer, Comment. in Facultates Apost., 4th ed., p. 172 f., emphatically denies the existence of canonical parishes in the U. S.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

church and people, over whom presides a priest as their proper pastor, constitutes a parish. In this definition a twofold element may be distinguished, the one material, the other formal. The material element consists of a distinct territory and people with a church of their own. The formal element is the pastor proper in the person of a special rector. The material element is doubtless present in the parishes of the U. S., with the exception, perhaps, of the so-called "national" churches. But a difficulty arises when we come to the formal element, which is strictly connected with the condition of a parish priest, viz.: that he should hold the parish in titulum,— in his own name. Upon this point the whole controversy turns. The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore decreed that in all the provinces of the U. S., and especially in the larger cities, where there are several churches, certain districts with clearly defined limits should be assigned to each church, and that parochial or quasi-parochial rights should be given to the rectors.[20] The Third Plenary Council contented itself with repeating this enactment and complained that existing conditions did not yet permit the bishops to carry out the canonical laws concerning parish priests proper.[21] It also declared that canonically erected parishes do not as yet exist in this country.[22] Now, then, what is lacking to make our parish priests canonical parochi? The parish must be given in titulum, that is, the parish priest must govern and hold the parish in his own name. This was practically done in many cases,[23] especially those of churches

20 Acta et Decreta, n. 123 f.

21 Acta et Decreta, n. 32 f.

22 Ibid., n. 24. These decrees are no longer to be followed blindly.

23 The bishops are no longer permitted to have church property incorporated, by an act of the State legislature in fee simple, but either as a corporation aggregate or a corporation sole. (S. C. C., July 29, 1911; cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 45, p. 586).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which were incorporated, not in the name of the bishop, but in the name of either the priest as corporation sole, or in the name of the parish as corporation aggregate. Besides, the bishop must give the parish priest the full parochial rights which the care of souls demands, namely, ordinary power, which, as Benedict XIV says, cannot be taken away at random or arbitrarily limited. Are our bishops required to do this by the Code? We answer yes, unless the bishops request the Holy See to modify the Code. Our hierarchy is now fully and unreservedly embodied with the general hierarchy of the Church, and therefore the canonical rules must be observed also in the U. S. These rules require the appointment of parochi proprii. Why should our parish priests be only vicars of the bishops? No other species of public functionaries of the inferior clergy is to be discovered in the Code. Furthermore it is a natural dictate that, where duties are equal, rights should be equal also. And lastly, to speak plainly, what hinders the bishops from declaring in written terms what has de facto existed for a long time?

INCORPORATION

CAN. 452

§ 1. Sine Apostolicae Sedis indulto paroecia nequit personae morali pleno iure uniri, ita nempe ut ipsamet persona moralis sit parochus, ad normam can. 1423, § 2.

§ 2. Persona moralis, cui paroecia sit pleno iure unita, habitualem tantum curam animarum retinere potest, servato, quod ad actualem spectat, praescripto can. 471.

Without an Apostolic indult no parish can pleno iure

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be united to a moral (juridical) person in such a way that this person would be a parish priest.

Canonists distinguish a threefold union: plenissimo iure, which is nothing else but an abbatia nullius or a territory juridically separated from the rest of the diocese; pleno iure, by which a corporaton (e. g., a university or monastery) obtains the possession and administration of a parish in matters spiritual and temporal; semipleno iure, by which a corporation or community becomes the temporary administrator of a parish, either in matters temporal or in matters spiritual, but not in both at the same time, or at least not forever.

Of the first species enough has been said (cc. 319 ff.). The last kind of union (semipleno iure) does not apply here. The second touches chiefly parishes incorporated with monasteries or religious communities. Here some practical hints may not be amiss.

First and above all, the exact boundaries of the parish must be settled between the bishop and the religious community. Then the conditions binding both contracting parties must be laid down clearly and distinctly. Besides, the reasons for the alienation must be stated. The documents of transfer must be signed and sealed by both parties. The bishop may send his to the S. Cong. Concilii, while the religious dispatch theirs to the S. C. Relig. The bishop may include his document in the envelope in which the religious send theirs to the S. C. Rel., and both (having the same address on the inside, "Beatissime Pater") go to the latter Congregation, which forwards the papers of the Ordinary to the proper Congregation. The bishop should mention the fact that he proceeded "auditis consultoribus et iis, quorum interest" (can. 1428). Both parties, of course, are supposed to keep the documents received from Rome in their respective archives.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the document of the Apostolic See contains an affirmative answer, then, says § 2, the moral person to whom the parish is pleno iure united, obtains only the habitual care of souls, whilst the actual care is exercised by a vicar.

Hence the distinction between habitual and actual pastor. The former is the chapter or prelate, if the constitutions confer that right upon him, whilst the actual care with its obligations and rights are entrusted to the vicar.

CAN. 453

§ 1. Ut quis in parochum valide assumatur, debet esse in sacro presbyteratus ordine constitutus.

§ 2. Sit insuper bonis moribus, doctrina, animarum zelo, prudentia, ceterisque virtutibus ac qualitatibus praeditus, quae ad vacantem paroeciam cum laude gubernandam iure tum communi tum particulari requiruntur.

The qualities of a parish priest are as follows: He must be a priest of good morals, endowed with knowledge, zeal for souls, prudence and all other virtues and qualities required by either common or particular law for the praiseworthy government of a vacant parish.

That the priestly character is required for a parochus is evident from the fact that he must administer the Sacrament of Penance.[24] Formerly it was not necessary that the appointee should be a priest at the time of his appointment, provided only he received the priesthood 24 Cfr. c. 12, X, III, 38, de poenit. et rem., on annual confession and communion (Lat. Counc., 1215).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

within a year from the date of his appointment.[25] Under the Code, however, the priesthood is required at the moment the appointment is made, and hence the appointment, for instance, of a deacon would be ipso iure invalid.

The other qualities [26] prescribed in § 2 are not required ad validitatem, but merely ad liceitatem. What the Code says ad vacantem ecclesiam must be understood in the light of can. 150, § 1, and therefore in the sense of a true vacancy, as explained above. In the U. S. there are no special laws concerning the qualifications of parish priests, but the general law is assumed. However, if a provincial council or diocesan synod should, e. g., enact that certain conditions are necessarily required by particular circumstances, such an enactment would not be against the common law.[27] Neither would we call a civil law requiring citizenship for a parish priest unjust. For the law recognizing the pastor as a public functionary, for instance, at marriage, is entitled to set up conditions which do not clash with his spiritual character or with the nature of the Sacraments. Of course, such laws would not be ecclesiastical until formally "canonized," or at least approved of, by the Church.

IRREMOVABLE AND MOVABLE PASTORS

CAN. 454

§ 1. Qui paroeciae administrandae praeficiuntur qua proprii eiusdem rectores, stabiles in ea esse debent; quod tamen non impedit quominus omnes ab ea removeri queant ad normam iuris.

25 Cfr. c. 14, 6°, I, 6; Trid., Sess. 7, c. 3.

26 Trid., l. c.

27 Thus, for instance, in a linguistically mixed diocese, a law to the effect that all parish priests should have some knowledge of the prevalent languages would certainly be reasonable.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. At non omnes parochi eandem obtinent stabilitatem; qui maiore gaudent, inamovibiles; qui minore, amovibiles appellari solent.

§ 3. Paroeciae inamovibiles nequeunt amovibiles reddi sine beneplacito apostolico, amovibiles possunt ab Episcopo, non autem a Vicario Capitulari, de Capituli cathedralis consilio, inamovibiles declarari; novae quae erigantur, sint inamovibiles, nisi Episcopus, prudenti suo arbitrio, attentis peculiaribus locorum ac personarum adiunctis, audito Capitulo, amovibilitatem magis expedire decreverit.

§ 4. Quasi-paroeciae sunt omnes amovibiles.

§ 5. Parochi autem, ad religiosam familiam pertinentes, sunt semper, ratione personae, amovibiles ad nutum tam loci Ordinarii, monito Superiore, quam Superioris, monito Ordinario, aequo iure, non requisito alterius consensu: nec alter alteri causam iudicii sui aperire multoque minus probare tenetur, salvo recursu in devolutivo ad Apostolicam Sedem.

A priest who is set over a parish as rector should be permanent. This permanency does not, however, imply that he cannot be removed according to the law.

All parish priests are not permanent in the same degree, but the irremovable rectors in a higher, and the removable rectors in a lesser degree.

Irremovable cannot be converted into removable parishes without an Apostolic indult, whereas removable parishes may, with the advice of the cathedral chapter, be declared irremovable by the bishop, but not by the vicar-capitular. Newly erected parishes are irremovable, unless the bishop is compelled by special circumstances of place or persons to declare them movable, which he is empowered to do if he prudently deems it expedient, after hearing his chapter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Quasi-parish priests are all removable.

Parish priests who belong to a religious community may, as far as their person is concerned, be removed at will and with equal right either by the Ordinarius loci, after having notified the religious superior, or by the religious superior, after having notified the Ordinarius loci. Neither is bound to state and much less to prove the reason for his proceeding to the other. Recourse in devolutivo to the Holy See is open to both.

This canon was doubtless dictated by regard for the circumstances prevailing in several countries. It cannot be denied that the notion of a parish priest, in the canonical sense, includes his permanency or subjective perpetuity in the parish.[28] Our canon distinguishes, as the Second and Third Plenary Councils of Baltimore[29] did, between irremovable and removable rectors. Irremovable and permanent are synonymous terms, and the juridical quality attached to both is subjective perpetuity, which involves that the priest in permanent possession of a parish cannot be removed save upon trial, which supposes a crime (delictum). Such a trial had to be instituted according to the instructions of the S. C. P. F., 1884, "Magnopere."[30] Our canon acknowledges a certain kind of irremovability, but not an absolute one. How to proceed in removing irremovable rectors is stated in cc. 2147–2156, which are modelled upon the Motu proprio "Maxima cura," of Aug. 20, 1910.

Of a lower degree is the perpetuity of removable rectors, to which class in this country most rectors belong, [28] Cfr. c. 30, X, III, 5; c. un. 6°, III, 18.

[29] Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. II., n. 125; Balt. III., n. 32.

[30] Cfr. Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt. III., p. 287 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

because only every tenth parish priest was declared irremovable.[81] Removableness, however, being different only as to the degree of perpetuity, does not imply that such a rector can be removed without reason or formality, as shall be seen in cc. 2157 ff.

Note that irremovableness or removableness do not intrinsically follow the character of a parochus proprie dictus; otherwise the Code could not state that all parish priests do not enjoy the same degree of irremovableness. As already remarked, the new law is at variance in this regard with the old. What § 3 of the present canon says had already been enacted by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (n. 34). The bishops, therefore, cannot change parishes with irremovable rectors into such with removable rectors, because such a change would mean a deterioration of the condition of the churches, which is not permitted by law, unless there are sound reasons for it, which must, furthermore, be submitted to the Holy See for the necessary indult. On the other hand, the same principle gives the bishop the right of converting removable rectorships into irremovable, for this change signifies an amelioration of the status of the diocese.[82]

We said above that all parishes should receive parochi properly so-called. This statement receives an additional proof from the declared intention of the Holy See to introduce the parochial system everywhere.

The last paragraph of our canon determines the relation between the Ordinary and the religious superior concerning the vicar or temporary rector of a parish in charge of religious. Benedict XIV ("Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744) settled that question, and our text is but a verbal restatement of §11 of the aforesaid Constitution.[83]

81 Conc. Balt. III., n. 35.
82 Cf. Smith, Elements, I, p. 133 f.
83 Cf. Richter, Trid., p. 590.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Hence, if the bishop wishes to remove a religious from the post of rector, he may do so at will, and is not bound to give his reasons to the religious superior or to prove his right to make the change. The same applies to the religious superior. Should a clash ensue, the last and only remedy is an appeal to Rome (the bishop to the S. C. Conc. and the religious superior to the S. C. Rel.). Such an appeal leaves the removal in force until the Holy See has decided. For this is the meaning of an appeal "in devolutivo" as opposed to an appeal "in suspensivo," that it does not suspend or nullify an act or sentence until the higher instance has decided the case.

APPOINTMENT OF PASTORS

CAN. 455

§ 1. Ius nominandi et instituendi parochos competit Ordinario loci, exceptis paroeciis Sanctae Sedi reservatis, reprobata contraria consuetudine, sed salvo privilegio electionis aut praesentationis, si cui legitime competat.

§ 2. Sede vacante aut impedita ad normam can. 429, ad Vicarium Capitularem aliumve qui dioecesim regat, pertinet:

1.° Vicarios paroeciales constituere ad normam can. 472–476;

2.° Confirmare electionem aut acceptare praesentationem ad paroeciam vacantem, et institutionem electo aut praesentato concedere;

3.° Paroecias liberae collationis conferre, si sedes ab anno saltem vacaverit.

§ 3. Horum nihil Vicario Generali competit sine mandato speciali, salvo praescripto cit. can. 429, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 456

Ad paroecias religiosis concreditas Superior, cui ex constitutionibus id competit, sacerdotem suae religionis praesentat Ordinario loci; qui eidem, servato praescripto can. 459, § 2, institutionem concedit.

CAN. 457

Quasi-parochos e clero saeculari proprius loci Ordinarius nominat, audito Consilio de quo in can. 302.

CAN. 458

Vacanti paroeciae curet loci Ordinarius providere ad normam can. 155, nisi peculiaria locorum ac personarum adiuncta, prudenti Ordinarii iudicio, collationem tituli paroecialis differendam suadeant.

With the exception of parishes reserved to the Holy See, the right of appointing and investing parish priests belongs to the Ordinary of the diocese. All contrary customs are hereby rejected, with due regard, however, to the privilege of election or nomination.

If the episcopal see is vacant or impedita (can. 429), the vicar-capitular or administrator of the diocese is entitled:

(1) to appoint a parochial vicar according to cc. 472–476;

(2) to ratify the election and accept the presentation of a vacant parish and invest the one elected or presented;

(3) to appoint pastors to parishes whose appointment belongs to the bishop if the see has been vacant at least one year.

The vicar-general is not allowed to perform any of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

these acts without a special mandate, save in the case mentioned in can. 429, § 1.

This canon provides that, as a rule, the appointment to parishes belongs to the Ordinary of the diocese, because he is the pastor of his district by virtue of his office. However, the Pope, being the pastor of pastors, and having plenary jurisdiction over the whole Church, also has a right to make appointments to parishes. This right was claimed and exercised by the Roman Pontiffs very extensively during the Avignon period (1304–1378). The principle of reservation had been emphatically asserted already in a Decretal[34] of Clement IV. This decretal mentions as reserved to the Roman Pontiff all benefices which became "vacant at the Apostolic See." This term is explained by canonists as meaning that every benefice becoming vacant where the Pope resided, or within a radius of 40 miles (40,000 paces), was subject to papal reservation. Therefore any benefice whose holder died within that territory could not be conferred by the local Ordinary, but only by the Pope. This law was adopted as a rule (prima) of the Apostolic Chancery. But, we may be permitted to add, neither the law laid down in the Decretals, nor the first rule of the Apostolic Chancery was ever applied to this country. Nor could it in justice be applied, for with the exception of a few parishes in the province of San Francisco and one in New Orleans, there are no benefices, strictly so-called, in the U. S.[35] Hence we are inclined to hold that papal reservations do not interfere with the bishop's free right of appointing parish priests.

34 Cf. c. 2, 6°, III, 4; concerning the historical part see v. Scherer, I, 283; Wernz, Jus Decret. 1 ed. II, p. 448 ff.; Sägmüller, p. 272; Bouix, De Parocho, p. 310 f.

35 Cfr. Cath. Encyc., II, 474. Other rules, like the ninth of the Conc. Apost., concerning papal months, refer to higher benefices only.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Two other obstacles to the free granting of parochial offices are mentioned: the privilege of election and the privilege of presentation. What election means has been explained above. But the question arises what is meant here: — whether an election in the canonical sense, as that performed by a chapter, or an election by the congregation. Thus, for instance, in Switzerland parish priests are chosen by the congregation by a majority of votes. The Code seems to regard this as a privilege. It is a privilege with regard to common law, but based upon an ancient custom.[86]

The other mode of conferring a parish is by presentation, which means that the pastor is designated by a patron (patronus), who for some reason is entitled to exercise this right, as is the case, e. g., in Spain and other countries in which concordats are still in force. In the U. S. there is neither election nor presentation to hamper the free choice of the bishop. But even where these privileges are enforced, the priest elected or presented needs episcopal institution or investiture, i. e., the expressed judgment of the Ordinary that the candidate is fit, and the formal bestowal of parochial rights.

The Code next proceeds to determine the power of the vicar-capitular or administrator. He is entitled to appoint temporary vicars or assistants to vacant parishes (of whom more shall be said in the following chapter) and to grant investment to such as are elected or presented, for in this case the right of libera collatio, belonging exclusively to the bishop, is not interfered with, but only an act of jurisdiction is performed of which the administrator is capable. Lastly, the vicar-capitular is now entitled to confer all those parochial offices, the op-

[86] Cf. Wernz, II, n. 287 (p. 393, ed. 1.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pointment of which would otherwise belong to the bishop. Here a departure from the old law is noticeable.[37] However, this power can be used only after a full year's vacancy of the episcopal see; but the vicar need not apply for the exercise of that power to the Holy See,[38] because the law itself confers it.

§ 3 of canon 455 defines that the vicar-general does not enjoy the powers ascribed to the vicar-capitular in § 2. This is no superfluous addition, for in many respects both are considered equal, and a comparison between them has been drawn by prominent canonists.[39] The vicar-general can make no appointments to parishes without a special mandate, which had best be given in writing. (For instance: "I hereby authorize you to appoint to the vacant parish of N. whom you think worthy," etc.) This does not mean that the bishop designates the priest, on whom the parish is to be conferred, for then the vicar-general would not be mandatarius, but merely executor. In one case only does the vicar-general not need such a special mandate, viz., when the episcopal see is impedita, as explained above under can. 429, § 1.

Canon 456 ordains that for parishes entrusted to a religious order, the respective superior who exercises that right under the constitution shall present a priest of his community to the Ordinary of the diocese, who shall invest him in conformity with can. 459, § 2.

This canon does not distinguish between a parish incorporated with a religious community pleno iure or only semipleno, but employs the general term "ad parochias religiosis concreditas"; and hence both kinds are understood. Presentation by the superior is mentioned as a [37] Cfr. c. 2, X, I, 9; c. un. § 1, 6°, I, 8.

[38] Cfr. Wernz, Jus Decret., II, p. 969, nota 243.

[39] Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 9, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conditio sine qua non. The competent superior is he whom the constitutions of the respective order clothe with the right of presentation. We believe that, generally speaking, only the "superiores maiores" mentioned in can. 488, 8.° are intended. In the case of the Benedictines, the Abbot of the monastery, not the Abbot Primate or the Abbot President; in other orders and congregations with provincial organization, the provincials, their substitutes or representatives. If the respective constitutions provide otherwise (either extending or restricting the power of the superiors), they must be followed. The candidate presented must be a priest endowed with all the qualities required for a parochus. Therefore our canon refers to can. 459, § 2, where the bishop is called upon to judge the ability of candidates presented by religious superiors — not their learning only, but also other necessary qualifications. Hence the bishop would be justified in requiring an examination as to the fitness of the candidate presented, but he is not obliged to subject him to an examination if he is morally certain as to his qualifications. If the candidate is found fit, the bishop is bound to give him the investiture.[40] The bishop is not entitled to subject a religious thus presented to a concursus, for this is neither prescribed by the Code nor favored by the old law.[41]

We may add that the Decretals demand that the superior (prelate, abbot) ask the consent of his chapter, unless ancient custom and prescription has derogated

40 Cfr. Trid., Sess. 25, c. 11 de regg.; Pius V, "Ad exequendum," § 4 f. (Bull. Rom., IV, II, 402); Piatus Mont, Praelectiones Juris Reg., ed. 2, II, p. 20. Even a religious superior, though a prelate, may be subjected to an examination. (S. C. C., Jan. 7, 1755; Piatus Mont, l. c.)

41 Cfr. Engel., De Privilegiis et Juribus Monasteriorum, privil. 46, de unione pleno jure, n. 2, according to Pius V, "Ad exequendum" (l. c.), which is not revoked by Benedict XIV, "Cum illud."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from, or abrogated, the right of the chapter. The Code does not abrogate that right, and hence, if the constitutions do not give the unqualified right of presentation to the superior, and no custom has abrogated the right of the chapter, the superior is obliged to ask the chapter.[42]

Under canon 457 quasi-parish priests of the secular clergy are appointed by the Ordinary of the diocese, vicariate, or prefecture Apostolic, after hearing his chapter, according to can. 302.

Canon 458 ordains that the Ordinary of the diocese shall provide for a vacant parish according to can. 155, unless peculiar circumstances make a delay advisable.

The canon referred to (155) demands that a new pastor be named within six months from the date when the vacancy becomes known to the bishop. Circumstances making a delay advisable may have reference to place or person. Circumstances of place may be material or moral, e. g., unpaid debts, unsafe conditions by reason of a fluctuating population, the erection of a parish school, the advisability of punishing the people for their treatment of their former pastor, etc. Circumstances of person have reference to the person to be appointed, for instance, if there be a lack of priests qualified for the place.

EXAMINATION — CONCURSUS

CAN. 459

§ 1. Loci Ordinarius, graviter onerata eius conscientia, obligatione tenetur vacantem paroeciam illi conferendi, quem magis idoneum ad eam regendam habuerit, sine ulla personarum acceptione.

§ 2. In hoc iudicio ratio haberi debet non solum

42 Engel, l. c., in parochiis, etc., 46, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

doctrinae, sed etiam earum omnium qualitatum, quae ad paroeciam vacantem rite regendam requiruntur.

§ 3. Quare loci Ordinarius:

1.° Ne omittat documenta, si qua sint, ex Curiae tabulario desumere quae clericum nominandum respiciunt et notitias, secretas quoque, si opportunum iudicaverit, prudenter exquirere etiam ex locis extra dioecesim;

2.° Prae oculis habeat praescriptum can. 130, § 2;

3.° Clericum examini super doctrina coram se et examinatoribus synodalibus subiiciat; a quo, de consensu eorundem examinatorum, potest dispensare, si agatur de sacerdote doctrinae theologicae laude commendato.

§ 4. In regionibus in quibus paroeciarum provisio fit per concursum sive specialem ad normam const. Benedicti XIV Cum illud, 14 Dec. 1742, sive generalem, haec forma retineatur, donec Sedes Apostolica aliud decreverit.

The Ordinary of the diocese is seriously admonished of his obligation to confer a vacant parish only on the one whom he deems fittest for its government, without personal favoritism.

In forming his judgment as to fitness of a candidate, he should consider not only learning but also the other qualities that are required for successfully governing a parish.

Hence the Ordinary:

(1) shall not neglect to inspect the documents in the diocesan archives, if there are any that have reference to the clergyman to be appointed, and, if he deems it expedient, shall prudently seek to obtain secret information, even from outside the diocese;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(2) he shall faithfully comply with can. 130, § 2 (concerning examinations);

(3) he shall subject the candidate to an examination in the presence of the synodal examiners; however, he may, with the consent of the examiners, dispense from this examination if the priest concerned has distinguished himself in theology.

Where appointments to parishes are made by means of the concursus,— either the special concursus described in the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Cum illud," Dec. 14, 1742, or a general concursus,— this method should be followed until the Apostolic See decrees otherwise.

The Council of Trent issued various decrees concerning the examination of candidates for vacant parishes, laying special stress on the necessity of such examination and permitting no appeal. A solitary exception was made in favor of those presented by universities.[43] Pius V and Clement XI issued constitutions to the same effect, and Innocent XI condemned the opinion of those who asserted that the Tridentine decrees were intended only to exclude unworthy candidates, not to give preference to the more worthy.[44] From this we may understand why § 1 of our canon appeals most earnestly to the Ordinary ("graviter onerata eius conscientia"), exhorting him to appoint the fittest candidate (magis idoneum).

The Code insists upon fitness rather than worthiness. The term fitness refers to the juridical qualities mentioned in § 2.

That he may form an objective and a safe judgment of a candidate's fitness, the law enjoins the Ordinary to 43 Cfr. Sess. 7, c. 13; Sess. 24, c. 18; Sess. 25, c. 9, de ref.; Pius V, "In conferendis," April 15, 1567 (Richter, Trid., p. 575; p. 55, pp. 378 ff.).

44 Benedict XIV, "Cum illud"; cfr. Bouix, De Parocho, p. 339.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gather information about him, to study the records of previous examinations, especially those which the candidate had to undergo during the three years immediately following his ordination, and, finally, to subject him to another test, in the presence of the board of examiners. The matter of this final examination and its method depend on the examiners. It must be passed by every secular priest who is to be appointed to a parish, whether irremovable or movable, unless the applicant has distinguished himself in theology. Wherein this distinction consists is not precisely stated and hence room is left for discussion. A doctor of divinity, who has received his title from a Catholic university, no doubt enjoys that distinction. But as no academic degree is mentioned, it would not be against the spirit of the law if a professor of sacred theology in the episcopal seminary were accorded the privilege of exemption. The term "theology" is generally taken to comprise dogmatic, moral, and pastoral theology, and Holy Scripture. Concerning canon law a doubt might arise from the fact that it seems not to suffice for a canon theologian.[45] But as in our case the question does not turn about that office, since, moreover, canon law now forms part and parcel of theological training, and a degree in canon law can be obtained only after a postgraduate course, and it would be difficult to imagine a solid canonist without a thorough knowledge of theology proper and church history, we may safely include licentiates, doctors, and professors of that noble science in the category of the "doctrinae theologicae laude commendati."

However, the bishop cannot decide this point by himself, but needs the consent of the examiners. This con-

[45] Benedict XIV, De Syn., XIII, 9, 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google sent may be given by each one individually, or by vote, for no chapter-act is intended.

§ 4 treats of the concursus, which is twofold, either special, as described by Benedict XIV, or general, which does not accurately follow the rules laid down in the aforesaid Constitution. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore adopted the Constitution "Cum illud" for all irremovable rectors;[46] and therefore for such the enactment of our Code holds good and must be followed as a universal law. The substance of that Constitution is as follows:

(1) When a parish becomes vacant, the bishop shall, by a public edict, fix a suitable day for the holding of the competitive examination, notifying at the same time all who wish to make the concursus that they must, within this time and before the day set apart for the concursus, file with the diocesan chancellor testimonials, judicial or extra-judicial, of their fitness, merits, qualifications, etc. After the expiration of this time, no testimonial or document of any kind can be received.

(2) The chancellor must make out a written summary or synopsis of all the documents or testimonials presented by the various candidates and give a copy of this synopsis to the bishop, and to each of the examiners, who in approving candidates after the examination, must take into account, not merely their learning, but also their other merits and qualifications.

(3) In case a rejected competitor appeals either a mala relatione examinatorum or ab irrationabili iudicio episcopi, he must produce before the judge of appeal all the acts or records of the examination held in the first instance, which must be given him for that purpose by the [46] Acta et Decreta, n. 36, nn. 40 ff. (l. c., p. 25 ff.); Smith, Elements, I, p. 416 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

chancellor. The judge ad quem must pronounce his decision solely and exclusively on the strength of the records or acts of the first concursus. Hence he cannot order any new concursus, nor receive any documents or testimonials other than those contained in the acts of the first instance.

(4) Finally, when the judge ad quem pronounces sentence in entire conformity with the appointment of the Ordinary, that is, in every respect against the appellant and in favor of the competitor appointed by the bishop, no further appeal is allowed, and the controversy becomes res iudicata. But if he reverses the action or appointment of the Ordinary, the competitor appointed by the bishop can appeal to the higher judge, whose sentence shall be final and unappealable.

(5) The concursus itself must be held in the following manner:

(a) The same questions must be proposed to all competitors, as also the same case (moral, liturgical, canonical, pastoral) and the same gospel-text upon which they must compose a short sermon; all these must be dictated at one and the same time, and the same length of time allowed for the answer.

(b) All must sit in the same room, and are not allowed to leave before they have completed the composition.

(c) They must write the answers in Latin, except the sermon, in their own hand and sign them.

(d) All answers, as well as the sermon, as soon as offered, must be signed by the presiding chancellor, the examiners and the bishop or his vicar, if the latter was present at the examination.

(e) The judgment upon the sufficiency of the answers must be passed by the examiners at the place of exam-

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

ination, and must include a verdict on each candidate's conduct, virtues, and prudence. But the examiners must give only an objective statement as to the ability of the candidate, and leave the judgment as to the greater or lesser degree of fitness to the bishop.[47]

A general concursus was proposed at the Vatican Council by the German bishops, especially for larger dioceses.[48] This examination, it was suggested, should be held once a year and turn chiefly upon the learning of the candidates. The other qualities were to be considered at the time a parish became vacant. Those who had passed the examination once, were considered fit for any charge, so far as doctrine was concerned. In the U. S., according to the Third Baltimore Council (n. 36, n. 43), only those priests can be admitted to the concursus who have been laudably engaged in the sacred ministry for at least ten years in the diocese, and have within that time given proof of their ability to govern a parish spiritually and temporally, either in the capacity of simple rectors, or in some other way. After the lapse of six years they must undergo another examination if they wish to be appointed to an irremovable rectorship. This general concursus was embodied by the Council in its decrees,[49] and since the Code mentions it also, it is not to be looked upon as abolished. But it is intended only for dioceses whose size does not permit calling a special concursus. Also other "peculiar circumstances" are mentioned which render a general concursus advisable.

47 Cfr. Conc. Balt. III, nn. 36, 52 (l. c., p. 23, p. 28).

48 At the Vatican Council, cfr. Smith, Elements, I, 421; Granderath-Kirch, Gesch. d. Vatik. Konzils, 1903, III, 439 ff.

49 Acta et Decreta, n. 59 (l. c., p. 30).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

UNITY AND POSSESSION

CAN. 460

§ 1. Parochus ad normam can. 156 unam tantum titulo paroeciam habeat, nisi de paroeciis agatur aeque principaliter unitis.

§ 2. In eadem paroecia unus tantum debet esse parochus qui actualem animarum curam gerat, reprobata contraria consuetudine et revocato quolibet contrario privilegio.

CAN. 461

Curam animarum parochus obtinet a momento captae possessionis ad normam can. 1443–1445; et ante possessionem aut in ipso possessionis capiendae actu fidei professionem edere debet, de qua in can. 1406, § 1, n. 7.

A parish priest, according to can. 156, can hold only one parish in titulum, unless two parishes are united aeque principaliter.

In each parish only one is the parish priest, who has the actual care of souls; all contrary customs are reprobated and contrary privileges repealed.

Canon 460 first speaks of the incompatibility of two parochial charges in one and the same person, and refers to can. 156, which forbids the holding of two offices that cannot be discharged at the same time by the same person. This law is taken over from the Decretals [50] and the Tridentine Council [51] and is based partly upon the requirement of personal residence, and partly upon the prohibition of avarice. Hence no one is allowed to possess two parishes in titulum as quasi-proprietor or rather pos-

50 Cc. 15, 28, X, III, 5 de praeb.; Engel, III, 5, n. 68.

51 Sess. 7, c. 4; Sess. 24, c. 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sessor. An exception, however, is made in favor of two parishes united in such a way that both retain their own titles and rights and neither is subject to the other.[52] Note, however, that such a union must be objective, not subjective, that is to say, the two parishes are not allowed to be united in favor of the pastor or holder, but purely with regard to themselves. For a subjective union would be nothing but a veiled plurality of benefices, forbidden in the case of two curacies or rather parishes (cura aminarum).

§ 2 safeguards unity of government.[53] It is directed against interference on the part of any juridical person (chapter, monastery) with the rights of the pastor in the care of souls and against encroachments on the part of assistant priests. Needless to say, under the new law, as under the old, several priests may be employed in a parish.[54]

Canon 461 says that the pastor has the care of souls from the moment of his taking possession of the parish (can. 1443–1445). Either before or in the act of taking possession he must pronounce the profession of faith (can. 1406, § 1, n. 7). Pastors should be installed either by the bishop himself or by his delegate. If a pastor does not wish to be present himself at this function he may be represented by a procurator endowed with a special mandate. But he cannot pronounce the profession of faith by proxy.

52 Cfr. can. 1419.

53 Cfr. c. 41, C. 7, q. 1; c. 4, C. 21, q. 2, where the allegory of husband and wife (parish) is alleged; c. 15, X, III, 4. Barbosa, De Parocho, I, 1, n. 43, Engel, III, 29, n. 12, and others won the case against Bouix, (De Parocho, p. 190 ff.), who maintained that the law does not strictly forbid several pastors; our text is from c. 15, X, III, 5.

54 Cfr. c. 3, X, I, 3; and the chapter of our Code on Vicars.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RIGHTS OF PARISH PRIESTS

CAN. 462

Functiones parocho reservatae sunt, nisi aliud iure caveatur:

1.° Baptismum conferre sollemniter;

2.° Sanctissimam Eucharistiam publice ad infirmos in propria paroecia deferre;

3.° Sanctissimam Eucharistiam publice aut privatim tanquam Viaticum ad infirmos deferre atque in periculo mortis constitutos extrema unctione roborare, salvo praescripto can. 397, n. 3, 514, 848, § 2, 938, § 2;

4.° Sacras ordinationes et ineundas nuptias denuntiare; matrimoniis assistere; nuptialem benedictionem impertiri;

5.° Iusta funebria persolvere ad normam can. 1216;

6.° Domibus ad normam librorum liturgicorum benedicere Sabbato Sancto vel alia die pro locorum consuetudine;

7.° Fontem baptismalem in Sabbato Sancto benedicere, publicam processionem extra ecclesiam ducere, benedictiones extra ecclesiam cum pompa ac sollemnitate impertiri, nisi agatur de ecclesia capitulari et Capitulum has functiones peragat.

CAN. 463

§ 1. Ius est parocho ad praestationes quas ei tribuit vel probata consuetudo vel legitima taxatio ad normam can. 1507, § 1.

§ 2. Potiores exigens, ad restitutionem tenetur.

§ 3. Licet paroeciale aliquod officium ab alio fuerit expletum, praestationes tamen parocho cedunt, nisi de contraria offerentium voluntate certo constet circa summam quae taxam excedit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Gratuitum ministerium ne deneget parochus iis qui solvendo pares non sunt.

Unless otherwise provided by law, the following functions are reserved to the pastor:

(1) To administer solemn Baptism;

(2) To carry the Holy Eucharist publicly to the sick in his own parish;

(3) To bring the Holy Eucharist as viaticum either publicly or privately to the sick, and to anoint them when in danger of death (with due regard to can. 397, n. 3; 514, 848, § 2; 938, § 2);

(4) To announce sacred ordinations and the banns of matrimony; to assist at marriages and impart the nuptial blessing;

(5) To hold funeral services according to can. 1216;

(6) To bless the houses on holy Saturday or other customary days, according to the liturgical books;

(7) To bless the baptismal font on Holy Saturday, to hold processions outside the church, to give the solemn blessing outside the church, unless, in a capitular church, the chapter performs these functions.

Most appropriately the administration of Baptism holds first place among parochial rights, it being not only the initiation into the fold of Christ, but also a sign of a true parish, according to the ancient view. Solemn Baptism includes all the ceremonies contained in the Rituale Romanum, whilst private Baptism, when administered by a priest, comprises only the pouring of water accompanied by the formula, the anointing with chrism, the handing over of the white cloth and candle.[55]

Concerning the public or private administration of [55] Cfr. Conc. Balt. II, n. 238 (l. c., p. 731); Wapelhorst, Compendium S. Liturgiae, 1915, p. 431.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Holy Communion to the sick, the rules of the second Council of Baltimore [56] may safely be followed, for the custom of publicly bringing them the Holy Eucharist does not generally prevail in our country. The pastor's right concerning the Holy Eucharist and Extreme Unction does not extend to the bishop (can. 397, n. 3), nor to religious clerics and nuns, if the latter have a confessor or chaplain (can. 514), and ceases in cases of urgent necessity (can. 848, § 2; 938, § 2). What is understood by the funeral service is further determined in can. 1216. The custom of blessing houses on Holy Saturday is, as far as we are aware, not widespread in our country, except perhaps in Italian congregations. In Rome, as I know from experience, it is greatly favored and sometimes accompanied by much ceremony.

§ 7 mentions the right of blessing the baptismal font on Holy Saturday. No mention is made of the blessing on Pentecost Saturday; wherefore the latter is not to be reckoned among the reserved rights of the pastor. Besides processions [57] the Code also enumerates blessings [58] imparted "with pomp and solemnity outside the church." Blessings by which the Divine Name is invoked upon persons and things are various. The rights of the pastor do not include papal blessings,[59] nor such as are reserved to the bishop, notably the blessing of abbots and abbesses, the consecration of virgins, the blessing of the holy oils and chrism, of sacred vessels and furniture (unless, of course, a special privilege or faculty is obtained), the blessing of churches, public oratories, and cemeteries. Some authors [60] reserve to the bishop also the solemn 56 Acta et Decreta, n. 264 (l. c., p. 142 f.).

57 Cfr. cc. 1290–1295.

58 Cf. Wapelhorst, l. c., p. 516 ff.

59 The blessings proper to the Pope are: that of the pallium, Agnus Dei, Golden Rose, and Princes' Sword; Van der Stappen, Sacra Liturgia, 1900, IV, p. 342 f.

60 Van der Stappen, l. c., p. 347.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

blessing of images of our Lord, the B. V. Mary, and the Saints. However, our canon seems rather to favor the assumption that the parish-priest can now perform such solemn blessings, else why should it have added, "with pomp and solemnity"? Besides these, the solemn blessing of edifices, bridges, ships, railroads, banners or flags can also be performed by parish priests,— unless, the Code adds, these last named blessings (n. 7) are given by the chapter. Hence cathedral, collegiate or religious chapters — the Code uses the general terms chapter and chapter church — are allowed to bless the baptismal font on Holy Saturday, lead processions, and give the blessings mentioned. We know that the venerable chapter of St. Peter's in Rome has repeatedly crowned images of the Blessed Virgin. The underlying idea no doubt is that if a ceremony is performed by a whole chapter, it is more impressive and imposing than when performed by an individual pastor.

Under can. 463 every parish priest is entitled to the income established by approved custom and legitimate taxation (can. 1507). If he takes more, he is obliged to restitution. When parochial functions are performed by another than the parish priest, the latter is entitled to the fees, unless there is a surplus and it is evident that the donor intended that surplus for the priest who performed the function.

Parish priests should never refuse to serve the poor who cannot pay, free of charge.

This canon regulates the material rights of the parish priest. According to Holy Writ[61] the ministers of the altar have the right to live by the altar. The early Christians fulfilled this duty to their pastors by presenting offerings (oblationes) at the services. The Didache [61] Matt. 10, 10; I Cor. 9, 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c. 13) directs the faithful to offer to God their first fruits, while the Didascalia,[62] by applying to the Christians the injunction of the Book of Numbers (c. 18) seems to enjoin the paying of tithes.[63] Lest the clergy should lean towards commercialism[64] and thus be distracted from their more important occupation, the Church, especially after the establishment of benefices so-called, demanded that the clergy should receive decent support from the faithful at large and from the flock entrusted to them in particular.[65] Whether the pastor is entitled to this support by divine or ecclesiastical right or law, is controverted. However, even those[66] who deny that divine or natural law dictates the support of pastors, must accept the view of St. Thomas,[67] who says: If a stipulation is made between the parish and its pastor to pay him a pension or interests, this agreement obliges the faithful in conscience; besides, if the minister has no other sources of income and stands in need of decent support, the parishioners, unless they themselves be destitute of means, are bound in conscience, by natural and divine law, to assist him. This was the view taken by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore,[68] which says that justice and the sacerdotal dignity demand that the ministers of the Church should receive a decent support and decreed that the bishops should determine the salary of priests at the synods and that pastors should be content with a less sum if their people are unable to pay the stipulated salary. It is evident that the salary of a parish priest is not intended 62 Const. Apost. (ed. Funk, 1906), II, 25.

63 Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, I, p. 56 f.

64 Ibid., p. 175.

65 Cfr. c. 27, C. 12, q. 2; tit. 5, X, de praeb.; tit. 25, X, de peculio cleric. Trid., Sess. 22, c. 1 de ref.

66 Barbosa, De Parocho, c. 24, n. 9 f. (ed. Lugd., 1665, p. 208); Bouix, De Parocho, p. 480.

67 Summa Theol., II, II, q. 86, a. 1.

68 Acta et Decreta, n. 273 (l. c., p. 156.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to enable him to live in luxury.[69] The present salaries of most of our priests, we need hardly add, preclude "high living." Here it may not be amiss to call attention to the "burning question," recently discussed even in lay magazines,[70] of a living wage for the parochial clergy. The high cost of living alone is reason enough for increasing the salaries of our parish priests, let alone their exalted position in society. Most professional men receive at least double the amount of a priest's salary, although the latter has to study and prepare himself for a much longer time than, e. g., the lawyer or the physician. To increase the priests' salaries would incidentally heighten popular esteem for classical studies. Intelligenti pauca.

What the canon means by "praestationes" is palpable, though not precisely stated. According to the Digest praestatio signifies a payment of what is due.[71] In ecclesiastical language it is often employed synonymously with precaria, a kind of prebend or benefice; sometimes with pension and interest;[72] sometimes with contributions, e. g., cathedraticum. Our Code mentions praestationes in connection with benefices, which, it says, may consist of contributions to be paid by families or moral persons.[73] Hence we believe that by the term "praestationes" the law intends to comprise the whole range of income, salary and stole-fees, with the sole exception of manual mass stipends.[74] All these sources of income should be determined by a provincial council or meeting of the bishops of the province (can. 1507).[75] Hence a 69 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 1, de ref.

70 Cfr. the Catholic Fortnightly Review, (by Arthur Preuss), St. Louis, Mo., Vol. XXIV, No. 18, pp. 274 f.; No. 21, p. 321.

71 Cfr. Dig. 43, 26.

72 Cfr. Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Praestatio."

73 Cfr. can. 1410.

74 Cfr. the Catholic Register, Kansas City, Mo., n. 27, 1918, where a judge's decision is quoted which favors our point.

75 Manual mass stipends are such as are received irregularly and uncertainly, as it were, de manu ad

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google tax fixed by diocesan synod can no longer be looked upon as the juridical norm, either of law or conscience, unless a legitimate custom prevails in the diocese, either for better or worse.

The above considerations are of importance for understanding the next paragraph (§ 2), which mentions the obligation of restitution if a parish priest has obtained more than custom and fixed rates permit him to charge. Whatever he has acquired by overcharging, must be distributed for the benefit of pious causes. These, however, must not be understood to be the pastors themselves, but other persons or things, e. g., the poor of the parish, the parish church, if it is needy, or other poor churches, hospitals, and all kinds of charitable institutions approved by the Church, poor students aspiring to the priesthood or the religious state, etc.[76]

§ 3 governs the disposal of the stole fees received by a priest who has performed a function reserved to the pastor, either with or without the latter's permission. Such a one is not allowed to retain the sum which is fixed either by taxation or custom; but he may keep any surplus if it is evident that the donor intended it for the one who performed the ceremony. The Third Plenary Council[77] merely decreed that the bishops should determine the stole fees, hence it is a diocesan matter, often regulated by custom. It must always be understood that the tax holds good which is in vogue in the diocese of the parish priest whose rights the other has assumed. Sometimes the fees for marriage and funeral services, which appear more stable than the fees for baptism, differ in different manum; to base a salary or income upon such an uncertain source is contrary to common sense and common parlance, which styles them alms. The statement in Eccl. Rev., Vol. 58, p. 74, is unacceptable.

[76] Cfr. Engel, III, 25, n. 11; cfr. can. 1473.

[77] Acta et Decreta, n. 296 (l. c., p. 168).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google dioceses. It is ordinarily understood that a "stipendium pingue," given to one who is not the pastor, was intended for personal service and may, therefore, be kept after the customary fee has been handed over to the parish priest. Contrary diocesan statutes may now be disregarded, since the Code is the general law.

Concerning § 4 the Third Council of Baltimore established that priests should remember that ecclesiastical services should be given gratis to the poor and that this law should be re-inforced at diocesan synods.[78]

DUTIES OF PASTORS

CAN. 464

§ 1. Parochus ex officio tenetur curam animarum exercere in omnes suos paroecianos, qui non sint legitime exempti.

§ 2. Potest Episcopus iusta et gravi de causa religiosas familias et pias domos, quae in paroeciae territorio sint et a iure non exemptae, a parochi cura subducere.

The pastor is, by virtue of his office, obliged to exercise the care of souls towards all his parishioners who are not legitimately exempt. The bishop may, for just and weighty reasons, withdraw from the care of the pastor religious communities and pious houses located within the territory of the parish, even though they are not "exempt."

The "care of souls" comprises the spiritual direction of the faithful to the end for which the Church is established, i. e., the salvation of souls. The particular duties [78] Acta et Decreta, n. 296 (l. c.). Incidentally we may mention that the fee or donation for churching women or for sick calls, which are no parochial rights, does not belong to the pastor exclusively.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of pastors are pointed out in the following canons. From this care some are exempt ipso iure, others may be withdrawn by the positive will of the bishop. The former are the so-called exempt religious, of whom more will be said later. The bishop may grant quasi-exemption from parochial rights and care to religious families and pious houses, if there are just and weighty reasons for so doing. This power is a reminder of past times, when the bishop was considered the parish priest of the whole diocese. The ruling of the Code is not entirely new, for the semi-public oratories of brotherhoods and sisterhoods have long enjoyed certain privileges which curtailed the pastor's rights. However, in these general terms the principle laid down in § 2 of our canon is of rather recent date. After the division of dioceses into parishes, the bishop was no longer considered the parochus of the whole diocese, but only of the cathedral.[79] Hence the Code binds the bishop to "just and weighty reasons" for withdrawing anyone from the care of the pastor. Such a reason would be the merits of a religious community and their distinguished work for the common welfare, peace and tranquillity from vexations coming from the parish priest, suspicion or undue interference by the pastor with the internal and domestic affairs of the community, etc. The parish priest may appeal to the Holy See, but he has no right to demand reasons from the bishop, who is not responsible to the pastor. Finally, we may add that the fact that the canon names the bishop, not the Ordinary, appears to exclude vicars-general or vicars-capitular from granting this exemption.

79 Barbosa, De Parocho, c. 1, n. 21 f. (p. 5).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

OBLIGATION OF RESIDENCE

CAN. 465

§ 1. Parochus obligatione tenetur residendi in domo paroeciali prope suam ecclesiam; loci tamen Ordinarius potest iusta de causa permittere ut alibi commoretur, dummodo domus ab ecclesia paroeciali non ita distet ut paroecialium perfunctio munerum aliquid inde detrimenti capiat.

§ 2. Eidem abesse permittitur per duos ad summum intra annum menses sive continuos sive intermissos, nisi gravis causa, iudicio ipsius Ordinarii, vel diuturniorem absentiam requirat vel breviorem tantum permittat.

§ 3. Dies quibus parochus piis exercitiis vacat ad normam can. 126, non computantur, semel in anno, in duobus vacationum mensibus, de quibus in § 2.

§ 4. Sive continuum sive intermissum sit vacationum tempus, cum absentia ultra hebdomadam est duratura, parochus, praeter legitimam causam, habere debet Ordinarii scriptam licentiam et vicarium substitutum sui loco relinquere ab eodem Ordinario probandum; quod si parochus sit religiosus, indiget praeterea consensu Superioris et substitutus tum ab Ordinario tum a Superiore probari debet.

§ 5. Si parochus repentina et gravi de causa discedere atque ultra hebdomadam cogatur abesse, quamprimum per litteras Ordinarium commonefaciat, ei indicans causam discessus et sacerdotem supplentem, eiusque stet mandatis.

§ 6. Etiam pro tempore brevioris absentiae parochus debet fidelium necessitatibus providere, maxime si id peculiaria rerum adiuncta postulent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The pastor is obliged to reside in a parish house near his church. However, the Ordinary of the diocese may, for a just reason, allow him to live elsewhere, provided only his home is not so far away from the parish church that the performance of his parochial obligations would suffer thereby.

The pastor may take a two months' vacation, either continuous or interrupted, every year, provided there be no grave cause which, in the judgment of the Ordinary would require either a prolongation or shortening of this term.

The days of the yearly retreat (can. 126) are not included in the two months' vacation.

A pastor on vacation or absent from home for more than one full week, must have a legitimate excuse and the Ordinary's permission in writing, and, besides, provide a substitute to be approved by the Ordinary; if the parish priest is a religious, he needs also the permission of his superior, and his substitute must be accepted by both the Ordinary and the superior.

Should a parish priest, for a grave reason, be suddenly called away and compelled to be absent from home for more than a week, he must inform his Ordinary as soon as possible in writing, stating the reason for his leave and the name of his substitute, and abide by the Ordinary's commands.

Even during a shorter absence the pastor must provide for the wants of the faithful, especially if peculiar circumstances require it.

Little need be added to what has been said above concerning the residence of bishops. The present canon is nothing else but the embodiment of the Tridentine decrees [80] and of current practice, with some mitigation.

80 Sess. 6, c. 2, de ref.; cfr. Sess. 23, c. 1 de ref.; cfr. tit. 4, X de clericis non resid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The personal character of a pastor's duties requires his personal presence in his parish. Hence the presbytery should be near the parish church, and the pastor should reside therein during the day as well as by night. If a priest has a parish, say, two, three or four miles from the town where his parents live, he would, e. g., not be allowed to stay in the city, either at night or during the day, much less all the time, although he might have an assistant or substitute.[81] One who has a parish situated in a swampy place, where he is exposed to gout and rheumatism, is nevertheless bound to reside there, but he may ask the bishop for a longer vacation.[82] Smallpox, or the yellow fever, or any other epidemic may be raging in his parish, yet the parish priest must remain at his post, although he may employ another priest to administer the Sacraments to the stricken.[83] Neither age, nor ill health, nor the small number of families excuses the pastor from residence.[84] The decisions of the S. Congregation are firm and uniform in this regard. A pastor (shepherd) should prove himself worthy of his name, and not be a mercenary.[85]

§ 4 provides that a pastor needs the permission of his Ordinary (to be given in writing and gratis)[86] if he absents himself from his parish for over a week, even for the time of the vacation granted by law. In this there is a difference between bishops (or canons) and parish priests. Besides, pastors must have a "legitimate reason" for being away from their parish on Sundays or holydays of obligation. A legitimate reason would certainly be attending the sickbed or funeral of a relative, 81 S. C.C., May 10th, 1687 (Richter, Trid., p. 38, n. 11).

82 Richter, l. c., n. 12; n. 14.
83 Ibid., n. 13.
84 Ibid., n. 15, n. 17.
85 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 1 de ref.
86 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 1 de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

friend, or colleague, some installation or festivity, Forty Hours' devotion, or a call from the superior or the civil authorities, and any act of charity. As the bishop is to judge of the legitimacy of the reason,[87] it must be revealed to him.[88] Concerning the substitute, note that it is not sufficient simply to state that a substitute has been provided, but information must be furnished regarding his identity. It is evident that the parish priest must choose a substitute who has the necessary "faculties," or else obtain them for him from the bishop. As a rule it is safest to engage a priest or religious of the same diocese as a substitute. Should the bishop for some reason withhold the faculties from the substitute, the pastor must provide another, because the bishop is not obliged to grant faculties to a stranger. But neither is the substitute, especially if he be an exempt religious, obliged to undergo an examination before receiving temporary faculties. Hence prudence would dictate that the bishop should not demand too much in this regard.

The Code, as we said, mitigates the law of residence to some extent, especially concerning absence for less than a week, for which it requires neither a formal permission nor excuse. Formerly, according to some authors and a Roman synod held in 1725, an absence lasting more than two days required the Ordinary's permission.[89] The Code is silent concerning such a brief absence, and hence we may infer that it is not the lawgiver's intention to permit Ordinaries to set up a stricter rule, unless, of course, in particular cases, where grievous neglect of 87 Engel, III, 4, n. 14, de clericis non residentibus.

88 Therefore an oath of the pastor that the reason is sufficient would not have to be accepted by the bishop. Cfr. Bouix, De Parocho, p. 534 f.

89 Cfr. Bouix, l. c., p. 553.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pastoral duties might result.[90] Therefore § 5 obliges the pastor to provide for the spiritual needs of his flock during his absence. By the way, and in order to complete the matter, it may be added that under the Council of Trent and our Code the bishop may not give leave of absence lasting longer than the time allowed for vacation to a parish priest except for the sake of study.[91]

The residence of a pastor is sometimes styled "laboriosa," which means that it is no dolce far niente, but a life of constant labor, which demands that the pastor perform the parochial functions and duties himself and not by means of assistants. Of course what he is not able, physically or morally, to do himself, he may commit to his assistants, unless the law expressly forbids such commission or delegation.[92]

APPLICATION OF THE MASS PRO POPULO

CAN. 466

§ 1. Applicandae Missae pro populo obligatione tenetur parochus ad normam can. 339, quasi-parochus ad normam can. 306.

§ 2. Parochus qui plures forte paroecias aeque principaliter unitas regat aut, praeter propriam paroeciam, aliam vel alias in administrationem habeat, unam tantum debet Missam pro populis sibi commissis diebus praescriptis applicare.

§ 3. Ordinarius loci iusta de causa permittere potest ut parochus Missam pro populo alia die applicet ab ea qua iure adstringitur.

§ 4. Parochus Missam pro populo applicandam ce-

90 Concerning the penalties against non-resident clergymen, cfr. cc. 2168–2175, 2381.

91 Engel, III, 4, n. 11.

92 S. C. C., Oct. 7, 1604 (Richter, Trid., p. 39, n. 19 f. Bouix, l. c., p. 558 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lebret in ecclesia paroeciali, nisi rerum adiuncta Missam alibi celebrandam exigant aut suadeant.

§ 5. Legitime absens parochus potest Missam pro populo applicare vel ipse per se in loco in quo degit, vel per sacerdotem qui eius vices gerat in paroecia.

A parish priest is obliged to apply the Holy Mass for his people, the same as a bishop (can. 339); a quasi-pastor, according to the rules laid down in can. 306.

A pastor who governs two parishes united aeque principaliter, or one as his own and the other as administrator, is obliged to apply but one Mass for the people.

The Ordinary of the diocese may for a just reason grant permission to a parish priest to apply the Mass for the people on another than the prescribed day.

A pastor should say the Mass for the people in the parish church, unless circumstances require him to say it elsewhere.

A pastor who is legitimately absent from home may either himself apply the Mass for the people at his actual abode, or have it said by his substitute.

The obligation of offering the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for the people is based upon a divine law,[93] but the number of Masses to be applied has been established by ecclesiastical regulation. This obligation is incumbent on the pastor himself, if no legitimate reason excuses him, or, in other words, it is a personal obligation.[94] Of course, any legitimate cause (e. g., sickness, some other personal duty, application of the Mass for his parents in die depositionis or anniversarii, or for a public cause) 93 Trid., Sess. 22, de obser. etc.; S. C. C., Aug. 30, 1698. (Richter, Trid., p. 134, n. 32.); cf. what was said under can. 339.

94 Cfr. the decisions of the S. C. C. in Richter, l. c., n. 36; Bouix, l. c., p. 588 f.; but the S. C. admitted a legitimate in una, Ruremond, Feb. 27, 1848, Bouix, l. c. The mass may be either low or cantata; Bouix, l. c., p. 590.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google would justify him in having the Mass for the people said by another.

§ 2 of this enactment is based on the practice followed by the S. C. Concilii.[95]

As to § 4 and § 5 it may be said that canonists were somewhat more rigorous because of some decisions[96] which seemed to demand the celebration of the Mass for the people in the parish church. However, our Code does not insist upon this but leaves a wider margin. By employing the general term adiuncta, the lawgiver leaves it to the prudent judgment of the pastor whether these circumstances are or are not verified. Such circumstances would be the use of a winter chapel or school house, the repairing of a parish church, personal infirmity of the pastor, the convenience of the people, etc.

Note must be taken of the decree of the S. C. Consistorialis April 25, 1918, that the faculties granted to bishops are abrogated with regard to the present canon. Hence Ordinaries are not allowed to make any change as to this enactment. But we submit our humble judgment with regard to parish priests on account of what has been said under canon 451. If our parish priests are not pastors (parochi) in the strict sense, who is obliged to offer Mass for the people? The bishops themselves would have to apply for as many parishes as there are in each diocese.[96a]

Attention must also be drawn to decisions of the S. Rit. C., July 8, 1910, and May 27, 1911. The Missa pro populo, also on the feasts suppressed, must be that of the current day, and no missa de requie pro die obitus may be said nor that of a feast transferred on a 95 Cfr. Richter, l. c., p. 135, nn. 37–39.

96 Bouix, De Parocho, p. 591.

96a Untenable, because unjuridical, are the views proposed in the Record, of Louisville, Ky., June 20 and July 25, 1918.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sunday, if there is but one mass said in the parochial church.

Finally, can. 824, § 2 defines that a priest binating is not allowed to accept a stipend for either mass if he is obliged ex iustitia to apply one mass pro populo (except Christmas); but for the second mass he may accept some compensation ex titulo extrinseco. Thus we believe that a priest may say, e. g., a mass for the purgatorial society of the diocesan clergy (if the statutes do not bind him ex iustitia), or for the Holy Name Society, or the Holy Rosary Confraternity, if he does not receive a stipend properly so called for such a mass. A donation for the trouble would be a compensation ex titulo extrinseco, i. e., not intrinsically connected with the mass or the obligation arising ex iustitia.

PARTICULAR DUTIES

CAN. 467

§ 1. Debet parochus officia divina celebrare, administrare Sacramenta fidelibus, quoties legitime petant, suas oves cognoscere et errantes prudenter corrigere, pauperes ac miseros paterna caritate complecti, maximam curam adhibere in catholica puerorum institutione.

§ 2. Monendi sunt fideles ut frequenter, ubi commode id fieri possit, ad suas paroeciales ecclesias accedant ibique divinis officiis intersint et verbum Dei audiant.

The pastor is obliged to celebrate the divine services, to administer the Sacraments to the faithful as often as they legitimately demand them, to know his sheep and prudently to correct the erring, to bestow his paternal

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

care upon the poor and wretched, and to employ the greatest diligence in instructing the children in the Catholic religion.

The faithful should be admonished that, whenever convenient, they should attend divine worship and hear the word of God in their parish church.

By "divina officia" the Code no doubt means primarily the celebration of Holy Mass, and secondarily those other devotions which are, as it were, ramifications of the central act of worship. How often the pastor is obliged to say Mass on week-days is not stated in the Code. Unless there is a law of foundation, a custom, a diocesan rule, legacy or stipend, no juridical obligation of saying Mass daily can be imposed.[97] However, on account of frequent communion, it will be difficult now-a-days for a pastor who has no assistant to limit the celebration of the Mass to certain days.

Of the obligation of administering the Sacraments and the rules to be observed in this connection more will be said in the Third Book.[98]

That the pastor should know his sheep is Gospel teaching re-echoed by the Council of Trent.[99]

§ 2 of our canon imposes on the faithful the moral obligation of attending their parish churches. It cannot be denied that the parish organism has been somewhat weakened in the last century. Thus among the parochial functions we do not even read of the paschal communion, although the people are admonished to receive it in their own church.[1] This is certainly a change from ancient views if we remember that the proposition "that the 97 Cfr. Benedict XIV, Inst. Eccl. Just., 56, n. 6 (ed. Prati, 1844, p. 249).

98 Cfr. cc. 853 ff.; 901 ff.; 940 ff.

99 Cfr. John, 10, 14; 21, 15 ff.; 10, 12 f.; Trid., Sess. 23, c. 1, de ref.; on preaching and catechism, see cc. 1327 ff.

1 Can. 859, § 3: Suadendum, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

faithful were not bound to receive Holy Communion on Easter in their proper churches" was at one time branded as "falsa, scandalosa et temeraria." [2]

CARE OF THE SICK AND CHARITABLE WORKS

CAN. 468

§ 1. Sedula cura et effusa caritate debet parochus aegrotos in sua paroecia, maxime vero morti proximos, adiuvare, eos sollicite Sacramentis reficiendo eorumque animas Deo commendando.

§ 2. Parocho aliive sacerdoti qui infirmis assistat, facultas est eis concedendi benedictionem apostolicam cum indulgentia plenaria in articulo mortis, secundum formam a probatis liturgicis libris traditam, quam benedictionem impertiri ne omittat.

CAN. 469

Parochus diligenter advigilet ne quid contra fidem ac mores in sua paroecia, praesertim in scholis publicis et privatis, tradatur, et opera caritatis, fidei ac pietatis foveat aut instituat.

The parish priest should assist the sick of his parish, especially the dying, with diligent care and great charity, by administering the Sacraments and commending them to God.

The pastor or any other priest assisting the sick has the faculty to grant, and should not omit to impart, the 2 Benedict XIV, De Syn., IX, 16, 5. On account of can. 464, § 2, there is danger that exempt communities at times draw lay people to their chapels; but these communities as well as the bishop should see to it that no abuses are tolerated; can. 467, § 2, is evidence enough that the lawgiver wishes to see all the faithful in the parish churches.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Apostolic blessing with the plenary indulgence in articulo mortis, according to the formula contained in the approved liturgical books.

The current manuals of pastoral theology may be consulted concerning this point. We merely note that the faculty mentioned is given by the very fact that the patient is in a dangerous state which will probably result in death; hence no special communication of this faculty is needed.

Can. 469 directs the pastor to watch that nothing against faith or morals is taught in his parish, especially in the schools, and admonishes him to foster or establish works of charity, faith, and piety.

Note that when the pastor is called upon to watch, it is as watchman, not as iudex in causis fidei, which office is reserved to the bishops wherever the Holy Office cannot immediately exercise supervision.[3] Hence the pastors must report to the bishop. Concerning our so-called public schools, no direct interference by the pastor is possible or intended. Yet he may draw the attention of the school board to facts which he has learned from pupils or their parents. In America pastors are entitled to act as free citizens, and no doubt in many localities uniformity of action on the part of the clergy would result in the prevention of much harm on the part of biassed public-school teachers.

As to works of charity, faith, and piety the pastor shall use prudence and energy in fostering the same. What is suitable in one parish is not always suitable in another. Charity would dictate the fostering of St. Vincent de Paul conferences or similar institutions, and aid to hospitals and orphanages. The faith is promoted [3] H. Office, May 15, 1901 (Annal. Eccl., 1902, p. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by apologetic lectures and a staunch and wholesome Catholic press. Piety is aided by devotions approved by the Church. Sed ne quid nimis, not too many new-fangled practices!

PARISH BOOKS AND ARCHIVES

CAN. 470

§ 1. Habeat parochus libros paroeciales, idest librum baptizatorum, confirmatorum, matrimoniorum, defunctorum; etiam librum de statu animarum accurate conficere pro viribus curet; et omnes hos libros, secundum usum ab Ecclesia probatum vel a proprio Ordinario praescriptum, conscribat ac diligenter asservet.

§ 2. In libro baptizatorum adnotetur quoque si baptizatus confirmationem receperit, matrimonium contraxerit, salvo praescripto can. 1107, aut sacrum subdiaconatus ordinem susceperit, vel professionem sollemnem emiserit, eaeque adnotationes in documenta accepti baptismatis semper referantur.

§ 3. In fine cuiuslibet anni parochus authenticum exemplar librorum paroecialium ad Curiam episcopalem transmittat, excepto libro de statu animarum.

§ 4. Paroeciali utatur sigillo habeatque tabularium, seu archivum, in quo memorati libri custodiantur una cum Episcoporum epistolis, aliisque documentis, necessitatis vel utilitatis causa servandis; quae omnia, ab Ordinario vel eius delegato visitationis vel alio opportuno tempore inspicienda, religiose caveat ne ad extraneorum manus perveniant.

Every pastor shall keep parish books, especially a record of baptisms, confirmations, marriages, and deaths,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and take an accurate census of his parishioners. All these records must be kept according to the customary ecclesiastical rules, or as prescribed by the Ordinary, and carefully preserved.

The baptismal book should also contain notice as to whether and when the person baptized has received confirmation, was married, received subdeaconship, or made solemn vows. All these details should be embodied in the baptismal certificate, if asked for.

At the end of each year the pastor shall send a copy of all the parish books, except the status animarum, to the episcopal court.

The pastor should have a parish seal and archives in which said books, together with episcopal letters and other necessary or useful documents may be safely kept. Seal and archives are to be inspected by the Ordinary or his delegate at the diocesan visitation or at some other convenient time. The pastor shall take conscientious care that these documents do not get into strange hands.

The new law is certainly careful that the official documents be properly written and kept, and any one who has had to deal with documents in an official capacity (for instance, as defensor vinculi), will hail the solicitude of the lawgiver in this matter. It may perhaps be tedious, until good habits are contracted, but the fruits will prove priceless.

The most complicated parochial book is the baptismal record, which should contain four extra rubrics or separate columns,— one for confirmation, one for matrimony, one for subdeaconship, and one for solemn profession. Why the latter two are mentioned is evident from the fact that they are impedimenta dirimentia and have other juridical consequences. That these documents should, as

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4 prescribes, be conscientiously kept from profane eyes is very necessary. For official documents of a private character are not intended for those not entitled to know their contents. This secrecy should also be observed towards domestics and other persons wont to frequent the parish house.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER X

ASSISTANT PRIESTS (VICARS)

The English term "assistant priests" for the Latin vicarii paroeciales is perhaps too narrow, inasmuch it includes only one species, viz., those who help disabled or occupied pastors; whilst one whole class of vicars would be excluded, namely, those who are actual parish priests in time of vacancy or who take the place of a habitual pastor. In some countries, e. g., Bavaria and Austria, pastors have cooperatores and coadiutores, or chaplains, as they are sometimes called. We may retain the term assistant priests because of its common use. The different classes may easily be distinguished by circumlocution.

VICARS PROPER

CAN. 471

§ 1. Si paroecia pleno iure fuerit unita domui religiosae, ecclesiae capitulari vel alii personae morali, debet constitui vicarius, qui actualem curam gerat animarum, assignata eidem congrua fructuum portione, arbitrio Episcopi.

§ 2. Excepto casu tum legitimi privilegii aut consuetudinis, tum dotationis vicariae ab Episcopo factae, reservata sibi libera nominatione, vicarium praesentat Superior religiosus, Capitulum aliave persona moralis; loci autem Ordinarius eundem, si idoneum, servato praescripto can. 459, repererit, instituat.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Vicarius si sit religiosus, est amovibilis sicut parochus religiosus de quo in can. 454, § 5; ceteri omnes vicarii ex parte praesentantis sunt perpetui, sed ab Ordinario possunt, ad instar parochorum, removeri, monito eo qui praesentavit.

§ 4. Ad vicarium exclusive pertinet tota animarum cura cum omnibus parochorum iuribus et obligationibus ad normam iuris communis et secundum probata statuta dioecesana vel laudabiles consuetudines.

A parish which is pleno iure united to a religious community, a chapter church, or another moral person, must have a vicar, who has the actual care of souls, and a decent support should be assigned to him according to the judgment of the bishop.

Save in the case of a legitimate privilege or custom, or an endowment made by the bishop, who may have reserved the designation of a vicar, the right of designating the vicar belongs to the religious superior or chapter or moral person; but if found fit according to Can. 457, the Ordinary of the diocese shall grant him the investiture.

The assistant, if he be a religious, is removable like the pastor (can. 454, § 5); while all other vicars are perpetual as far as the presenting party is concerned, but may be removed like parish priests by the bishop, after having informed the one who presented the vicar.

To the vicar exclusively belongs the care of souls with all the parochial rights and obligations according to the common law of the Church and approved diocesan statutes or praiseworthy custom.

This whole canon treats of vicars in the proper sense, viz., such who enjoy the full rights of pastors. They are actual parish priests, whilst the habitual pastorship resides with a juridical person, whose rights consist chiefly in presenting a vicar and receiving the revenues which remain after subtracting the expenses necessary for the decent support of the vicar.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1 speaks of parishes incorporated in a juridic person pleno iure, i. e., as to temporal and spiritual matters, which union, as stated above, can be enacted only by the Apostolic See. If a monastery has a parish not fully united, it cannot appoint a vicar from among its own members, if the nature of the order or religious institute does not permit that its members be vicars in perpetuum.[1] A chapter can appoint one of its own members (canons) as pastor, but he needs the approval of the bishop, or his investiture. After his investiture the vicar has the full care of souls, and, as § 4 states, all the rights and duties of a pastor. Besides, he is entitled to decent support. The salary must be determined by the bishop. It is useless to say that the Constitution of Pius V, "Ad exequendam" (May 1, 1567) cannot be followed verbally. (This Constitution demanded at least 50 scudi, and not more than 100 scudi, or $100.) The underlying principle still holds good, viz., that those who bear the burden should enjoy the benefits, and that the support of a pastor should be certain, not an uncertain amount from stole fees or similar sources, but a determined sum.[2] Benedict XIV by his Constitution "Cum semper oblatas," Aug. 19, 1744, which was immediately intended for Italy but contains guiding principles for the whole world, gave the bishops full power to determine the "congrua."[3] This is followed by the new Code. Hence the bishop shall establish what we call the salary of vicars, or assistant priests, not including in it uncertain revenues

1 Cf. Trid., Sess. 7, c. 7 de ref. Richter, Trid., p. 53, n. 12.

2 Cf. Richter, Trid., p. 54; Santi-Leitner, I, 28 n. 14 (Vol. 1, 228).

3 Bull. Bened. XIV, ed. Prati, 1845, t. I, p. 595.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(stole fees, collections, etc.). It is, of course, immaterial whence the salary is taken, whether from pew rent, collections, or other resources, provided only it is stable and sufficient for decent support.

§ 2 establishes the right of presentation and investiture or institutio. The former is inherent in the juridical person to whom the parish is pleno iure united. However, there may be other persons competent to present the vicar; thus by reason of a legitimate privilege, or custom, or donation made by the bishop, the latter may reserve to himself the right of presentation. For endowment, properly made, creates the iuspatronatus, of which the Code treats in the Third Book. With these exceptions the right of presentation remains in the moral person.

Presentation does not confer the titulus or actual right of administering the parish. This is given by investiture, and must be done upon examination or concursus, if the latter is customary in the province, according to canon 459. Should the examination prove the candidate presented to be unfit, those who have the right of presentation must offer another. But if the one presented is found fit, the bishop is obliged to invest him, otherwise he would infringe upon the rights of a third person. This investiture is no mere installation, but confers the ius in re, or actual possession, in our language, the conferring of faculties. As soon as the vicar is invested, the whole care of souls (§ 4) devolves upon him; neither have the members of the chapter or monastery the right of meddling with his administration.[4]

§ 3 describes the manner of removing a vicar. If the vicar is a religious, he may be removed as stated in can. 454, § 5, i. e., by the bishop or his superior. Religious, as

[4] S. C. C. June 2, 1731, "Nullius Montis Cassini" (Richter, Trid., p. 53, n. 14).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

we shall see in the treatise on religious, are capable of administering parishes, but only as temporary, not as perpetual vicars.[5] If the vicar is taken from the secular clergy, he is perpetual, i. e., neither the chapter or moral person nor the bishop can remove him at will; but the bishop must proceed in the manner required for the removal of parish priests. The bishop is also obliged to inform the juridical person of the removal. Wherefore the trial prescribed in the Fourth Book must be instituted in cases of removal.[6]

VICARS AD INTERIM

CAN. 472.

Vacante paroecia:

1.° Ordinarius loci in ea quamprimum constituat idoneum vicarium oeconomum, de consensu Superioris, si de religioso agatur, qui eam tempore vacationis regat, assignata eidem parte fructuum pro congrua sustentatione;

2.° Ante oeconomi constitutionem, paroeciae regimen, nisi aliter provisum fuerit, assumat interim vicarius cooperator; si plures vicarii sint, primus; si omnes aequales, munere antiquior; si vicarii desint, parochus vicinior; si tandem agatur de paroecia religiosis concredita, domus Superior; loci autem Ordinarius in Synodo vel extra Synodum tempestive determinet quaenam paroecia cuique paroeciae vicinior habenda sit;

3.° Qui paroeciae regimen ad normam n. 2 assumpsit, debet loci Ordinarium de paroeciae vacatione statim certiorem facere.

[5] Cfr. Richter, Trid., n. 15, p. 53. [6] Cfr. c. 3, X, I, 28; c. un. 6°, III, 18; Acta S. S., XII, 284 f.; Wernz, Jus. Dec., II, p. 1058 (ed. 1); cf. cc. 2147 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If a parish becomes vacant, (1) the Ordinary of the diocese shall, as soon as possible, appoint a fit oeconomus or administrator, (with the consent of the religious superior if the administrator is to be a religious), who shall govern the parish during the vacancy and receive part of the income for his support. (2) Before the administrator is appointed, unless otherwise provided, the assistant shall rule the parish, and if there are several assistant priests, the first in rank, or if all are equal in rank, the senior assistant shall assume the office of pastor ad interim. If there are no assistant priests, the nearest parish priest shall assume the same office; in parishes entrusted to religious the superior of the house shall act in the same capacity. The Ordinary of the diocese shall in due time, either at or outside the synod, determine which is to be considered the nearest parish. (3) Whoever has assumed the ad interim administration of a parish, must inform the Ordinary of the diocese of the vacancy.

The Council of Trent ordained that a vicarius be appointed by the bishop as soon as the latter receives notice of the vacancy of a parish.[7] The term oeconomus also[8] occurs in connection with the vacancy of episcopal sees. Oeconomus here means a vicar or administrator, who shall take charge of the parish until a new pastor is legitimately appointed and has taken possession. Until this oeconomus is appointed, the assistant priest shall "run" the parish. Then the Code sets forth various eventualities which may occur in larger parishes. Where there is no assistant, the neighboring priest should take care of the widowed parish ad interim. The text speaks of the parochus vicinior and says he should be determined by the bishop. The parochus vicinior is the one

7 Sess. 24, c. 18, de ref.

8 Sess. 24, c. 16, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

whose parish church is in a direct line the next from the vacant parish church.[9] However, although the direct line may be shorter between parish church A (vacant) and parish church B, yet it may be that the pastor of parish C has better communications with A, on account of superior railroad or automobile or road facilities. Therefore it is left to the judgment of the bishop to decide who is the nearer pastor.

The time during which the ad interim assistant or neighboring priest shall have charge of the vacant parish is not stated. The Council of Trent urged speedy provision (statim) by means of a vicar and then, after ten days, public announcement[10] of the examination. But since the Code does not determine the time, the Ordinary should proceed at once to the appointment of a temporary vicar, and hold the examination (or, if prescribed, the concursus), so that the vacancy may not last too long, to the detriment of the vacant church.

CAN. 473

§ 1. Vicarius oeconomus iisdem iuribus gaudet iisdemque officiis adstringitur, ac parochus, in iis quae animarum curam spectant; nihil tamen ipsi agere in paroecia licet, quod praeiudicium afferre possit iuribus parochi aut beneficii paroecialis.

§ 2. Oeconomus novo parocho vel oeconomo successori coram vicario foraneo vel alio sacerdote ab Ordinario designato tradat clavem archivi et inventarium librorum ac documentorum aliarumque rerum quae ad paroeciam pertinent, et rationem reddat accepti et expensi tempore administrationis.

9 Cf. Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 12, 16; Santi-Leitner, I, n. 1, 11, n. 36 (Vol. I, p. 135.)

10 Sess. 24, c. 18 de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The temporary administrator enjoys the same rights and is subject to the same obligations as the parish priest in whatever pertains to the care of souls; but he is not allowed to do anything that might prove prejudicial to the rights of the pastor or parish.

The administrator shall hand over the key of the archives to the new pastor, or a new administrator, in presence of the rural dean or a priest appointed by the Ordinary, as also the inventory of the books and documents and other things pertaining to the parish, and render an account of the receipts and expenses during his administration.

The juridical position of the administrator is here defined in general: He is pastor with all the rights and obligations [11] attendant upon the care of souls, but he does not hold the parish in his own name (in titulum), and must therefore abstain from asserting rights proper to the parish priest. For instance, if a religious institute or a charitable institution or school is under the care of the pastor, the administrator should not surrender any right to the chaplain of that institute, unless otherwise stipulated. Neither should he assume obligations which may prove burdensome to the new parish priest, for instance in hearing confessions or preaching beyond what the law and previous observance require. Prejudicial to the parish would be contracting debts or alienating property or changing boundary lines. The administrator may improve the material condition of the parish, e. g., by getting a cheaper rate of interest on money borrowed, by repairing the buildings if it should prove necessary or an unforeseen accident calls for repairs, etc.

11 Hence he is bound to the application of the missa pro populo, to residence, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TEMPORARY SUBSTITUTES

CAN. 474

Vicarius substitutus qui constituitur ad normam can. 465, §§ 4, 5 et can. 1923, § 2, locum parochi tenet in omnibus quae ad curam animarum spectant, nisi Ordinarius loci vel parochus aliquid exceperint.

The substitute who takes the place of an absent pastor or of one who has been deprived of his parish and appealed to Rome (can. 1923, § 2) has charge of whatever pertains to the care of souls, unless the Ordinary of the diocese or the parish priest have made exceptions.

Absence has been considered supra, can. 465. The substitute who is assigned for the spiritual welfare of the flock, should not interfere with the material administration unless absolute necessity requires. Besides, he must follow the reasonable instructions of the absent pastor. We emphasize reasonable, because it sometimes happens that an absent priest lays down regulations (for instance, with regard to visiting families or institutes, services, etc.) which can hardly be styled reasonable. The parish priest may except assistance at marriages, unless his absence should last too long, in which case the substitute would have to apply to the Ordinary. The latter, too, may make exceptions when approving the substitute. But unless formally stated and clearly set forth in writing, the Ordinary is not supposed to have made exceptions. If these touch the hearing of confessions, assistance at marriages, etc., they must be strictly complied with by the substitute. Preaching, too, might be excepted, for reasons which the bishop is not bound to prove or state.[12] 12 The "Congrua" or decent support of the substitute may be settled between the absent pastor and the substitute. C. C., March 15, 1738, (Richter, Trid., p. 38, n. 18).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Canons 475 sq. treat of what are properly called assistant priests. The first mentions such as are given to priests who for some reason are unable to perform their duties and are styled coadiutores; the other speaks of cooperatores, i. e., helpers given to overburdened pastors.

ASSISTANTS PROPER

CAN. 475

§ 1. Si parochus ob senectutem, mentis vitium, imperitiam, caecitatem aliamve permanentem causam suis muniis rite obeundis impar evaserit, Ordinarius loci det vicarium adiutorem, praesentatum a Superiore, si de paroecia agatur religiosis concredita, qui suppleat eius vicem, assignata eidem congrua fructuum portione, nisi aliter provisum sit.

§ 2. Adiutori, si in omnibus suppleat parochi vicem, iura omnia et officia competunt parochorum propria, excepta Missae applicatione pro populo quae parochum gravat; si vero suppleat ex parte dumtaxat, eius iura et obligationes desumantur ex litteris deputationis.

§ 3. Si parochus sit sui compos, adiutor operam suam praestare debet sub eiusdem auctoritate secundum Ordinarii litteras.

§ 4. Quod si per vicarium adiutorem bono animarum provideri nequeat, locus est parochi amotioni ad normam can. 2147–2161.

If a pastor, by reason of age, mental debility, inexperience, blindness, or any other permanent cause, becomes incapable of discharging his duties properly, the Ordinary of the diocese should give him a coadjutor (presented by the religious superior if the parish belongs to religious) to take his place and to receive the necessary

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google support from the revenues, unless provided otherwise.

To this coadjutor, if he takes the pastor's place to the full extent, belong all the rights and obligations incumbent on parish priests, with the exception of the application of the Mass pro populo; but if he takes the pastor's place only in part, his rights and obligations must be determined by his letter of appointment.

If the pastor is of sound mind, the coadjutor must discharge his office under authority of the pastor, according to the faculties given by the Ordinary.

If the welfare of souls cannot be properly taken care of by a coadjutor, the pastor may be removed, according to cc. 2147–2161.

According to the very humane adage, several times repeated in the old law,[13] "Afflicto afflictio non est addenda," the Code provides a coadjutor for a priest who is in any way incapable of properly performing his pastoral duties.

The first reason is old age, which with some comes sooner, with others later, but nearly always entails unpleasant consequences, weakened eyesight, hard hearing, etc. A definite age-limit is difficult to draw. The Decretals, when speaking of old age as a reason for resignation, define it as debility proceeding from age and entailing some weakness which renders a priest incapable of discharging the pastoral office.[14] Seventy is considered in law as the age of senes or old men.[15] Practically, age must be measured by physical frailty rather than by a certain number of years.

The mental debility next mentioned in our canon is a 13 Cfr. c. 2, C. 7, q. 21 (Greg. M.); c. 5, X, III, 6, de clerico aegrotante.

14 c. 10, X, I, 9.

15 Reiffenstuel, II, 6, n. 8 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

habitual vitium mentis. Insanity, therefore, even in its milder forms, certainly falls under this category.

Imperitia is inexperience. The Latin word refers to practical rather than speculative science; wherefore it does not, primarily, imply ignorance, such as was mentioned side by side with inexperience in the decree "Maxima cura," Aug. 20, 1910, from which our text is apparently taken. Inexperience here means rudeness, imprudence, etc., in the confessional, or on the pulpit, or in dealing with the people[16]

Blindness (caecitas) differs from weak eyesight or half blindness (caecutiens), which do not entirely destroy the faculty of sight. All these bodily ailments are supposed to be incurable or permanent.

These four and similar reasons (e. g., deafness or some other permanent disability, especially when of an incurable nature) justify the bishop in giving an assistant to the afflicted pastor. In case the parish is in charge of religious, the assistant must be presented by the religious superior. Here we draw attention to the fact that even a religious is entitled to the benefits of the law, though not, of course, to the detriment of the parish.

The powers or faculties of the assistant are described in §§ 2 and 3. Their extent must be gauged partly by the condition of the pastor, partly by the letters of appointment or credentials. No general rule can be established. The assistant is entitled to the congrua, as per § 1. This may, especially in poor parishes, cause some trouble. The assistant would have to be paid from the salary of the pastor; this would perhaps mean privation for the sufferer, who, in case of sickness, would need more than his salary. On the other hand, a poor parish 16 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 6, speaks of "illiterati et imperiti," but illiterate priests are no longer found.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can ill afford to pay two priests. Hence an infirm priests' fund should be established in every diocese. Some kind of an insurance or pension fund would also help in this direction. If money can be raised by non-Catholic sects for pensioning their ministers, we do not see why this should be impossible among Catholics.

The last paragraph mentions removal. If the welfare of souls cannot be procured by an assistant, the bishop must proceed to remove the pastor, according to cc. 2147 ff. For the welfare of souls is the supreme law.

COADJUTORS

CAN. 476

§ 1. Si parochus propter populi multitudinem aliasve causas nequeat, iudicio Ordinarii, solus convenientem curam gerere paroeciae, eidem detur unus vel plures vicarii cooperatores, quibus congrua remuneratio assignetur.

§ 2. Vicarii cooperatores constitui possunt sive pro universa paroecia, sive pro determinata paroeciae parte.

§ 3. Non ad parochum, sed ad loci Ordinarium, audito parocho, competit ius nominandi vicarios cooperatores e clero saeculari.

§ 4. Vicarios cooperatores religiosos Superior cui id ex constitutionibus competit, audito parocho, praesentat Ordinario, cuius est eosdem approbare.

§ 5. Vicarius cooperator obligatione tenetur in paroecia residendi secundum statuta dioecesana vel laudabiles consuetudines aut Episcopi praescriptum; imo prudenter curet Ordinarius, ad normam can. 134, ut in eadem paroeciali domo commoretur.

§ 6. Eius iura et obligationes ex statutis dioecesanis, ex litteris Ordinarii et ex ipsius parochi commis-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sione desumantur; sed, nisi aliud expresse caveatur, ipse debet ratione officii parochi vicem supplere eumque adiuvare in universo paroeciali ministerio, excepta applicatione Missae pro populo.

§ 7. Subest parocho, qui eum paterne instruat ac dirigat in cura animarum, ei invigilet et saltem quotannis ad Ordinarium de eodem referat.

§ 8. Si nec per vicarios cooperatores spirituali fidelium bono consuli rite queat, Episcopus provideat ad normam can. 1427.

If, on account of the large number of people in a parish, or for other reasons, the pastor, in the judgment of the Ordinary, is unable to take proper care of the parish, he should be given one or more cooperatores or assistants, to whom a sufficient salary should be assigned.

Such assistants may be appointed either for the whole parish at large or for a particular part thereof.

Not to the pastor, but to the Ordinary of the diocese, upon having heard the pastor, belongs the right to nominate assistants from among the secular clergy.

Assistants belonging to a religious order must be presented by the competent superior, upon having heard the pastor, to the Ordinary for his approval.

The assistant is obliged to reside in the parish, according to the diocesan statutes, or praiseworthy custom, or the episcopal injunction. The Ordinary should see to it, according to can. 130, that the assistants dwell in the parish house.

Their rights and obligations must be determined from the diocesan statutes, the letters of the Ordinary, and the instructions of the pastor; however, unless the contrary is expressly stated, they take the place of the pastor in virtue of their office and must assist him in the entire ministry of the parish, except only in the application of the Mass for the people.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The assistant is subject to the pastor, who should paternally instruct and advise him in the care of souls, watch over him, and at least once a year report to the Ordinary about him.

If the spiritual welfare of the faithful cannot be procured by means of assistants, the Ordinary should proceed according to can. 1427.

The Council of Trent enjoined the bishops to compel pastors whose parishes were so large that one priest alone could not administer the Sacraments or perform the divine service, to take unto themselves co-laborers.[17] Our canon mentions the same reason, but adds, "aliasve causas." Some "other reasons" might be distance or increased pastoral work, for instance, in the parish schools or hospitals, increased frequentation of the Sacraments, such as is very perceptible now-a-days in many parishes of this country. The assistant may then be appointed either for the parish at large, or for some portion thereof, which latter would be the case if there were a chapel or oratory for the convenience of the more distant parishioners. Even where there is no chapel or oratory, it might be that the assistant would have to attend a group of parishioners speaking a different language (German, Italian, Polish, etc.).

§ 3 and § 4 speak of the appointment. According to the Council of Trent[18] the designation of an assistant was left in the hands of the pastor, who, however, could be compelled to take an assistant. Various provincial councils gave to the bishops the power to appoint assistants.[19] Therefore it may be said that our canon em-

17 Sess. 21, c. 4 de ref.
18 Ib
19 Conc. Quebec., de vicariis; Conc. Hib. Thurl. de coadjutoribus; cf. Coll. Lac., III, 657, 790.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bodies the common law arising from a practice otherwise established. Something of the old rights of parish priests remains, for the bishop is obliged to ask the opinion of the pastor concerning the necessity of appointing an assistant. But if the Ordinary is convinced of the necessity, he may appoint an assistant even against the will of the pastor.[20]

If the parish belongs to a religious community, the assistant to be appointed must be presented by the competent superior. This competency, as said above, is determined by the constitutions of the respective community. But in the case of religious, too, the pastor should be heard as to the necessity, not the person, of the assistant. The bishop in giving his approval also imparts the necessary powers.

These powers are determined (§ 6) by the diocesan statutes, the credentials of the Ordinary, and the commission of the pastor. Note the descending scale. First and above all the diocesan statutes[21] should regulate the juridical position of the assistants. After that the letters of deputation sent by the bishop must be inspected, because it may be that these either extend or restrict the rights given by the diocesan statutes, which the bishop can do at random, he being the sole legislator of the diocesan laws. Besides, it may be that the bishop has in the meantime received more ample faculties, which he is willing to communicate. As to the commission of the pastor, it must be noticed that he is not allowed to limit or curtail the rights of his assistants, as granted by the diocesan statutes or the letters of the bishop, unless these letters contain a restriction in favor of the pastor. The 20 Cf. can. 105.

21 It would not be out of place if, in order to give authority and produce uniformity, a plenary council would establish some rules to that effect.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google parish priest is allowed to set up his own regulations, but they must not clash with the common law, the episcopal credentials, or the diocesan statutes.

§ 5 enjoins residence and dwelling in the same parish house, which is generally observed in the U. S. Some holidays are to be granted to assistants.

A very remarkable passage is that which says that the assistant, by virtue of his office, takes the place of the pastor. This means that no subdelegation in the proper sense is needed, for "by virtue of his office" signifies that by his very appointment the assistant can do what the pastor is empowered to do, unless the latter excepts something especially.

§ 7 speaks of the relation between pastor and assistant. It may not be amiss here to add what the Second Provincial Council of Quebec (A. D. 1854) enacted concerning this point: "The assistants shall diligently endeavor to act in uniformity with the pastor, for too great discrepancy in the practice of the sacred ministry might turn to destruction rather than edification. Besides, they shall most carefully avoid whatever in words or deeds might belittle the pastor, but in all things conduct themselves modestly, and diligently further the welfare of the people." [22]

We may sum up the relation between pastor and assistant as follows:

(a) Appointment is made by the Ordinary upon having heard the pastor;

(b) The assistant is bound to residence, because he must aid the pastor;

(c) According to can. 460, the pastor is the one admin-

[22] Coll. Lac., III, 657.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

istrator of the parish, because of the unity desired by the Church in the government of the parish;

(d) If the pastor, or the letters of appointment, or the diocesan statutes except nothing, the assistant is ratione officii supposed to possess all the powers of the pastor, assistance at marriages not excluded (can. 1096, § 1), especially during the absence of the pastor;

(e) The application of the missa pro populo is incumbent on the pastor only.

The last paragraph provides for the division or dismemberment of a parish, if effective parish work cannot be secured even by means of assistants (can. 1427).

REMOVAL

CAN. 477

§ 1. Vicarii paroeciales de quibus in can. 472–476, si religiosi sint, amoveri possunt ad normam can. 454, § 5; secus ad nutum Episcopi vel Vicarii Capitularis, non autem Vicarii Generalis sine mandato speciali.

§ 2. Quod si vicaria sit beneficialis, vicarius cooperator removeri potest processu ad normam iuris, non solum ob causas propter quas alii parochi removeri possunt, sed etiam si graviter subiectioni defecerit parocho debitae in exercitio suarum functionum.

The vicars spoken of in can. 472–476, if they are religious, may be removed according to can. 454, § 5; if secular priests, they may be removed by the bishop or the vicar-capitular, but not by the vicar-general, unless he has a special mandate.

If a benefice is attached to the vicar's office, the cooperator may be removed, upon trial conducted according to law, for reasons which admit the removal of a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google parish priest, but also for any grievous insubordination shown to the parish priest in the exercise of the ministry.

Removal was spoken of in can. 454, concerning religious. A secular assistant may be removed at the good pleasure of the bishop or the vicar-capitular (administrator) during a vacancy. But the vicar-general needs a special mandate for that purpose. Of course, by removal is not meant dismissal from the diocese; for such a penalty cannot be inflicted without due process, as will be seen in the penal Code. Even assistants must be treated according to the law.

§ 2 considers the case of an ecclesiastical benefice being attached to the office of an assistant. This is the case in many dioceses of Europe, especially in countries where Church and State are closely connected. To such benefices is often attached the iuspatronatus, either laicalis or ecclesiasticus, and a removal is not so easily carried out. Besides, the objective perpetuity of the benefice seems to constitute a title to permanency. Note, however, that the term cooperator is here expressly used, not coadiutor; wherefore a cooperator is of a more stable character. To remove a cooperator, then, requires a trial, but the reasons need be less weighty than those for the removal of a pastor.

PRECEDENCE OF ASSISTANTS

CAN. 478

§ 1. Sicut parochus ecclesiae cathedralis, ita vicarius paroecialis Capituli cathedralis praecedit omnibus aliis dioecesis parochis aut vicariis; oeconomi vero ius praecedentiae regitur normis in can. 106 statutis.

§ 2. Vicarii substituti et adiutores praecedunt, dum

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in munere manent, vicariis cooperatoribus; hi aliis sacerdotibus ecclesiae paroeciali addictis.

As the cathedral pastor, so the assistant of the cathedral parish enjoys precedence over all other pastors and assistants of the diocese; the precedence of the oeconomus is governed by the general rules laid down in can. 106.

Substitutes and assistants (adiutores) take precedence over cooperatores, and these in turn over all other priests attached to the parish church.

The first paragraph may surprise the one or other master of ceremonies in the U. S. For, if we mistake not, the assistants of cathedral churches had to give way to pastors. The Code seems to reverse the order. Yet we believe that the reversal is only apparent. For it must be remembered that the Code speaks of cathedral chapters made up of canons, one of whom is parish priest, and another, perhaps, assistant, if the assistant is not taken from the beneficiaries belonging to the chapter. This state of affairs is quite different from that obtaining in our country, and hence we believe, until a final decision is made by the Apostolic See or a Plenary Council, the old practice must be followed; i. e., the parish priests take precedence over all assistants, even those of the cathedral.

The oeconomus mentioned in § 1 is the one spoken of in can. 432, who has temporal care of the diocese during its vacancy. However, we would not exclude the oeconomus of a vacant parish. To this class must be applied the general rules of precedence (can. 106).

That the substitutes and coadjutors of pastors should take precedence over the assistants proper may be deduced from the law of representation; they represent pastors,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google who are in possession of precedence, whilst the assistants, as such, do not represent pastors. This law of representation must also be applied to religious who are substitutes of pastors, because the canon makes no distinction. But the general rules laid down in can. 106 must be followed here.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER XI

RECTORS OF CHURCHES

We said above that, besides the baptismal churches, other oratories were sometimes erected, especially by landlords for their families and dependents, which, however, were not distinguished by a baptismal font. Chapter XI treats of a class of churches which seem to be a relic of such public oratories without parochial rights.

CAN. 479

§ 1. Nomine rectorum ecclesiarum hic veniunt sacerdotes, quibus cura demandatur alicuius ecclesiae, quae nec paroecialis sit nec capitularis, nec adnexa domui communitatis religiosae, quae in eadem officia celebret.

§ 2. De cappellano religiosarum, sodalium virorum religionis laicalis, confraternitatis vel alius legitimae associationis, serventur particularium canonum praescripta.

CAN. 480

§ 1. Ecclesiarum rectores libere nominantur ab Ordinario loci, salvo iure eligendi aut praesentandi, si cui legitime competat; quo in casu Ordinarii est rectorem approbare.

§ 2. Licet ecclesia pertineat ad aliquam religionem exemptam, rector tamen a Superiore nominatus debet ab Ordinario loci approbari.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Si ecclesia coniuncta sit cum Seminario aliove collegio quod a clericis regitur, Superior Seminarii vel collegii est simul ecclesiae rector, nisi aliter loci Ordinarius constituerit.

Rectors of churches are priests who take care of a church which is neither a parish nor a capitular church, nor entrusted to a religious community.

As to chaplains of nuns and lay religious, confraternities or sodalities, the special rules concerning them must be observed.

To our knowledge there are not many such chapels of ease, as they might be styled, in our country. For the church whose holder is here called rector, is not one of the usual parochial places of worship and sacred ministry (see can. 481), but usually a beneficiary church, such as there are in the old country, with the character of public oratories.

The rectors of such churches, according to can. 480, are freely named by the Ordinary of the diocese or approved by him, if the right of election or presentation can be lawfully claimed by some one else.

If such churches belong to an exempt order, the rector named by the religious superior must be approved by the Ordinary of the diocese.

If such a church is united with a seminary, or college ruled by the clergy, the superior of this seminary or college is at the same time rector of the church, unless the Ordinary of the diocese has determined otherwise.

Approbation here means nothing else than the ratification of the rectors presented. The bishop is not entitled to subject them to an examination, because the care of souls, properly so-called, is not attached to such churches. However, if faculties for hearing confession are demanded or granted, the bishop may have the rector examined. That the hearing of confessions is not forbidden in such churches appears, at least negatively, from the following canons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 481

In ecclesia sibi commissa rector functiones paroeciales peragere nequit.

CAN. 482

Ecclesiae rector potest divina officia etiam sollemnia ibidem celebrare, salvis legitimis fundationis legibus et dummodo non noceant ministerio paroeciali; in dubio autem utrum huiusmodi detrimentum contingat, necne, Ordinarii loci est rem dirimere et opportunas normas praescribere ad illud evitandum.

In such churches the rector is not allowed to exercise parochial functions; but he may hold solemn divine services, unless the laws of foundation, or detriment to the parochial ministry, should prevent; however, where there is doubt of such a damage befalling a parish, the Ordinary of the diocese should settle the question and make provisions to avoid it.

CAN. 483

Si ecclesia, Ordinarii loci iudicio, ita a paroeciali distet ut paroeciani non sine gravi incommodo possint paroecialem ecclesiam adire ibique divinis officiis interesse:

1.° Loci Ordinarius, gravibus quoque statutis poenis, potest rectori praecipere ut horis populo commodioribus officia celebret, fidelibus dies festos ac ieiunia

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

denuntiet et catecheticam instructionem et Evangelii explicationem tradat;

2.° Parochus potest ex eadem sanctissimum Sacramentum, inibi ad normam can. 1265 forte asservatum, pro infirmis desumere.

If, in the Ordinary's judgment, the church is so far distant from the parish church that the parishioners can frequent the parish church only with great inconvenience, then (1) the Ordinary can, under threat of heavy penalties, command the rector to hold services at hours more convenient for the people, to announce holydays and fast days, give catechetical instructions and explain the gospel; (2) the pastor can take the Blessed Sacrament, if preserved there according to can. 1265, and administer it to the sick.

§ 1 gives the bishop a power which was formerly looked upon as exclusively reserved to the Apostolic See.[1] Of course we suppose that the rector's church is held as a benefice. The bishop is now entitled to compel such rectors to assume nova onera spiritualia, which by virtue of their office they are not obliged to perform. However, this is for the benefit of the faithful. But a material reward would not be out of place and ought to be mentioned in the text. We repeat what we stated above, that if he has the necessary faculties, a rector is allowed to hear confessions in his church. For, on the one hand, hearing confessions is not a strictly parochial right or rather duty, and, on the other, a rector is entitled to distribute holy, even paschal, communion.

CAN. 484

§ 1. Sine rectoris vel alius legitimi Superioris li-

1 Cfr. t. 1, 12, lib. III Decret.; Trid., Sess. 25, c. 5, de ref., III, 12, n. 6; Aichner, § 79, 4, c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

centia saltem praesumpta, nemini licet in ecclesia Missam celebrare, Sacramenta ministrare aliasve functiones sacras peragere; haec vero licentia dari vel negari debet ad normam iuris.

§ 2. Quod attinet ad conciones in ecclesia habendas, serventur praescripta can. 1337–1342.

Without the at least presumptive permission of the rector or other legitimate superior, no one is allowed to say Mass in such a church, or administer the Sacraments, or perform other sacred functions. The permission must be granted or denied according to the law.

Concerning the preaching in such churches, the rules laid down in cc. 1337–1342 are to be observed.

As presumption is a reasonable conjecture from facts likely to happen, a presumed license is based upon a natural conjecture that it would not be withheld if asked for. For saying Mass, a "celebret" should always be demanded, unless the priest is known; concerning other functions, the laws laid down for the administration of the Sacraments must be followed.

Can. 485

Rector ecclesiae, sub auctoritate Ordinarii loci servatisque legitimis statutis ac quaesitis iuribus, debet curare seu advigilare ut divina officia ad sacrorum canonum praescripta ordinate in ecclesia celebrentur, onera fideliter adimpleantur, bona rite administrentur, sacrae supellectilis atque aedium sacrarum conservationi et decori prospiciatur, et ne quidpiam fiat quod sanctitati loci ac reverentiae domo Dei debitae quoquo modo repugnet.

The rector of the church must, under the authority of the Ordinary of the diocese, and with due regard to the lawful statutes and the acquired rights of others, see to it that the divine services are properly carried out, according to the prescriptions of the sacred canons, that all obligations are faithfully complied with, that the property is duly administered, that the sacred furniture and the buildings are properly and neatly kept, and that nothing is done which might be repugnant to the sanctity of the place or to the reverence due to the house of God.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The statutes here mentioned are such rules as the founder of the church may have laid down. Now-a-days all such rules need the approval of the Ordinary. The iura quaesita are rights acquired by the family of the founder or other persons benefitted by the church. These must always be respected and are to be considered first if a conflict (see can. 482) should arise.

CAN. 486

Rectorem ecclesiae, etsi ab aliis electum aut praesentatum, Ordinarius loci removere ad nutum potest ex qualibet iusta causa; quod si rector fuerit religiosus, servetur, circa eius remotionem, praescriptum can. 454, § 5.

The Ordinary of the diocese may, at will and for any just cause, remove a rector, although elected or presented by others; if he is a religious, can. 454, § 5 must be observed in his removal.

After reading this last chapter of the first part of the Code, our so-called rectors will want to change their title into that of pastors. That they are pastors in the canonical sense of the word can no longer be doubted. How else should we classify them? They are neither "vi-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cars" of the bishop nor "rectors," but pastores animarum, pastors of souls, who hold their parishes in their own name.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX

EPISCOPAL FACULTIES

This volume was already in type when the S. C. Consistorialis issued an important decree, which we reprint here in extenso, adding a few observations.

" Proxima sacra Pentecostes die, novo ecclesiasticarum legum Codice vim obtinente, omnes locorum Ordinarii facultatibus quam pluribus ipso iure instruentur, quas antea ab Apostolica Sede postulare solebant et communibus indultis assequebantur. Sufficit enim consulere canonem 349 collatum cum 239 circa plura privilegia personalia, quibus Episcopi augentur, canonem 386 circa electionem examinatorum et iudicum synodalium, 468 et 914 circa benedictionem papalem in articulo mortis et in maioribus anni solemnitatibus, 534 et 1532 circa alienationes, 806 circa sacri iterationem, 822 circa Missae celebrationem extra ecclesiam et oratorium, 1006 circa ordinationes extra tempora, 1043 et 1045 circa dispensationes ab impedimentis matrimonialibus, 1245 circa dispensationes ab abstinentia et ieiunio, 1304 circa benedictionem sacrorum utensilium, quin de multis aliis hic mentio fiat, ut illico appareat Episcopos, vi Codicis, tanta munitos esse potestate ut, quoties Ecclesiae utilitas et animarum salus id requirat, communis legis rigorem temperare et iustas dispensationes largiri aeque opportuneque valeant.

Quapropter indulta quae hucusque, postulantibus Ordinariis, ad hunc finem concedebantur, quaeque vel in Brevi dicto 25 annorum, vel in formulis typis impressis ad decennium, ad quinquennium aut etiam ad triennium valituris continentur, supervacanea evadere videntur; quin imo confusionem haud levem ingerere, eo quod a novis Canonici Iuris ordinationibus in pluribus discrepant.

Hisce itaque de causis, necnon ad discrimina in canonica disciplina tollenda maioremque unitatem in Ecclesia inducendam, Ssmus D. N. Benedictus Pp. XV, de consulto peculiaris coetus Emorum Patrum Cardinalium, hoc S. C. Consistorialis decreto ea quae sequuntur statuit et sanxit:

1) exceptis locis S. Congregationi de Propaganda Fide subiec-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tis, pro quibus suo tempore quae opportuna erunt decernentur, alibi, in universis scilicet dioecesibus iuri communi obnoxiis, facultates omnes pro foro externo Ordinariis concessae, quaeque in Formulis et Brevi superius recensitis continentur, a die 18 maii huius anni cessabunt, neque amplius in usu esse poterunt;

2) in locis tamen remotioribus aliisque ad quae, sive praesentis belli causa, sive alia qualibet ratione, praesentis decreti notitia utili tempore non pervenerit, dispensationes et ordinationes vi veterum facultatum ab Ordinariis forte concessas Ssmus Dominus ratas habet, firmo tamen ut ipsi ab acceptae notitiae die, si res adhuc sit integra, huic decreto se conforment;

3) facultates pro foro interno a S. Poenitentiaria datae, aliaeque ratione praesentis belli concessae, aut peculiaribus de causis ab Ordinariis obtentae, sub huius decreti dispositione non comprehenduntur, et ideo abolitae non sunt;

4) circa dispensationes matrimoniales, quamvis vi canonum 1043–1045 Ordinarii opportunas dispensationes largiri queant "urgente mortis periculo" et "quoties impedimentum detegatur cum iam omnia sint parata ad nuptias, nec matrimonium sine probabili gravis mali periculo differri possit," nihilominus Ssmus Dominus, attentis temporum et locorum adiunctis, haec ulterius indulgenda decrevit:

a) ut locorum Ordinarii in America, in Insulis Philippinis, in Indiis Orientalibus, in Africa extra Mediterranei maris oras, et in Russia, per quinquennium a die 18 maii huius anni, dispensare valeant ab impedimentis minoris gradus quae recensentur in can. 1042, servatis regulis in eo Codicis capite statutis: itemque ut matrimonia nulliter contracta, ob aliquod eiusdem minoris gradus impedimentum, in radice sanare queant, iuxta regulas in capite XI, tit. VII, lib. III Codicis de convalidatione matrimonii positas, monita parte impedimenti conscia de sanationis effectu;

b) ut iidem locorum Ordinarii dispensare pariter per quinquennium valeant ab impedimentis maioris gradus, sive publicis sive occultis, etiam multiplicibus, iuris tamen ecclesiastici (exceptis impedimentis provenientibus ex sacro presbyteratus ordine et ex affinitate in linea recta consummato matrimonio), nec non ab impedimento impediente mixtae religionis, si petitio dispensationis ad S. Sedem missa sit et urgens necessitas dispensandi supervenerit, pendente recursu. Concedendo tamen hisce in casibus dispensationes, Ordinarius prae oculis semper habeat regulas statutas in Codice, lib. III, tit. VII, cap. 2, 3 et 4, circa

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

impedimenta in genere et in specie, itemque clausulas apponi solitas in matrimoniis cum hebraeis et mahumetanis; nec dispensationem concedat nisi caverit de plena earum omnium observantia iuxta sacrorum canonum praescriptiones, et iuribus S. Congregationis de disciplina Sacramentorum circa taxarum solutionem consulat;

c) ut Ordinarii Galliae, trium regnorum Magnae Britanniae, Germaniae, Austriae et Poloniae, durante bello, quoties aditus ad S. Sedem difficilis aut impossibilis saltem per mensem praevideatur, iisdem facultatibus uti possint, quae supra sub litteris a et b recensentur.

Praesentibus valituris de mandato Ssmi contrariis quibuslibet minime obstantibus.

Datum Romae, ex Secretaria S. C. Consistorialis, die 25 aprilis 1918.

✠ C. Cardinalis De Lai, Ep. Sabinen., Secretarius.

L. ✠ S.

† V. Sardi, Archiep. Caesarien., Adsessor.

This decree establishes that

(1) All the faculties pro foro externo granted to the Ordinaries of all dioceses subject to the general hierarchy of the Church shall cease May 18, 1918, whereas the faculties granted to the Ordinaries of the territories subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide shall remain in force;

(2) In those countries which, by reason of the war or for another cause, do not receive timely notice of this decree, all the dispensations and ordinances issued in virtue of former faculties shall be valid and licit until notice is duly received;

(3) The special faculties granted by the S. Penitentiary are not touched by the present decree;

(4) Concerning matrimonial dispensations, some of which have reference to can. 1043–1045, the following rules are to be observed:

(a) The Ordinaries of America, of the Philippine Islands, of the East Indies, of Africa, with the exception of the Mediterranean coast, and of Russia, from May 18, 1918, enjoy the faculty of dispensing from all minor impediments, as enumerated in can. 1042: consanguinity in the third degree of the collateral line, affinity in the second degree of the collateral line, public honesty in the second degree, spiritual relationship, crime arising from adultery with a promise of marriage or an attempt at marriage before a civil magistrate. The Ordinaries may also heal (sanatio in radice) marriages contracted invalidly on account of the said five minor impediments. This faculty lasts for five years from May 19, 1918.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) The Ordinaries of the countries mentioned, for five years, from May 18, 1918, enjoy the faculty of dispensing from all impediments, either public or secret, also multiplied, provided they are iuris ecclesiastici and do not concern the priesthood or affinity in the direct line, consummato matrimonio, of dispensing from the impediment of mixed religion, provided a petition has been sent to Rome and an urgent necessity of dispensing exists. But the provisions of the new Code in Book III, tit. VII, chapt. 2, 3 and 4 must be strictly complied with. For further explanation we must refer to the Code and our comments on Book III, which, Deo volente, we shall soon have ready.

A rapid glance at the faculties [1] thus granted to the Ordinaries of our country results in the following comparison.

Form I

1. Extra tempora et interstitia is useless because granted by Can. 1006 and Can. 978, § 2.

2. Concerning irregularities the Ordinaries may no longer dispense, except in such as are secret and not brought before the episcopal court at least by summons, can. 990.

3. From the age required for ordination no dispensation is allowed, according to can. 975.

4. The only reserved vows are those of perfect and perpetual chastity and that of entering religion (can. 1309), from which the Ordinary may not dispense; all others are not reserved (can. 1313).

5. Simony in ecclesiastical offices, benefices, and dignities (can. 2392) is simpliciter reservata to the Holy See, and the Ordinary can no longer absolve therefrom, unless he has received a general faculty (can. 2253, § 3); but the faculties pro foro interno given by the S. Penitentiary remain.

6–10. About matrimonial dispensations see the decrees above, 3, a and b.

11. Touches the Privilegium Paulinum (can. 1120–1127), concerning which, for reasons that may prompt another answer

1 We follow the text as printed in Sabetti's Theol. Moral., 1917, p. 1082 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from the Apostolic See, we do not wish to prejudice opinions, though we think the faculties have ceased.

12. Holy oils are to be blessed only on Holy Thursday (can. 734, § 1), but the first part of the faculty, concerning the number of priests, probably remains.

13. Concerning the blessing of sacred vestments and the reconciliation of churches, see can. 1304, 1177, and 1207.

14–15. See can. 2253 concerning the power of absolution.

17–19. Concerning indulgences see can. 912; as to cardinals, can. 239; § 1, n. 24; metropolitans, 274, 2; bishops, can. 349, § 2, n. 2. Can. 468, 914, 20, we believe, still hold good, because not given to the Ordinaries as such, but to dioceses.

21. Forbidden books, see can. 1401–1403.

22. Concerning regulars receiving the government of parishes no faculty is required; cfr. can. 454 and 630; but an incorporation may be made only with papal permission; can. 452.

23. No faculty needed by reason of can. 806.

24. Can. 847 allows our custom concerning Holy Communion brought to the sick.

25. About the wearing of clerical dress no faculty is needed; cfr. can. 136.

26. In regard to the recitation of the Breviary (can. 135) no faculty (properly so called) is needed, and only the general rules of morality need be observed; but can. 135 does not oblige one to substitute three rosaries for the Breviary.

27. No faculty now needed; cfr. can. 1245.

28 and 29. Must be regulated according to what has been said above, can. 196–210.

Facultates Extraordinariae T.

1. Cannot be applied (cfr. above, n. 3).

2. The titulus servitii ecclesiae is now common law (see can. 981), and therefore no faculty is needed.

3–6. Dispensations from these impediments may be granted in virtue of the decree of April 25, 1918, with the exception of affinity in linea recta (cfr. can. 97).

7. Remains, because the faculties of the S. Poenit. remain in force in virtue of the decree quoted.

8–12. Remain in virtue of the same decree and as far as this decree permits. But perhaps the reader will find a difficulty in said decree concerning mixed religion: "nec non ab

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

impedimentio impediente mixtae religionis, si petitio dispensationis ad S. Sedem missa sit et urgens necessitas dispensandi supervenerit, pendente recursu." This seems to mean that for each case a petition has to be sent to Rome (Holy Office), and the case would be urgent pending recourse. We confess that this seems a very rigid application of the law and might cause great trouble, not only now, in time of war, but even in normal times. Probably a mitigation can be obtained.

13. See above, Form I, 11.

14. Is superfluous, according to can. 47.

15. Must be judged according to can. 1056.

16. Must be brought in accordance with can. 1429.

17–20. See above, Form I, n. 17–20.

21–22. These, we believe, remain, because the department of indulgences is attached to the S. Penitentiary, whose faculties are not revoked. Besides the Cardinals enjoy them (can. 239, n. 5 f.), as well as the bishops (can. 349, § 1, 10). It would be about time to stop the privileged state of certain orders and congregations, if these things are meant for the faithful at large, and we really expected a canon to that effect.

23–26. Are strictly missionary faculties, not applicable to our country, for instance, blessing of bells (can. 1169, 1155).

27. Concerning privileged altars, can. 916 f. must be observed.

28. The recitation of the Breviary must be performed according to rubrics and sound moral principles.

29. As to forbidden books, see can. 1401–1403.

30. The serving of flesh-meat on forbidden days to non-Catholics is to be judged according to moral principles.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

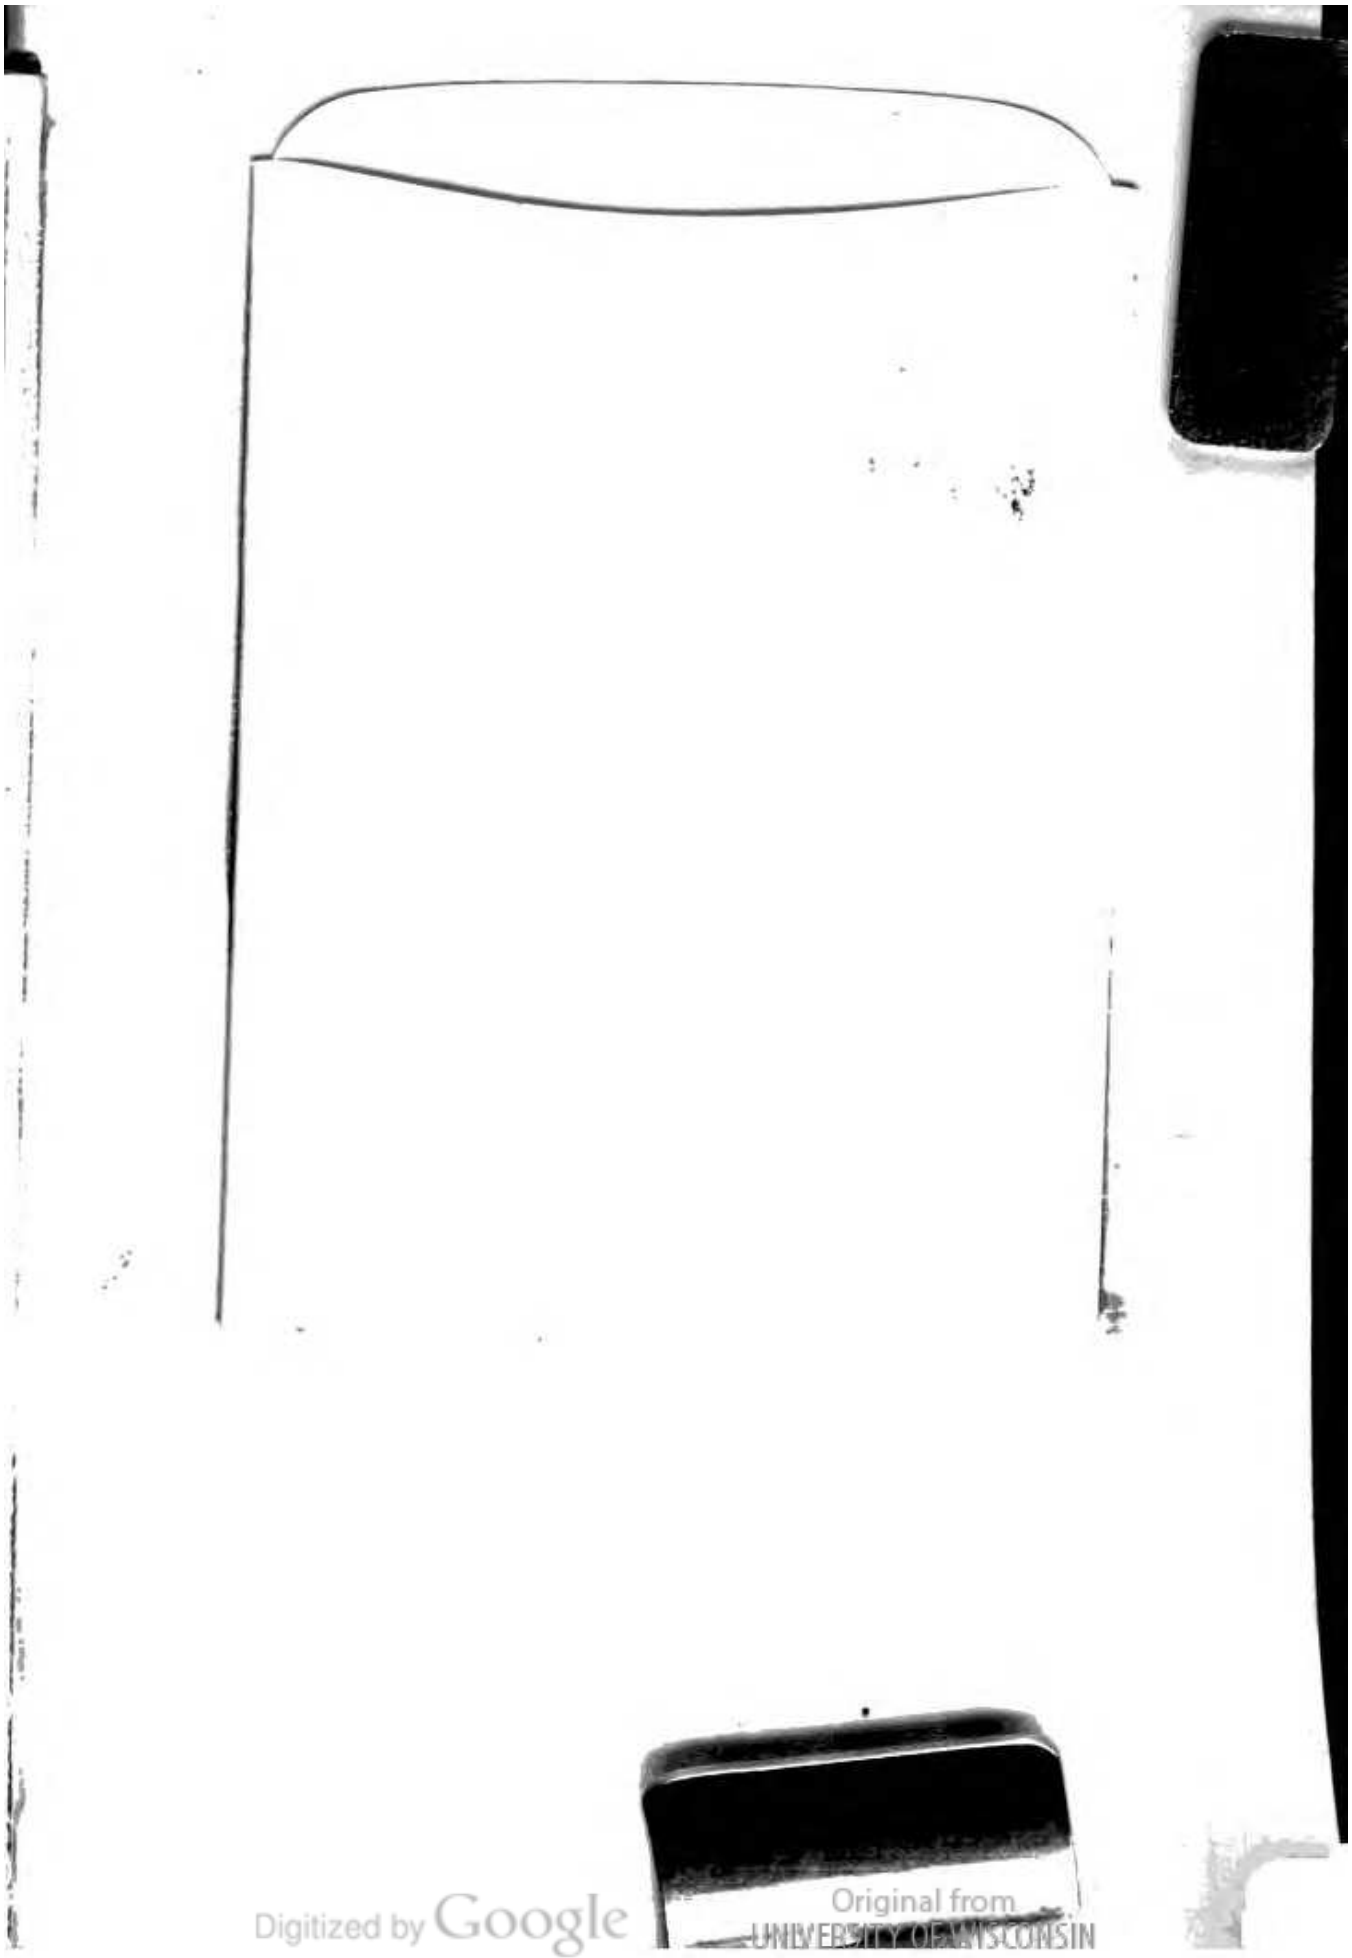
Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

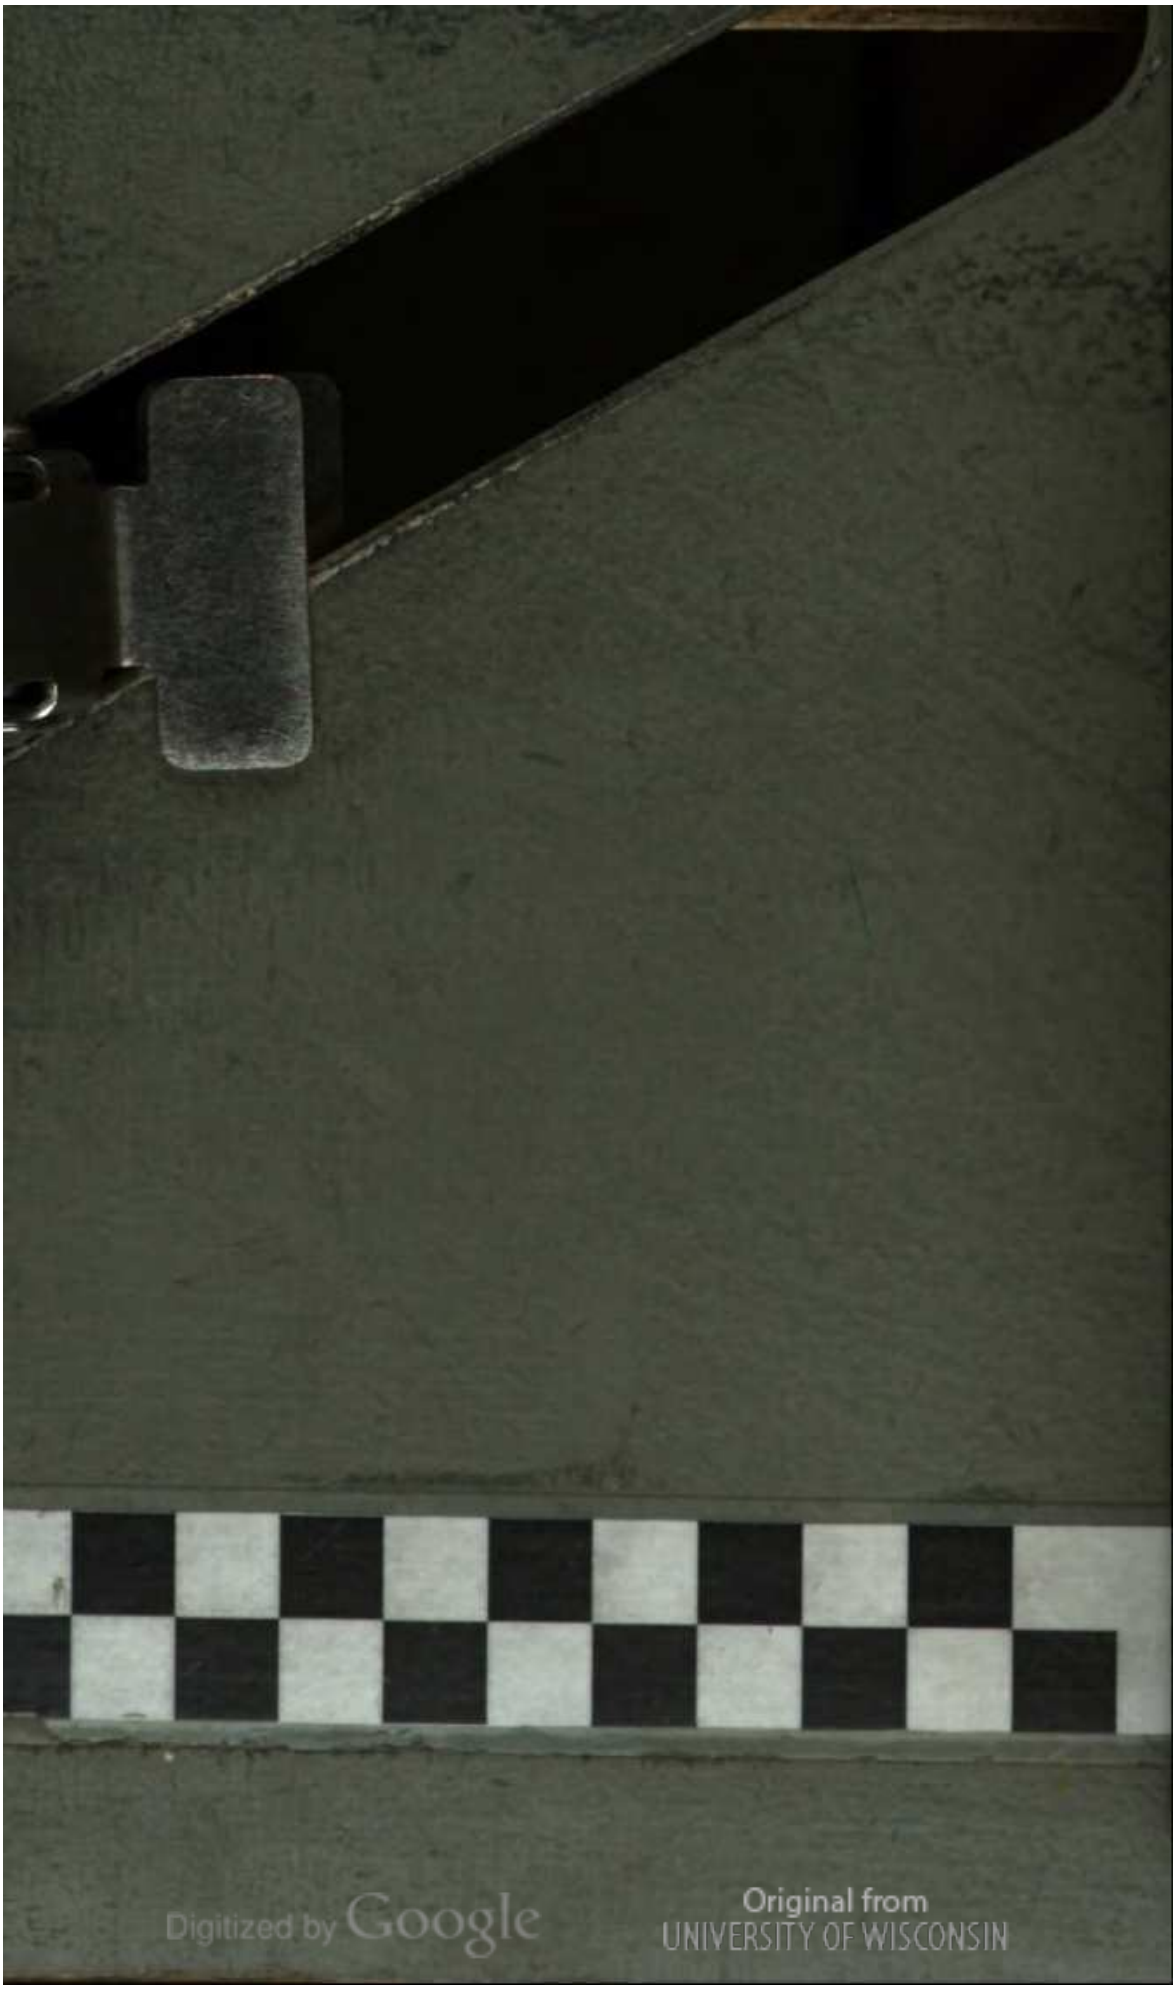
Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN



89097198162

B89097198162A



Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY ON CANON LAW

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL GASQUET

VOLUME III

De Personis, or Ecclesiastical Persons

Religious and Laymen

(Can. 487-725)

SECOND EDITION

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68 GREAT RUSSELL ST. LONDON, W. C.
1919

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cum Permissu Superiorum

NIHIL OBSTAT
Sti. Ludovici, die Jan. 6, 1919
F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR
Sti. Ludovici, die 8 Jan., 1919
✠ Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright, 1919
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CQ
B12
3

587679

Q.A.

INTRODUCTION BY HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL GASQUET

6 Marquette Univ Book Shop 8 v

I have been asked to write a brief Introduction to this third volume of the Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law. The subject matter is so important and affects so many people that an Introduction would almost appear to be out of place; but I cannot refuse the request of an old friend like Father Augustine to write a few words to preface his Commentary.

The sections of the Code treated in this volume deal with two classes of persons, namely religious and lay people. The laws relating to the first naturally follow upon those which deal with clerics, and they are set forth in this Codex in 195 Canons, in which is given with clearness and precision the whole jurisprudence of the Church regarding the religious life. In some ways this portion of the new Codex may be regarded as perhaps the most useful and necessary part of the Codification of ecclesiastical law. Hitherto legislation in regard to religious has been in what may be called "a fluid state." It was mostly based upon special Pontifical Constitutions and deductions from the same, and had not hitherto been gathered together and coördinated officially. The marvellous growth of religious bodies and the variety, especially in modern times, of their scope and purpose, had rendered it difficult, to say the least, to set out the ecclesiastical law applicable to them.

After the Council of Trent, the advent of Congregations of Clerks Regular made necessary great changes

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the old monastic legislation, and these again opened the way for other Congregations of simple vows, perpetual or temporary, which have proved useful and even necessary to meet the needs of the Church in modern times.

The codification of the laws relating to religious life has consequently not been the easiest portion of this great work, which has been accomplished in the present Codex. The most important change which has been introduced in this section — at least so far as the older Orders are concerned — is the law which imposes a period of three years of temporary simple vows after the noviciate, before perpetual vows, simple or solemn, can be taken. Hitherto the very ancient monastic principle of stability was safeguarded by the subjects taking simple vows for three years, which on their part are perpetual, before taking their solemn vows.

Another point in the present legislation to be noticed is the greater stress which is laid upon the element of "common life," as an essential condition for the religious life. Canon 487 makes this clear. One who leads an eremitical life, for example, cannot be called a religious, because the condition of "common life" is wanting. In the same way Canon 673 defines as improperly called "religious" those who, though living together in common life, are not bound by vows.

The second portion of this volume deals in two sections with matters regarding the laity and their associations. In the first the enrollment of the laity in pious associations is strongly recommended. Since these are recognized by the Church, they should be approved and established by competent ecclesiastical authority. The Ordinary always is to exercise his jurisdiction over such associations. In view of the great multiplication of these confraternities in modern times, it is obviously of the greatest importance that the principles which regulate them should be set forth and understood.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The second section of this part deals with particular pious associations, such as "Third Orders," Archconfraternities, Confraternities, Pious Associations, etc.

It will be seen from this bare statement that the Volume here given to the public contains much of great practical importance, and I have little doubt that the Commentary furnished by so competent a canonist as Father Augustine, O. S. B., will be found of great assistance to those who wish to understand the New Codex.

A. CARD. GASQUET

Rome, Nov. 10, 1918.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TABLE OF CONTENTS

BOOK II. PART II. RELIGIOUS

PAGE

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION 1

SECT. 1. Origin and Early Propagation of the Religious State 1

SECT. 2. The Religious State up to the Fourth Lateran Council 6

SECT. 3. From the Fourth Lateran to the Tridentine Council 9

SECT. 4. From the Tridentine Council to Our Time . . . 14

SECT. 5. Female Orders and Congregations 18

SECT. 6. Exemption 24

COMMENTARY 40

Definition of the Religious State 40

Precedence 62

TITLE IX. ERECTION AND SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS, PROVINCES, AND HOUSES 65

Erection 65

Suppression 74

Change of Papal Institutes 79

Spread of Diocesan Institutes 81

Support of Religious Houses 82

Permission for Founding a New Religious House . . 86

TITLE X. THE GOVERNMENT OF RELIGIOUS 95

CH. I. SUPERIORS AND CHAPTERS 95

The Roman Pontiff and the Cardinal Protector . . . 95

The Ordinary's Power 99

Religious Superiors 102

Powers of Religious Superiors 103

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Superiors of Monastic Congregations 111
Qualities of Superiors 116
Duration of Office 119
Election of Religious Superiors 121
Residence of Superiors 128
Duty of Instructing Their Subjects 129
Duty of Reporting to the Holy See 132
Visitation 133
Pastoral Duties and Rights 141
Honorary Titles Denied to Religious 147
Counsellors and Procurators 147
The Procurator General 150
CH. II. CONFESSORS AND CHAPLAINS 152
Confessors of Clerical Institutes 152
Liberty of Conscience 156
Confessors of Sisters 157
The Ordinary Confessor 158
Qualities of Confessors 164
Appointment of Confessors 166
Duration of the Confessor's Office 167
Removal of Confessors 168
Confessors of Lay Institutes of Men 170
Manifestation of Conscience 171
CH. III. TEMPORAL POSSESSIONS AND THEIR ADMINISTRATION 172
The Ordinary's Rights 179
Alienation 183
Rendering of Accounts 190
Responsibility and Donations 192

TITLE XI. ADMISSION TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTES . . . 198

CH. I. POSTULANCY 201
Duration 201
Place, Dress, Enclosure 202
CH. II. THE NOVITIATE 204
ART. I. THE CONDITIONS REQUIRED FOR ADMISSION TO THE NOVITIATE 205
The Right of Admitting Novices 214
Testimonials 215

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Exploratio Voluntatis, or Examination 227
ART. II. THE TRAINING OF NOVICES 229
Erection of the Novitiate 229
Requisites for the Validity of the Novitiate . . . 231
Interruption of the Novitiate 233
The Master of Novices and His Assistant 237
Renunciation of Property 244
Ending the Novitiate 250
CH. III. RELIGIOUS PROFESSION 252
Requisites of Validity 254
Temporary Profession 257
Renewal of Vows 267
Rights and Obligations of Professed Persons . . . 267
Effects of Religious Profession 271
Property and Right of Administration 276
Renunciation of Property Before Solemn Profession 281
Property Received After Solemn Profession . . . 282
Simply Professed Members of Religious Congregations 284 Vacancy of Benefices 286
Loss of Incardination 288
Invalid Profession 288

TITLE XII. THE STUDIES IN CLERICAL INSTITUTES . . . 292
Yearly Examinations 296
Monthly Conferences 296

TITLE XIII. THE OBLIGATIONS AND PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS 298
CH. I. THE OBLIGATIONS 298
Life in Common and Poverty 303
The Religious Habit 309
Enclosure 310
Papal Enclosure 311
Enclosure of Male Religious 313
College or School Enclosure 314
Papal Enclosure of Nuns; Admission of Outsiders . 315
Duty of Nuns to Keep Within Their Enclosure . . . 316
Enclosure of Religious Congregations 318
Visits 320

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PAGE
Exit from Enclosure 321
Assistance in the Sacred Ministry 322
Parish Churches in Charge of Religious 323
Choir Service and Mass 324
Letters Not Subject to Inspection 330
Public Worship 331
CH. II. THE PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS 333
Clerical Privileges 335
Privilege of Exemption 336
Regulars Outside Their Houses 338
Religious Congregations 341
Punishments 344
Diocesan Indults 345
Begging 346
Non-Mendicant Orders and Congregations 347
Pontifical Rights of Abbots 351
CH. III. OBLIGATIONS AND PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS PROMOTED TO ECCLESIASTICAL DIGNITIES OR ADMINISTERING PARISHES 354
Abdication 359
Religious as Pastors 360
Their Relation to the Ordinary 362

TITLE XIV. TRANSFER TO ANOTHER RELIGIOUS INSTITUTE (TRANSITUS AD ALIAM RELIGIONEM) . . . 364

TITLE XV. LEAVING THE RELIGIOUS STATE 371
Secularization 373
Secularization Proper 375
Incardination vs. Secularization 376
Secularized Religious Prohibited from Holding Certain Offices 378
Compensation 380
Apostates and Fugitives 381
Obligation of Apostates and Fugitives 383

TITLE XVI. THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS 385
CH. I. THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH TEMPORARY VOWS 387
Effects of Dismissal 390

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

CH. II. DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS FROM A NON-EXEMPT CLERICAL OR LAY INSTITUTE 391

CH. III. THE JUDICIAL PROCESS FOR THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS IN EXEMPT CLERICAL INSTITUTES 396

Requisites of a Trial 400
Canonical Admonitions 402
Lack of Amendment 404
Sentence of the Tribunal 406
Ratification of the Sentence 407
Delegation of Trial 407

CH. IV. DISMISSED RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS . 409

Status of Dismissed Religious 411
Obligations of Dismissed Religious 414

TITLE XVII. SOCIETIES OF MEN OR WOMEN LIVING IN A COMMUNITY WITHOUT VOWS 416

Different Kinds of Communities 416
Establishment and Suppression 417
Government 417
Administration of Property 418
Admission 418
Studies 418
Duties 419
Privileges 419
Leaving a Society 420

BOOK II. PART III. THE LAITY

TITLE XVIII. ASSOCIATIONS OF THE FAITHFUL IN GENERAL 425

Objects of Christian Associations 429
Authority for Establishing Societies 430
Ecclesiastical Sanction 431
Title to be Chosen 432
Statutes 432
Authority of the Ordinary 432
Temporalities 433
Rights and Privileges of Members 434

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Qualifications for Membership 435
Form of Reception 436
No Special Recompense 436
Dismissal 437
Meetings and Officers 437
Moderator and Chaplain 438
Suppression of Societies 439

TITLE XIX. ASSOCIATIONS OF THE FAITHFUL IN PARTICULAR 441 Different Kinds of Associations 441
Precedence 441
CH. I. SECULAR TERTIARIES 443
Powers of Superiors and the Ordinary 444
Religious Cannot be Tertiaries 445
No One May be a Tertiary in Two Orders 446
Processions 447
CH. II. CONFRATERNITIES AND PIOUS ORGANIZATIONS . 448
Establishment 448
Sacred Functions 449
Title of Associations 450
Several Associations 450
Establishment 451
Religious Superiors 452
Change of Dress 453
Power of the Ordinary 453
Parish Rights 454
Processions 456
Headquarters 456
CH. III. ARCHCONFRATERNITIES AND PRIMARY ORGANIZATIONS 458
Aggregation 458
Communication of Spiritual Favors 459
Conditions for Affiliation 459
Transfer of Archconfraternities 460

APPENDIX. QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED IN THE QUINQUENNIAL REPORT OF RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS (CAN. 510) 463
I. ABOUT PERSONS 463

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
(a) About Postulants 463
(b) About Novices 464
(c) About Professed Sisters 464
II. About Property 465
(a) About Houses 465
(b) About Finances 465
III. About Discipline 467
About the Observance of Certain Special Laws 467
About the Works of the Congregation . . . 468

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

BOOK II—PART II

RELIGIOUS

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION

Before starting this part of our commentary, we shall give a brief historical sketch of the origin of the religious state and its development into various branches, orders, and congregations. To this shall be added a paragraph treating of exemption.

§ I. ORIGIN AND EARLY PROPAGATION OF THE RELIGIOUS STATE

The primitive form in which the religious state appears is monasticism. "Dwelling alone," in its concrete Christian [1] aspect, is a creation of the closing third century and owes its origin to SS. Antony and Pachomius. The former is the father of the Anchorites proper, whilst Pachomius gave to the monks the cenobitic rule. Undoubtedly the persecutions from Decius to Diocletian, violent and universal as they were, made more than one Christian tremble for his faith and life and caused many 1 As to the Essenes, cf. Cath. Encyclopedia, V, 546; Montalembert, The Monks of the West, (Engl. ed.), 1896, I, 217.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to seek shelter in the desert.[2] Yet this extrinsic motive alone would scarcely account either for the multitude of solitaries or for the perseverance of their ascetic institutes after peace had been restored to the Church. Hence another element must necessarily be assigned in explanation of so singular a phenomenon: it is the desire of fervent Christians to follow more closely in the footprints of the Savior and His Disciples, and to imitate the great forerunners of monastic life, the prophet Elias and St. John the Baptist.[3] However, it was not only the voice of Christ bidding His loved ones to forsake everything and follow Him; it was not merely the promise of a full measure of bliss that attracted the multitudes, but we may truly say that this abandonment of a sin-steeped world was due to a deeply felt desire of appeasing the longing of a "naturally Christian" soul. Montalembert describes it thus: "In the depths of human nature there exists without doubt a tendency, instinctive though confused and evanescent, towards retirement and solitude. Its manifestations are found in all the epochs of history, in all religions, in all societies, except perhaps among savage tribes, or in the bosom of that corrupt civilization, which by its excess and over-refinement too often leads humanity back to a savage condition."[4] The novelty, too, and a certain chivalric tendency may have drawn not a few into the wilderness. But withal the Christian sentiment deeply impressed, and especially that bewildering echo of the second advent of Christ — the parousia of St. Paul's teaching — prompted many of those whose souls had been purified in the

[2] Thus St. Paul, the first hermit; cf. Vita S. Pauli, in Acta SS. (Boll.), X, Jan. I, 603; Bulteau, O.S.B., Abrégé de l'Histoire de l'Ordre de S. Benoit, Paris, 1684, I, 4.

[3] Cf. St. Jerome, Proleg. Vitae S. Pauli, Migne, P. L., 23, 17.

[4] The Monks of the West, I, 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

waters of penance to shake off worldly fetters in order to contemplate more freely the "light divine." Thus, then, we see St. Antony the Great[5] bury himself in the mountains of the Thebaid at Pispir, and S. Pachomius lead his cenobitic army to the cloistral realms of Tabennisi in the upper Thebaid on the Nile.[6]

But if we speak of the life in common organized by Pachomius, we must not compare it to St. Benedict's Rule. It looked indeed somewhat like a congregation of modern times, with its superior general, visitations and chapters; but the essential feature of Benedictine life, the family ideal, could not be attained by reason of the great number of monks, 50,000 being mentioned in the preface of St. Pachomius' rule.[7] The brethren were divided according to their arts or trades, each group having its own provost or prior. In the month of August there was a general chapter at which all officials were appointed. A great deal of freedom was left to the individuals; thus, for instance, they could take their meals in common or privately in their cells. Two fast-days per week were prescribed except during Easter and Whitsuntide.[8]

Community life was more strictly defined by St. Basil the Great. The "father" of cenobitic life would have his monks work and pray seven times a day in common, besides placing all ascetic exercises under the control of a superior.

The East, therefore, presented two kinds of monks: the solitaires following Antony, and the cenobites following the rule of Pachomius and the great Cappadocian Bishop.

5 Cf. Vita S. Antonii in Acta SS. (Boll.), Jan. 17, II, 471 ff.

6 See C. Butler, O.S.B., The Lausiac History of Palladius in "Cambridge Texts and Studies," P. I, 1898, P. II, 1904.

7 Migne, P. L., 23, 64, n. 6; n. 8; Butler, l. c., I, 236.

8 Migne, l. c., n. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The wave of monasticism from the East soon invaded the Western Church, not like a great inundation, but gradually, gently, and steadily. This was due in part at least to the whirlwind of Arianism. The persecution set on foot by these fanatics caused Athanasius and other Alexandrian clergymen to seek the protection of the Apostolic See.[9] This happened between the years 339 and 341 A. D. On the other hand Italian bishops like Eusebius of Vercelli were banished from their native soil into Eastern regions. The same Eusebius, confessor of the Catholic faith (d. 371), on returning from his exile — which had lasted from 355 to 362, during which time he had been the guest of the Thebaid monasteries — transplanted the monastic institute to Italy.

But it may be safely said that the first impulse to Western monasticism came from Rome, primarily through the service of St. Athanasius and through the influence exercised by the noble Marcella. Her palace stood on the Aventine hill, consecrated by the presence of the Prince of the Apostles. She is praised by St. Jerome as the "prima monacha Romae." The life of St. Antony, written about 365, was known to her, and when St. Jerome came to Rome (382) to renew those instructions and narratives by adding to them the example of his own life, Marcella, with her mother Albinia, and her sister Asella placed themselves at the head of that select number of illustrious matrons who took him for their guide and oracle. She died shortly after the sack of Rome by Alaric (410).[10] Pammachius, a man of consular birth, is celebrated by the hermit of Bethlehem as the "first and leader of the monks" in Rome, whose example drew 9 Acta SS. (Boll.), II, 1108; St. Jerome, Ad Principiam (Migne, P. L., 22, 1087 f.).

10 Cfr. Studien u. Mitteilungen O.S.B., 1898, 303 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

many noble, learned, and powerful men to the monastic life.[11] It is to be noted that among the great houses of Roman nobility the Anician family distinguished itself in a conspicuous manner. A grand-daughter of Proba, of the gens Anicia, devoted her life to Christ in Africa and is celebrated by St. Augustine.[12] From Africa we cross the Mediterranean Sea to Spain, but particularly to France, that fertile soil of monasticism.

The historical genesis of monasticism has now been briefly outlined. We have seen that in its beginnings it was of human origin, and we naturally ask ourselves if it had also a divine sanction, or whether it was completely a human invention. To answer this question properly we must make a distinction. Christ invited His Apostles to His fellowship. He tendered this call to the wealthy youth and urged that he sell whatsoever he had and follow Him. The precepts contained in the Decalogue and in the Sermon on the Mount were addressed to all alike; but it was not so with the counsels leading to a more perfect life. "Qui potest capere, capiat." Yet, it must be evident that, as Christ gave these counsels, He intended them not for mere contemplation, but for practice. He aimed at gathering a "little flock" which would more closely follow the footprints He left on earth, and unswervingly walk that narrow path which He himself had traveled. This close imitation of the Saviour is more surely achieved by living according to the 11 St. Jerome Ep. ad Pammach., says: "Primus in primis, archistrategos monachorum" . . . "quis enim crederet ut consulum pronepos et Furiani germinis decus, inter purpuras senatorum, furva tunica pullatus incederet?" (Migne, 22, 641 f.) which words indicate that the dress of the monks was black and of coarse material.

12 Montalembert, l. c., I, 293. Besides these names, others might be mentioned, such as Melania the elder and younger, Paula, Eustochium, etc., as well as St. Paulinus of Nola, not to speak of St. Augustine and his monk-like clergy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

three counsels: poverty, chastity, and obedience, which embody the perfection proposed by Christ. Hence, wherever these three are put into practice, the religious state exists, and that by divine right. Monasticism, however, is not the religious state; it is but a form or part thereof, as a branch is part of a tree. It would not, therefore, be quite correct to assert that monasticism exists by divine right, unless it be identified with the religious state in general. In this latter sense we might, though improperly, say that its foundation is divine,—that it is "the philosophy introduced by Christ." [13]

If this is true of monasticism, which is not the concrete form of the religious state, it is even more applicable to single monasteries or congregations, which, as history teaches, may appear and disappear. On the other hand, the law of prescription must be quoted in favor of monasticism; despite all dislikes, derision and persecution from adversaries within and without the Church, it has always proved a solid rock amidst the storms of the sea, and a fertile spring of true civilization and learning, rendering untold services to the whole of humanity.[14]

§ 2. THE RELIGIOUS STATE UP TO THE FOURTH LATERAN COUNCIL [15]

Our Code (can. 488) distinguishes the following categories of religious:

The Religious State consists of	1. Orders of Regulars with solemn vows and	a) Monastic Congregations
		b) Clerical or lay orders.
	2. Congregations with simple vows.	a) Exempt — not exempt.	}	either clerical or lay
		b) Pontificial institutes.
		c) Diocesan institutes.

13 St. John Chrys., Hom. ad Popul. Antioch. 17; Montalembert, l. c., I, 218.

14 Montalembert, l. c., I, 9.

15 Cf. Montalembert, The Monks of the West, Engl. ed., 1896; Heimbucher, Ordensgeschichte, 1896, 2 vols.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Monasticism, as we have seen, was the common form of the religious state in the early Middle Ages, up to the time of the IVth Lateran Council (1215). That this year marks an epoch in religious life is evident from the far-reaching decrees of the Council mentioned, as well as from the fact that soon afterwards orders of a somewhat different type made their appearance. We need not recall the different rules which were introduced by saintly men. Individualism was the keynote of the first centuries up to the time of Charlemagne, when the Rule of St. Benedict was made the monastic code, not by extrinsic forces merely, but chiefly by its intrinsic merit. Its organization is cenobitic, prescribing a life in common under the government of an abbot, elected by the brethren for lifetime. Its end is the conversio morum, or truly moral conduct based upon the Evangelical truths. To achieve this principal aim St. Benedict clothed it in the form of a vow or promise, which was supported by two more — obedience and stability. These three formed the contents of the formula of profession which every son of St. Benedict had to pronounce after a year's novitiate. There were no special spiritual works demanded beyond what the Gospel taught; — no flagellations, no special fasts except those prescribed by the rule and the regulations of the Church, no newfangled devotions. The liturgical prayer was to be the prayer of the monks, in it they should live, from it they should draw inspiration and example. But work, too, was prescribed, no kind, either intellectual or manual, being excluded, though the latter was the principal form, until a distinction between fratres barbati (conversi or lay brothers) and monks proper was made, towards the end of the Xth century.[16] These are the two main fea-

16 Conversi or barbati occur in the "Customs" of Einsideln, com-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tures of the Benedictines: "Ora et labora," by which they cultivated the soil, trained the young, and brought truth and culture to tribes and races not yet in touch with the Church or civilized society.

The Rule of St. Benedict was the foundation of many other orders. Thus the founder of the Camaldolese (St. Romuald, 1027) and the founder of the Vallombrosians (St. John Gualbert, 1073) adopted the Code of the "Patriarch of Western Monasticism."[17] The most illustrious branch is that founded by St. Robert at Citeaux, Burgundy, in 1098. The name of one great abbot of Clairvaux, St. Bernard, has given to the Cistercians a lustre which shall never fade. St. Bernard is said to have received 200 novices, and in the middle of the 14th century his order counted no less than 700 abbeys. Their rule was that of St. Benedict, whilst the more detailed organization is contained in the Charta charitatis. The chief superior is the abbot of Citeaux, who is assisted by four "Father Abbots" and a general chapter held every year. The powers of the chapter were extensive. It could even depose the abbot of Citeaux, though the latter was elected by the monks of Citeaux and the abbots of the other monasteries. Besides, the general chapter elected twenty-five Definitores, who were entrusted with the affairs of the Order outside the time of the chapter-meeting. This is, if not a deviation from, at least a change of, the Benedictine rule, and, we be-posed by Abbot Gregory, an Englishman, towards the end of the 10th century. They were distinguished from monks, probably by a different kind of profession, wearing the beard, and their chiefly outward occupation; they were not admitted to choir service.

17 The order of Grandmont, and that of Fontevrault, founded by Robert of Arbrissels, in 1100, might also be mentioned, especially the latter, because placed under the jurisdiction of an abbess, whom monks and nuns obeyed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lieve, a wholesome democratic one, which the orders of the following period adopted.

Closely allied to the Benedictine rule, although with traits of hermitical life, somewhat similar to the Camaldolese, are the Carthusians, founded by St. Bruno (1084) at Chartreuse, near Grenoble.

More clerical than monastic were the orders which followed the so-called Rule of St. Augustine,— a compilation from the writings of the great Bishop of Hippo.[18] To this class belong all the branches of the Canons Regular who adopted the common life and pronounced the three religious vows and were spread in different congregations. The Praemonstratensians or Norbertines, founded by St. Norbert (1120), and the Trinitarians, by John of Mortha and Felix of Valois (1198), may also be counted among the followers of the Augustinian rule.

§ 3. FROM THE FOURTH LATERAN TO THE TRIDENTINE COUNCIL

Whereas the first period bore an almost exclusively or at least overwhelmingly monastic[19] character, the following epoch may, according to the saying "a potiori fit denominatio," be styled clerical, or at least monastico-clerical. On one side we see the Benedictine and Cistercian orders flourish, or revived through the medium of newly formed congregations, like those of St. Justina of Padua (1412), of Melk in Lower Austria (1418), 18 The Rule in its present form did not originate with St. Augustine. It is a compilation from his two sermons "On the Morals of the Clergy," and a "Letter (109) to the Nuns of Hippo." Particular statutes were added to this compilation later on; cfr. Alzog, Manual of Church History, Engl. Transl., 1876, Vol. II, p. 693.

19 Even the Canons Regular followed a rule that was, in the main, taken from the Rule of St. Benedict; such was that of Chrodegang of Metz; cfr. Hefele, Conc.-Gesch., IV, 17 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and of Bursfeld (1440); on the other hand the phenomenal rise and development of the Mendicants, who devoted themselves chiefly to the sacred ministry, marks a new epoch full of life and energy.

St. Francis, the humble poor man (poverello) of Assisi in Umbria, founded his "confederation," as he called it, in 1209. On Nov. 29th, 1223, his rule was approved by Honorius III, whose predecessor, Innocent III, had enacted at the Lateran Council that, to prevent too great a confusion of religious, no one should found a new order, but all who felt called to the religious state should enter one of the established institutes,[20] and those who wished to found a new religious house should accept a rule and institute already approved. Though this canon was enacted after Francis had laid the foundations of his marvelous society, the great Pope and canonist seemed to be slow, especially on account of the extreme poverty proposed by the Saint, in giving his permission. At length an oral leave was granted through the intervention of the Cardinal of St. Prisca, Colonna. Honorius III gave his formal approval to the rule after the order counted thousands of members.

The Code of St. Francis is simple. It comprises twelve brief chapters. The first treats of the three vows, of which the strictest is that of poverty. It also contains a clause of "obedience and reverence to the Pope." Noticeable and new is the insertion of a special addition to the twelfth chapter, which enjoins the minister general to ask the pope for a cardinal protector and superintendent, in order that the brethren may always be subject to the Holy Roman Church and remain unswerving in the Catholic faith. The organization has some similarity with that of the Cistercians, in as far,

20 Cfr. c. 9, X, III, 36.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

namely, as the minister general is elected by the general chapter, which may also, upon unanimous vote, depose him. Under the minister general are the provincials, and under these the custodes (cap. 8). Chapters 9 and 12 treat of preaching, which the brethren are to omit if the Ordinary forbids them. Preaching among the Saracens and infidels may, by special grace, be undertaken with the permission of the provincial. As to the vow of poverty (cap. 6) the Saint commands his brethren "to possess nothing for themselves, neither house, nor estates, nor anything," but to live entirely on alms. This latter point is specifically Franciscan and, like many other human institutions, has caused some disturbance because of divergent interpretations.[21] But not on that account may any slur be cast upon the holy Founder's intention, nor should the subsequent splits among the Friars Minor form a reason or pretext for casting aspersions on the institute as such, which has wrought miracles of spiritual reformation among the faithful and produced a great number of Saints.

The division of the Franciscan Order, which practically began towards the end of the 14th century, was completed and sanctioned by Leo X, "Ite et vos," May 28, 1517. Henceforth two great branches were recognized: that of the Observants with the brown habit, and that of the Conventuals with the black habit, who were entitled to possess movable and immovable property, whilst the Observants claimed no right to own property nor any special indults.

A third, very popular and deserving branch of the great Franciscan Order is that of the Capuchins, founded by Matteo di Bassi and approved by Clement VII, May 21 Cf. Nicholas III, "Exiit qui seminat," in c. 3, 6°, V, 12, de verb. signif.; Clem., "Exivit," c. 1, Clem. V, II.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

18, 1528. After severe trials, lasting for many years and threatening its very existence, this order was formally recognized by Paul V, in 1619, as autonomous with its proper Minister Generalis. Since they proceeded from the Observants, the Capuchins cling to the original rule of St. Francis and observe absolute poverty. Similar to their rule is the one composed by St. Francis of Paula for his order, called "Minimi," approved A. D. 1474.

In 1217, Innocent III approved an order which has gained universal admiration for its scientific pursuits and high achievements, especially in speculative theology. It is the Order founded by St. Dominic, known as that of the Friars Preachers or Dominicans. The Pope enjoined the holy Founder to assume, according to the decree of the Lateran Council, a rule already approved. He adopted that of St. Augustine, as it was then called. The organization proper of the new Order was established at a chapter held at Bologna in 1220. The constitutions adopted there enacted that the general chapter, to be held every three years (now held every twelfth year) should enjoy legislative powers and elect the Magister Generalis,[22] who himself chooses his associates (socii) in the government of the Order. The provincials are elected by the provincial chapter for four years and are assisted by definitores chosen by the same chapter. A prior is set over every house for the period of four years and is assisted by a subprior. Special attention was given to studies, which should last at least eight years, two of which are devoted to propaedeutics.

A characteristic of the Order of the Friars Preachers is poverty. Together with the Franciscans they are called mendicants. At first they depended entirely on 22 Now elected for twelve years.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alms, but later papal constitutions (like that of Martin V, 1425) allowed the Dominicans to hold landed property and have a secure income. Another feature peculiar to this order is the office of preaching, for which they were chiefly founded (against the Albigenses), and which they performed with great zeal and success especially at the time of the Reformation. Most remarkable is the great number of accomplished scholars whom they produced and who held the Catholic world spellbound for centuries. The names of Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Cajetan suffice to show their merit and greatness.

The rule of St. Augustine was followed also by the Mercedarians, "the royal, military, and religious order of the Blessed Virgin for the ransom of slaves," founded in 1223 by Peter Nolascus; by the Servites, or "Servants of Mary," established by seven Florentine nobles in 1233; and by the "Alexian Brothers," founded in the 14th century and allowed to make solemn profession by Pius II (1459). These latter are a lay order engaged in charitable work, and since 1870 the members take only simple vows. The so-called Hieronymites and Bethlehemites likewise followed the so-called rule of St. Augustine.

During that same period the Benedictine Order experienced not only a reformatory impetus, but also an increase of branches: St. Sylvester, of the Gozzolini family, in 1231 founded at Fano near Fabriano a monastery which became the mother-house of the Benedictines of the same name. Their constitutions, based on the rule of St. Benedict, were finally approved by Alexander VIII (1681). They now devote themselves to mission work in various countries, including the U. S. (Diocese of Wichita, Kansas). Another Italian foundation was that of Celestine V, who as Peter Murone established a congregation based on the Benedictine rule and known as Celestinians. This order at one time counted about 150 monasteries, but is now nearly extinct. The last Benedictine congregation founded in that period is that of Bl. Bernard Tolomeo, who called it the order of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Olivet, wherefore its members are named Olivetans. They still have some monasteries.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A rule with Oriental traits, but modified by Eugene IV in 1431, is that of the Carmelites, written by Patriarch Albert of Jerusalem in 1208 and then transplanted to the West. Particularly in Spain this order gained a solid footing and received a fresh impetus through the reformatory zeal of the great St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross, in the middle of the sixteenth century.

§ 4. FROM THE TRIDENTINE COUNCIL TO OUR TIME

This period might be called congregational because, although a few orders were started, yet the signature of the whole epoch is that of religious congregations without solemn vows, or of merely pious societies without vows proper.

First and deserving of particular mention is the Society of Jesus,[23] founded by St. Ignatius Loyola in 1534 in the crypt of St. Denis of Montmartre at Paris and approved as an order by Paul III ("Regimini militantis ecclesiae," Sept. 27, 1540) fifteen years before the holy founder's death. The code of this order is remarkable for its detailed and elaborate regulations. It is contained 23 Nothing can be said against that title (cfr. Cath. Encycl., XIV, 81); however, if a member of S. J. (Cuvilhier, Meditationes Brevissimae) contrasts the humility of St. Ignatius with that of the founders of other orders in favor of the former, as if these latter had given their own names to their foundations, it sounds somewhat puerile.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the "Institutum Societatis Jesu,"[24] often printed, and therefore no secret. For our purpose the most important part of the Institute is the "Constitutions," from which we learn the internal and external organization of that illustrious corporation. The head of the Society is called praepositus generalis, or simply General of the Jesuits, although the chief authority is vested in the "General Congregation," which is similar to the General Chapter of other centralized orders. To that General Congregation belongs the supreme legislative power, whilst the fullness of administrative power and spiritual authority is vested in the General. He appoints the provincials (at present twenty-seven, four in the U. S.), and the local superiors: rectors of colleges, provosts of professed houses, and masters of novices. The General is aided by five assistants, who, however, enjoy only a consultive vote, and by an "admonitor." This organization is to some extent democratic, inasfar, namely, as the General Congregation is the legislative organ. We fail to see where the aristocratic element[25] enters. It is rather a constitutional monarchy, because the General of the Society has unlimited power within the Constitutions.

The members are: (1) novices, whose "probation" lasts two years; (2) formed scholastics, aspirants to the priesthood with simple but perpetual vows; (3) formed coadjutors, lay brothers or priests with simple but perpetual vows; (4) professed members, who besides the three usual solemn vows of religion, make a fourth to obey the Pope in the matter of missions and to go wherever they are sent. They also make certain additional, but non-essential, simple vows in the matter of poverty 24 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., l. c., which we chiefly follow concerning this Society.

25 Cfr. Heimbucher, l. c., II, 55.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google and external honors, also regarding ecclesiastical dignities, if we mistake not.

The object[26] of the order is not limited to practising any one class of good works, but to study, in the manner of the Spiritual Exercises, what Christ would do if He were living in our day, and to carry out that ideal.[27] Hence elevation and largeness of aim. Hence also the motto of the Society: "Ad Maiorem Dei Gloriam." Obedience is the characteristic of the order,—to be ready for any call and to preserve unity in every variety of work. Hence, by easy consequence,[28] the omission of office in choir, of a specially distinctive habit, of unusual penances. The ministry of the Society consists in preaching, the administration of the Sacraments, and teaching.

History has shown that the members of the Society have carried out their noble purpose for the welfare of the Church at large; their literary and missionary work lives after them, and one of the greatest titles of honor peculiar to the Society is perhaps that of being the most calumniated order in the Catholic Church.

Of a charitable character, purposing to help orphans and the poor, is the order founded by St. Hieronymus Aemilianus, approved by Paul III in 1540, and declared a religious order by Pius V in 1608. It is called the order of Somasco, because this place (near Bergamo in Italy) was its first settlement. The rule is that of St. Augustine.

The same rule was adopted by the order of St. John 26 Cath. Encycl., XIV, 84 f.

27 This is not specifically Jesuitic, except in as far as the method is "according to the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius," provided, of course, these are the exclusive literary product of the holy founder.

28 However, it is known that St. Ignatius omitted choir service from his Code only after long deliberations.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of God ("Brothers Hospitallers"), founded in 1540 at Granada in Spain and raised to the dignity of an order in 1570 by Pius V. It has a lay character, because only a few of its members, generally one in each house or hospital, are priests. These Brothers enjoy the privileges of mendicants, granted by Urban VIII in 1624. Their chief task is nursing the sick.

Very similar is the order founded by St. Camillus of Lellis in 1504, and approved as an order with the privileges of mendicants by Gregory XIV, in 1591. The members are named "Fathers of a Good Death."

For the sacred ministry and the embellishment of the church service St. Cajetan and Caraffa, later pope Paul IV, founded the Theatines, in 1524.

The Barnabites were established by Antonius Maria Zaccaria in 1530 at Milan.

For school purposes chiefly was instituted the "Order of the Pious Schools," or Scolopii, by St. Joseph of Calasanza at Rome, in 1597.

Now we come to the congregations of men. Hither belong the Christian Brothers, founded in 1679 by St. John Baptist de la Salle, and approved by Benedict XIII, in 1724. They are a lay institute engaged mainly in the primary and middle-class education of youth. Their number is as great as the merits they have gained in the field of pedagogy in almost every country of the globe. Two priestly congregations of a clerical character, which are spread over the whole Church are those of the Passionists, founded by St. Paul of the Cross, in 1725, for mission work and the constant remembrance of the Passion of our Lord, and that of the Redemptorists, founded in 1735 by St. Alphonsus of Liguori, especially for the exercise of the sacred ministry among the poor and forsaken, which scope it carries out with astonishing success.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The congregation of St. Sulpice, founded in 1642 by Jean Jacques Olier, and that of the Eudists, founded in 1643 by P. Eudes, are devoted to the training of the clergy.

Among the many pious societies whose members take no special vows, are to be mentioned the Oratorians, established by the "Apostle of Rome," St. Philip Neri, in 1575; the Lazarists, founded by St. Vincent de Paul, in 1624, and approved by Urban VIII, in 1632; the Oblates of the Immaculate Conception, established in 1816 by Bishop Mazenod; the Marists, or Fathers of the Society of Mary, founded in 1816 by Abbé Colin; the Fathers of the Precious Blood, founded by Bl. Gaspar del Bufalo, in 1823; the Pallottini, founded by the Ven. Vincent Pallotti, in 1835; the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, founded in 1848; the Salesians of Don Bosco, founded in 1855; the White Fathers, founded by Cardinal Lavigerie, in 1868; the Society of the Divine Word (Steyl), founded by Arnold Janssen, in 1875; the Society of the Divine Saviour, founded by J. B. Jordan, in 1881; the Fathers of the Holy Cross, founded in 1841 at Notre Dame, Ind.; the Paulists, founded in 1859 as an offshoot of the Redemptorists; the brethren of St. Viator; the priests of the Most Bl. Sacrament, founded by Julien Eymard, in 1856, and others, among them many Tertiaries from older orders. The Assumptionists, founded in 1520, with the rule of St. Augustine, conduct schools and missions in various countries, especially in France, where they flourished before the iniquitous laws of 1905.

§ 5. FEMALE ORDERS AND CONGREGATIONS

The rules for nuns, or sacred virgins, as they were called, were sometimes nothing else but practical instructions given by renowned bishops. Thus St. Ambrose

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

composed his "Exhortation to the Virgins" (about 397). That the rite of veiling those who vowed virginity dates to remote antiquity, perhaps to the beginning of the fourth century, is unquestionable. The existence of sacred virgins is testified to by Tertullian.[29] Monasteries of nuns were early and numerous in Egypt, Cappadocia, and Palestine. Later the monachae were also introduced into the West. Rules were then written especially for nuns. Thus St. Caesarius of Arles (542) wrote a rule for virgins and monks,[30] St. Leander of Seville (603) one for his sister Florentia.[31] But the Rule of St. Benedict, under which St. Scholastica lived, soon governed most convents of nuns. In 742 a German national council enacted that "monks and nuns should introduce and observe the Rule of St. Benedict."[32] Besides the Benedictines there were also Cononesses, as we learn from a council of Mayence in 813.[33] However, it is safe to say that to the beginning of the thirteenth century the majority of nuns followed St. Benedict's rule, either as "black" Benedictines, or as Camaldolese or Vallombrosian Sisters. This condition prevailed up to our time. The branch of the Olivetans was instrumental in the foundation of the noble society of the Oblates of Tor de Specchi, whose holy foundress was St. Frances of Rome (+ 1440). A congregation founded by the Ven. Mechtildis in 1654, and approved by Innocent XI in 1676, was devoted to the perpetual adoration of the Bl. Sacrament.

In our country the Benedictine nuns, established within the last 70 years, have grown in number and do meritorious work in parish schools and academies. But their 29 Cfr. Wilpert, Die gottgeweihten Jungfrauen, 1892.

30 Migne, P. L., 67, 1099 ff.; 1107 ff.

31 Ibid., 72, 873 f.

32 Mansi, Coll. Conc., XII, 366.

33 Ibid., XIV, 64 (can. 73).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vows are, now at least, simple, though perpetual, and because of the nature of their work papal enclosure is not imposed on them. Outside of special Apostolic indults they are not under the jurisdiction of Benedictine abbots, but under that of the Ordinaries of the dioceses. Neither do they elect an abbess, but a mother superior.[84]

The great Mendicant Orders of St. Francis and St. Dominic also had sisterhoods following their respective rules. St. Clare was vested by the seraphic Saint himself with the tunic of the order, March 18, 1212. This was the beginning of the second order of the "Poverello" of Assisi, but the code proper of the Clarisses was that which combined the second (1247) and third rule (1253) and remained the fundamental constitution for all Franciscan nuns who take solemn vows and are subject to the Friars Minor. Besides these St. Francis established a rule for persons remaining in the world, who were called Tertiaries. Towards the close of the thirteenth century some of these Tertiaries commenced to live in common and were therefore called Tertiaries Regular. These were united with the first order of the Friars Minor by Leo X, in 1512, and are therefore an order of moniales with solemn vows. The same Pope allowed Tertiaries to exist with simple vows and in community. These follow the rule of St. Francis, as approved by Nicholas IV. Lastly there was a class of Tertiaries who did not live in common but with the permission of the bishop took one or three vows and wore the religious habit.

Pius V, by his Constitution "Circa pastoralis," of May 84 The Catalogue O. S. B. of 1910, p. 710 f., gives the total number of "Black" Benedictine Sisters as 8360, of whom only 411 are exempt. Most of those not exempt (2214) live in the U. S. Most probably the number has, since 1910, increased to 3000.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

29, 1566, compelled all nuns with solemn vows to live in enclosure, and furthermore decided that all Tertiaries, or "those who are called of the penance"— thereby striking a blow chiefly at the aforesaid Tertiaries of St. Francis — should make solemn vows and be obliged to observe the enclosure.[35] But conditions were stronger than the Pope. Despite all the penalties threatened, new congregations sprang up. For a long time the S. C. EE. et RR. was wont to approve the rules of such congregations with the clause: "without however approving the institute itself."[36] This custom was tenaciously followed up to the beginning of the 19th century, when so many deserving communities sprang up that Rome could no longer withhold formal approbation.

But to return to the Franciscan Sisters. It is astonishing to see how many branches sprang from that productive tree. One of them was that of the sisters of St. Elizabeth, which existed in great numbers in the 16th century. They wear sometimes a brown, sometimes a grey habit (soeurs grises). It is impossible to name them all, but we must mention at least the institute of Sisters founded by P. Theodosius Florentini under the name of "Holy Cross" or "Mercy-Sisters of the Holy Cross," whose seat is at Ingenbohl,[37] and the "School Sisters of the Holy Cross," at Menzingen, both in Switzerland.

Similar to the orders mentioned, that of St. Dominic also had a second and third order for women. The former was probably founded in 1217 in Rome, whilst the latter was established by Munio di Zamora and ap-35 Cfr. Pius V, "Lubricum vitae genus," Nov. 17, 1568, which compelled male congregations to take solemn vows.

36 Bened. XIV, "Quamvis iusto," April 30, 1749, § 5.

37 These Sisters enjoy some exemptions, for instance, in the choice of their confessors, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google proved by Innocent VII (1405) and Eugene IV (1439). Prominent among the Tertiaries of St. Dominic are the "Mantellatae" or Poor School Sisters of the Third Order of St. Dominic.

The rule of St. Augustine was followed by the order of nuns established by St. Birgitta of Sweden in 1344, the constitutions of which were approved by Urban V (1379). The Ursulines were founded by St. Angela Merici in 1535, and appear as an order with solemn vows under the rule of St. Augustine in 1612. The same rule is the foundation of the order founded by St. Francis de Sales and St. Francis de Chantal, in 1610, and known as Visitation Nuns. In our country they are the only nuns with solemn vows.

The congregation founded in 1635 by St. Vincent de Paul as Filles de la Charité, or Sisters of Charity, spread widely over the world and gained universal approbation by their works of charity. Of a very charitable character is also the order of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, an offspring of an older sisterhood, the Bon Secours, founded in 1644.

Chiefly for educational purposes were intended the institute of the "Sorores Anglicae" or English Ladies, who had a peculiar fate, as may be seen from Benedict XIV's Constitution "Quamvis iusto," of April 30, 1749. Related to them are the Loreto Sisters (1822) and the "Congregation of Irish Sisters of Charity" (1836). To these may be added the Notre Dame Sisters, the Sisters of St. Joseph (1805), the Sisters of the Precious Blood, etc., etc.

Last, but by no means least, may be mentioned the "Ladies of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," founded by Bl. Magdalen Sophie Barat, in 1800, and approved by Leo XII, 1826. These "Ladies with the hearts of dragoons"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have flourished in the U. S. in consequence of the zeal of Madame Duchesne.

If we omitted to mention the military orders,[38] it was for the obvious reason that they are no longer of importance.

After this brief summary notice may be taken of the differences between the various organizations. Up to the foundation of the Society of Jesus the religious state was considered to be founded on solemn vows or profession, and until the middle of the last century there was generally but one profession in the religious orders (except the Jesuits), and this a solemn one.[39] The religious state even now requires the three vows embodied in the formula of profession which binds the members to their community. Hence congregations in which only one vow, for instance, that of obedience, is taken, are not religious congregations, nor do they partake of the religious state.[40] On the other hand it is now immaterial whether they are congregations in which solemn or simple vows are made, either pontifical or diocesan institutes, as long as profession of the three essential vows is made in a community approved by ecclesiastical authority, either supreme or inferior (bishop). But it is not without reason that orders, i. e., religious organizations with solemn vows, are of higher rank and more esteemed by the Church. For they are of a more stable nature and have a long-standing tradition in their favor. This we say, not to disparage the congregations, but as canonical truth. The very fact that the Church has granted to the regular 38 The Order of St. John, or Maltese Knights, was founded in 1048, that of the Knights Templars in 1119, that of the Teutonic Knights in 1190; others were established in different countries; cf. Funk, Manual of Church History, Engl. Trans., 1913, I, 375 f.

39 "Neminem latet," March 19, 1857; "Perpensis," May 3, 1902.

40 Can. 673, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

orders exemption, which she has withheld from the congregations (except by special indult), shows her intention. A special indult was given to several important congregations, v. g., the Redemptorists and the Passionists.[41]

§ 6. EXEMPTION

The Code tells us that "regulars are exempt from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary of the diocese," and that by the name of regulars must be understood religious of an order or religious organization in which solemn vows are taken.[42] In these words is contained the institute of exemption, which has a history of more than twelve centuries and an eventful development in a secular as well as in an ecclesiastical respect, which finally led to the legal recognition of singly granted privileges as a juridical entity. A brief historical review[43] may not be amiss and seems necessary to understand exemption.

1. Up to the beginning of the seventh century the general law of the Church may be said to be embodied in the words of the Council of Chalcedon: "No one is allowed to build or erect a monastery or oratory without the consent of the bishop of the city; all the monks living in that city or country should be subject to the bishops."[44] Whether this injunction was always carried out, we do not know; but it is certain that Gregory the Great (590–604) insisted upon the right of the diocesan bishop over monasteries and monks. For he emphatically states that the bishop is the competent judge in all causes of 41 Also to the Missionary Fathers of the Sacred Heart; cfr. Vermeersh in the Cath. Encycl., XII, 758.

42 Cfr. can. 615; can. 488, 2, 7.

43 Cfr. Fabre, Etude sur le Liber Censuum de l'Eglise Romaine, 1892; Archiv. für Kath. Kirchenrecht (Hueffner), 1906–1907; Schreiber, Kurie und Kloster im XII. Jahrh., 1910 (in Stutz, Kirchenrechtl. Abhandl., 65–68.

44 Can. 4, cf. c. 10, C. 18, q. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

monks and nuns, and that he has to watch over their conduct, punish and correct abuses, because he will have to give an account to God for that part of his flock as well as for the others.[45]

On the other hand he defends the rights of the monasteries and their superiors in a letter to Maximianus of Ravenna,[46] where he says that the brethren have the right to elect an abbot from among themselves, except in case no one worthy of that office can be found in the monastery; that the bishop has no right to meddle in the temporal administration, revenues, property, documents, of the monastery, and should not charge the monastery with taxes nor invade it by any fraudulent action. The privilege of exemption we cannot find in Gregory's letters, though some think it is there.[47] Gregory's rules on the monastic life do not differ essentially from those laid down in St. Benedict's Code.[48]

2. But we are approaching a period, and it is only twenty-four years remote from the death of Gregory, which foreshadows the beginning of real exemption. Bobbio, a monastery founded by St. Columbanus on the Trebbia, was apparently troubled and molested by the Bishop Probus. Abbot Bertulfus, the second successor of the holy founder, seeking protection against the vexatious bishop, betook himself to Rome, where Honorius I, on June 11, 628, granted him a charter of freedom in these plain terms, "No bishop shall rule, by whatever right, in the aforesaid monastery."[49] This sounds like real exemption and may justly be called the first privilege 45 Gregory I, Registrum Epp. (Ewald-Hartmann), 1891, IX, 203; V, 4; VIII, 8; IX, 114; X, 3, 9; XII, 6; XIV, 16.

46 Ibid., VIII, 17; cfr. V, 49; III, 3; VII, 10.

47 Arch. f. K.-R., 1906, p. 314; but Reg. IX, 16 is not to the point.

48 Reg., c. 64.

49 Cfr. Vita Bertulfi, n. 6 (Migne, 87, 1063); Jaffé, Regesta Pontiff., ed. 2, n. 2017.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of its kind. The number of such privileges from the beginning of the seventh to the middle of the ninth century is small, though some English and Frankish monasteries were given extensive exemptions. Weremouth and Melmesburg[50] received such from Sergius I (687–701) and Fulda[51] from Zachary I (741–752). The latter exempts the foundation of Sturmi from every foreign jurisdiction and subjects it to that of the Apostolic See.

3. The ninth century, and especially the pontificate of Nicholas I (858–867), witnessed an increase in the number of privileges granting exemption to monasteries. Forty-nine such privileges were given from 855 to 900 to different Frankish monasteries. As has justly been pointed out, there were good reasons for seeking and granting such papal exemptions.[52] For during that period of internal strife and feudal struggles the secular powers could offer but scanty security and protection, and the advocati or protectors whom Charlemagne set over the monasteries as lay-lawyers and guardians, often betrayed their protegés and ransacked the monastic property. Furthermore, there was a feature peculiar perhaps to Frankish, or let us say, Germanic soil, viz.: the idea of absolute landownership, which claimed full and independent control over a church or altar built on the ground of the owner. Hence more than one monastery was in the hands of the king or of a bishop or vassal upon whose land the monastic church with the monastery had been built. Although this right claimed by the owner was directed chiefly to the temporal administration, yet it gradually led to interference in spiritual rights, especially the election of superiors, and thus jeopardized the free

50 Jaffé, l. c., nn. 2106, 2140.

51 This privilege, formerly doubted, is now generally admitted as genuine; it is contained in Migne, 89, 954.

52 Arch. f. K.-R., 1906, p. 635.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

election of abbots.[53] We said this feature was perhaps peculiar to Germanic soil. The Celtic race of Ireland shows a similar development,— namely, a dual system of tribal claims. For we find, says Bury,[54] "that in some cases the proprietor did not make over all his rights to the ecclesiastical community which was founded on his estate, but retained, and transmitted to his descendants a certain control over it, side by side with the control which the abbot exercised." Besides, there were monasteries in which a direct family right of inheritance to the abbey was established, so that the abbot could be chosen only from the founder's kin. Such a system was ill-fated and especially ill adapted to Benedictine government. Lastly, more than one bishop, either princely landlord or mere Ordinary of a diocese, who, being protected by the brachium saeculare, wielded almost absolute power, did not scruple to attack the property and quiet life of the monks,[55] who were esteemed by nobles and peasants alike. The history of Cluny bears out this statement.

4. Having mentioned these historical facts, we are ready to grasp the tendency of monastic bodies seeking the protection of St. Peter (i. e., the Apostolic See),[56]— a formula occurring in papal privileges ever since the beginning of the tenth century. The regesta sometimes exhibit entries like this: "monasterium tuendum suscipit, bona et privilegia confirmat, iura defendit." In most of these briefs a penal sanction is added against the violators of the papal injunction. Furthermore a census or tribute, five or two soldi,[57] or a byzantinum, or some other 53 Loening, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenrechts, 1878, II, 374 f.

54 Life of St. Patrick, 1905, p. 174 f.

55 Ancient monastic lectionaries contain Mass-formularies such as: "Contra episcopos male agentes," or simply: "Contra malos episcopos."

56 Jaffé, l. c., n. 3466 and passim.

57 The value of a solidus, if of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google kind of money, was sometimes (not regularly) imposed on the monasteries which were placed under papal protection. The ratification of the monastic property was given both in general terms and by an enumeration of single possessions. Sometimes the briefs contain a description of the site and the name of the original donor.

As to the privileges granted by these papal constitutions, there is no uniform and constant tenor or formula, at least up to the time of Alexander III (1159–81). But it is safe to say that most of the privileges contained the right of freely electing the abbot, which was of paramount importance at a time when investiture became dangerous. Occasionally exemption from the coercive power of the bishop was explicitly stated in terms like these: "ut nullus in ipsum monasterium audeat et praesumat sententiam excommunicationis inferre," or, "a nullo possint interdici vel excommunicari nisi a Romano Pontifice." [58] Such a formula as this: "ut monasterium in nullo alicui nisi tantum apostolicae ecclesiae respondere teneatur et ab omni alia jurisdictione et subjectione liberum sit et exemptum," must be taken to mean full exemption. In some privileges, e. g., one granted by Pope Marinus (942–946), we also read of exemption from the duty of attending the diocesan synod.[59]

5. Fully to understand the sometimes heated controversies between bishops and abbeys we must consider two more features which bear more or less directly on the question of exemption: tithes and pontificals. Ever since the sixth century tithes were enforced and formed part gold, would have been about $5.30, but others (Hodgkin, Italy and Her Invaders, I, 778) give it only as $3.00 or twelve shillings; cfr. also Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Solidus"; the byzantinum introduced by Justinian, is nothing else but a gold solidus.

58 Jaffé, l. c., nn. 3800, 4420; Migne, 137, 334; 143, 1327.

59 Jaffé, l. c., nn. 3624, 3025; Gattula, Hist. Cass., I, 94.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the episcopal or ecclesiastical revenues which the faithful were obliged to pay to the church.[60] It is a very interesting canonical question whether they were paid to the church or to the altar. This was an issue at the time of Abbo of Fleury (+ 1004), as we learn from his writings. If these "dimes" were given to the churches, the monks, as proprietors of the same, could legally claim them, and were sometimes even authorized to do so in the papal briefs.[61] But if the donor's intention could be proved to be directed exclusively to the altar, the tithes were supposed to belong to the bishop, as its consecrator. This latter view was defended by Arnulf, bishop of Orleans, and some of his followers, but justly rejected by Abbo of Fleury, who calls the claim of the bishops a "modern heresy" and an "egregious pretext" for giving the offerings of the church to the horses and dogs of lay people, instead of to the monks. He also remarks, most reasonably, that a church without an altar is no church, but a common house.[62] Abbo gained his point with the Capets, and also with Pope Gregory V, a zealous promoter of Clunian reform. As noted above, the right to the tithes was often expressly defined in the bull of exemption.

The other bone of contention was the pontificals. The reader should remember that the abbots were at first, in fact for centuries, not endowed with the priestly character, and hence to speak of pontificals for the first three centuries, up to the beginning of the ninth, would be an anachronism. However, Pope Eugene I, in a synod held at Rome in 826, ordered that the abbots

60 The synod of Macon, 585, can. 5, ordered their payment under threat of censures, and later synods and royal capitularies enforced them.

61 For Cluny, cfr. Migne, 151, 291, 485 f.

62 Ep. ad G., in Migne, 139, 440 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

should be priests in order that they might be able to "heal the sins of their brethren."[63] Here jurisdiction in foro interno is plainly meant. But Fleury received a more extensive power from Pope Benedict VII (974–983), viz., that of absolving men and women of the order.[64] About the same time we hear of papal privileges directly touching the right of pontificals. First, indeed, negatively rather than positively. Thus concessions were made that the diocesan bishop could perform pontifical functions only at the direct invitation of the abbot,[65] or that the abbot might invite any bishop to perform them, provided he was no heretic or schismatic, or that he might be blessed by any bishop.[66]

As to the right of pontifical dress we first read of dalmatics and sandals being granted by John XIII (965–972) to the abbot of St. Vincent of Metz.[67] The gloves or chiroticae were added in a privilege of Cielo d'Oro (Pavia) for "the honor of St. Peter" and "the most holy Augustine whose relics were there preserved." The Abbot of Brevnow (Bohemia) in 993 received the privilege of using mitre, gloves, sandals, maniple, and belt.[68] The same right was granted to the abbot of Reichenau, together with the prerogative of being consecrated more episcopali by the Pope.[69]

Thus pontificals began to be given to abbots in the last decades of the tenth century. The privilege became more frequent in the tenth and common in the twelfth century. That the bishops were not too highly pleased with this development we know from the chroniclers, one of whom, 63 Can. 27, Mansi, Coll. Conc., XIV, 1000.

64 Jaffé, n. 3803; Sackur, Die Cluniazenser, 1892, II, 272 f.

65 Jaffé, n. 3907 (Fulda, A. D. 999).

66 Jaffé, n. 3826 (Cielo d'Oro, Pavia, A. D. 986); 3764 (S. Salvatore, Pavia, A. D. 906).

67 Jaffé, ed. 1, n. 2869, n. 2900.

68 Jaffé, n. 3826, n. 2946 (1 ed.).

69 Hermannus Contractus, Chronica ad an. 1032, Migne, 143, 253.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Herman the Lame of Reichenau, tells us [70] that the bishop of Constance, Warmannus, protested to the Emperor Conrad II so long and vigorously that the abbot was compelled to deliver the papal bull together with the pontifical insignia to be burnt on Holy Thursday, 1033. Cluny had a fight with the bishop of Macon for many years, and some bishops went so far as to deny the validity of such papal privileges.

6. However, all this resistance proved useless. In the XIIth century papal protection was granted not only to single monasteries, as had been the case in former centuries — Cluny being the sole "order" which was exempt as such — but also to entire congregations, for instance, those of Vallombrosa,[71] and Camaldoli.[72] This same century is perhaps the most important for the historico-canonical investigation into the meaning of exemption, which now enters the decretals. The subject is not free from controversy. It cannot be denied that the regulars sometimes stretched the papal protection further than the grantor had intended, wherefore the Roman Court was more than once asked what the papal protection included. Many monasteries which "delivered" [73] themselves to papal protection, generally, though not always, paid a certain tax or tribute (census), which was regarded as an indication (indicium) that they were under papal protection, but not that they were papal property, in the sense of private property. The relation between such monasteries and the papal Court was similar to that between a private proprietor and the State (eminent domain). In many briefs recurs the formula: "ad indicium per-

70 Chronica (Migne, 143, 235).

71 Migne, 200, 569, 1067; Jaffé, l. c., nn. 4053, 8428.

72 Mittarelli, Annal: Camaldul., II, App. 236.

73 This was called traditio, and the monasteries thus delivered were called monasteria tradita or commendata.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceptae a Romana ecclesia libertatis (or protectionis, or iuris or proprietatis), bisancium unum quotannis Lateranensi palatio persolvetis." What does that "indicium libertatis" mean? was asked of Alexander III. He answered the question in a well-known decretal,[74] in which he says that, as not all monasteries placed under the special jurisdiction (iuris) of Blessed Peter pay an annual tribute, so neither are all the monasteries which pay that tribute free from episcopal jurisdiction, and therefore the wording of every privilege must be weighed, so that every church which pays tribute and is under the special jurisdiction of Bl. Peter and pays the annual tribute as a token of the liberty received, may be looked upon as exempt; whereas, on the other hand, a church which simply pays the annual tribute as a token of the protection it receives is not eo ipso to be considered free from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary." In order to understand this decision we must remember that in the XIIth century a distinction was made at the Roman Court between specialis tutela and simple tutelage. The former was connected with the clausula added in the privileges: "salva sedis apostolicae auctoritate," whilst the privileges for simple tutelage had the clause: "salva sedis apost. auctoritate et dioecesani episcopi canonica iustitia." From this it follows that there were three kinds of religious bodies: (a) such as had no papal tutelage or brief at all, and these were very few; (b) such as enjoyed the papal protection, but were nevertheless more or less subject to the Ordinary's jurisdiction, and finally (c) such as were under the special tutelage of the Apostolic See and therefore exempt from the coercive power, especially of the diocesan bishop. The answer given by Alexander was authentic, but not novel, as some have [74] C. 8, f, V, 33; cf. c. 14, 1 b; c. 10, 6°, V, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

claimed.[75] For its obvious meaning is simply to warn the religious not to read more into the text of the papal brief than the legislator would naturally grant, and to give the legates a key to the interpretation of papal documents. A similar decision is that of Boniface VIII, who, instead of using the term specialis, says that the document must treat "principaliter" of exemption.[76] This again means that the whole tenor of the papal privilege must be examined, not only the terms tutela, protectio, libertas, etc.

7. Such is the theoretical aspect of exemption as we find it in the Decretals, which, however, barely touch its extent. The First Lateran Council (1123) laid down general rules governing the relation between diocesan bishops and regulars living in their territory. Three canons especially regulate that matter. Abbots and monks are not allowed to administer the Sacraments of Penance and Extreme Unction, nor to visit the sick, nor to say Mass publicly; the consecration of chrism, holy oils and altars, and the ordination of clerics belong to the diocesan bishop; religious priests in charge of souls must be appointed by the Ordinary, to whom they must give an account of their work and of what belongs to the bishop; whatever services or tributes the monasteries were wont to render to the Ordinary since the time of Gregory VII, they must render also in future; nor does the prescription of thirty years hold good for abbots or monks.[77] In another canon (not found in all editions) subjection and obedience to the bishops as their teachers and pastors is inculcated for the monks as a paternal tra-

75 Schreiber, l. c., I, 141 ff.; cfr. Studien O. S. B., 1911 (Vol. 32), p. 693 ff., where a correct interpretation is given.

76 C. 10, 60, I, 7.

77 Mansi, Coll. Conc., cc. 17–19, Vol. XXI, 285 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dition.[78] This canon embodies the idea of St. Bernard, who was not inclined to favor exemption. Yet it was his order that some years after his death received most extensive privileges. Urban III granted the Cistercians of Clairvaux absolute freedom from the coercive power of the bishop, and other popes granted them the prerogatives of calling in any Catholic bishop for pontifical functions.[79] Similar privileges were granted to other monasteries.

It was but natural that the military orders (the Knights of St. John, the Maltese Knights, the Knights Templars, etc.), should, especially during the time of the Crusades, be greatly favored by the popes, who granted them extensive exemptions, in which even their oblates shared.[80]

8. Exemption became more widespread and hotly contradicted when the great Mendicant Orders arose. It lay in their very nature that their activity should extend to people and clergy alike, and that they should come into contact with the diocesan bishops. Their labors in the pulpit and in the confessional required approbation either by the Ordinary or by the Holy See. The latter decidedly favored the Orders because they were true reformers, and first granted them the old privilege of exemption from the coercive power of the Ordinary by deciding that no episcopal interdict was to touch the churches of the Mendicants,[81] that the excommunication of a religious by his superior was to be acknowledged by the bishop,[82] and that absolution from censures imparted by religious superiors to their subjects was valid without any further interposition.[83] These privileges, and especially that 78 Ibid., col. 300.

79 Jaffé, nn. 9728, 9756.
80 Archiv. für K.-R., 1907 (87), p. 270 ff.
81 Potthast, Regesta Pont. Rom., 1874, I, n. 6808.
82 Ibid., n. 7123.
83 Ibid., n. 7901.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

granted by Martin IV ("Ad fructus uberes," Dec. 13, 1281) provoked opposition on the part of the higher and lower clergy. This document[84] granted to the general and the provincials of the Franciscans and Dominicans the right to examine and approve by Apostolic authority their priests for preaching and hearing confessions, without interference from any bishop or parish priest. This general privilege was limited by Boniface VIII and Clement V to the provinces and cities where the Mendicants had settled, and required them to obtain the permission of the local prelate or pastor.[85] But the validity of confessions was nowhere affected.[86] The same decretal enacts the freedom of burial, not only for the Mendicants themselves, but also for those who wished to be buried from or in their churches or cemeteries, provided, however, that the quarta funeris was paid to the parish priest.

9. Thus, up to the Council of Trent, the chief aim of exemption may be described as withdrawal of religious from the punitive or coercive power of the diocesan Ordinary.[87] For the monasteries or congregations of the Benedictine Order another point was of paramount importance, namely, that the freedom of election, as enjoined by the Rule, should be guaranteed by the papal power, and we find this point insisted upon in nearly all the privileges. The exercise of pontifical functions and the right of tithing were also mentioned among the privileges granted by the Holy See, as well as the prerogative to call in any Catholic bishop to perform the pontifical functions of consecration and ordination.

However, these briefs of exemption were not always

84 Ibid., Vol. II, n. 21821: "generali et provincialibus."

85 Cfr. c. 12, X, V, 38.

86 C. 2, Clem. III, 7, de sepulturis.

87 Schreiber, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the same extent; some were wider, some narrower, and hence the bearing of each had to be judged from the wording of the text. At first, as we have noted, such privileges were, as a rule, granted only to single monasteries. But the centralized organizations of Cluny, Camaldoli, Vallombrosa, and Citeaux paved the way for the still more centralized Orders of the Mendicants, who thus found the soil prepared for a fuller and more extensive exemption. But a "cut and dried" notion of exemption cannot be inferred from the papal documents of that period, as is evident from the quarrels between the secular clergy on the one hand and the regular clergy, especially the Mendicants, on the other, which arose everywhere in connection with the Constitution of Boniface VIII, "Super cathedram" (1300).[88] Bishops, parish priests and university professors tried to curtail the privilege of exemption, whilst the regulars vigorously fought for their rights. Both sides were guilty of excesses. The Council of Constance and Basle drew up a series of propositions aiming at a restriction of exemption, but without success. The same (fifteenth) century witnessed the rise of new monastic congregations devoted to reform of the religious life, and these were fully exempted by the popes. Thus Eugene IV granted to the brotherhood founded at St. Justina of Padua (1412) complete exemption from the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries, and from all charitable subsidies and other like obligations.[89] Sixtus IV, a former General of the Franciscans, showed great favor to the Mendicants,[90] especially the Friars Minor to whom, in the so-called "Mare Magnum Minorum"

88 C. 2, Extrav. Comm., III, 6, de sepulturis.

89 June 30, 1436.

90 Arch. f. K.-R., 1907 (87), p. 626; Pastor, Geschichte der Päpste, II, 536.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(Aug. 31, 1474) he renewed and ratified all the privileges granted them by his predecessors.

10. The Council of Trent strove to cut off some exaggerated prerogatives, without, however, touching the substance of exemption. A distinction was, moreover, drawn between cases in which the regulars were subject to the Ordinary as such, and cases in which they were bound to obey him "as delegate of the Apostolic See." The former class comprises chiefly matters of ordination, hearing the confessions of seculars, the publication of censures and the observation of feast-days, the punishment of regulars who were scandalously delinquent outside their monasteries, preaching and the promulgation of indulgences.[91] There were but few cases in which the regulars were subjected to the Ordinary as delegate of the Apostolic See.[92] It is noteworthy that the Council refused to decide that all regulars, i. e., religious with solemn vows,— only such existed at that time, with the exception of part of the Society of Jesus — were ipso iure exempt, or to define what exemption really implied. The Council seems to have taken for granted that most of the regulars were actually exempt and left the quaestio iuris untouched. As a consequence, the ancient controversies between bishops and monasteries about exemption continued after the Council. The Austrian bishops discouraged exemption, and the Bishop of Constance refused to acknowledge the written documents of Swiss monasteries which claimed exemption. Besides there are many small convents (parvi conventus) in which the regular discipline 91 Sess. 23, c. 2, de ref.; sess. 23, c. 15, de ref.; sess. 25, c. 12, de reg.; sess. 25, c. 14, de reg.; sess. 6, c. 3, de ref.; sess. 5, c. 2, de ref.; sess. 21, c. 9, de ref.; Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., IX, 15, 4 ff.

92 Sess. 5, c. 1, de ref.; sess. 25, cc. 5, 9, de reg.; sess. 6, c. 3, de ref.; cfr. Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 327 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

had declined and which, therefore, seemed to invite interference by the bishop. Urban VIII and Innocent X decreed that convents in which at least twelve religious could not be maintained were subject to episcopal visitation, correction, and jurisdiction, the bishop in such cases acting as delegate of the Apostolic See.[93] However, these papal decrees affected mostly houses existing in Italy and the adjoining islands; elsewhere the houses of regulars continued to enjoy exemption, as far as the Tridentine laws permitted and the bishops did not interfere. Leo XIII ("Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881) allowed the regulars living in England and the U. S., although there be but two or three in a missionary residence, to be exempt in all matters not pertaining to the care of souls.

This, then, is briefly the history of exemption, which has now received at last a formal acknowledgment for all regulars, i. e., members of religious orders who take solemn vows and are, in the majority at least, of clerical rank.

11. Before concluding this chapter it may be useful to discuss the view of the glossators of Gratian's Decree concerning exemptio a lege dioecesana and exemptio a lege iurisdictionis. The former was vindicated to the monasteries, but not the latter. Exemption a lege dioecesana, according to the glossators, comprises immunity from taxation, cathedraticum or the third or fourth part of the tithes, and freedom from being called to the diocesan synod, whereas the lex iurisdictionis comprises the right of ordaining the clergy and consecrating altars, churches, and virgins, the power of correction and of [93] Urban VIII, June 21, 1625; Innocent X, "Instaurandae," Oct. 15, 1652; "Ut in parvis," Feb. 10, 1654; Benedict XIV, De Syn., III, 2, 1 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

suspending and judging criminal and civil cases.[94] The reader may judge for himself whether this distinction has any foundation in the privileges granted by the Apostolic See. These glossators (Huguccio, Ioannes Teutonicus, etc.) must have read very few papal briefs on that subject. Abbo of Fleury, for instance, never denied that the monasteries were obliged to pay the tithes established by law or custom for their churches, but his monastery was exempt in many other respects, especially from the obligation of having its clerics ordained by the diocesan Ordinary. Besides, the main element of all exemption privileges was freedom from the coercive power of the bishops. Nevertheless, the distinction explained above has been retained by later canonists,— a remarkable example of the power of imitation.

94 Cfr. the Gloss on c. 1, C. 10, q. 1; on c. 34, C. 16, q. 1; c. 6, C. 18, q. 2; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., I, 4, 3.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

COMMENTARY

After these preliminary notes we now continue our commentary. The first five canons of Part II treat of the definition of the religious state, of the different terms occurring in the Code, and of the effect the Code has upon the rules and constitutions of religious and precedence among them.

DEFINITION OF THE RELIGIOUS STATE

CAN. 487

Status religiosus seu stabilis in communi vivendi modus, quo fideles, praeter communia praecepta, evangelica quoque consilia servanda per vota obedientiae, castitatis et paupertatis suscipiunt, ab omnibus in honore habendus est.

Here we have both a definition and an encomium of the religious state. The religious state is a permanent mode of living in common, by which the faithful, besides obeying the commandments, also observe the evangelical counsels embodied in the vows of obedience, chastity, and poverty. The encomium or praise of that state is expressed in the words: it is to be honored by all.

To begin with the latter, it is but truth to say that it has been the constant and universal teaching of the Church ever since the religious state commenced to exist, that it is deserving of honor. St. Jerome calls the monks

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and virgins "the flowers and ornaments of the Church."[1] His controversy with Jovinian is well known.[2] St. Augustine extols the monastic life as the best known in the universe.[3] Cassiodorius, the once powerful statesman under Theodoric the Great, says of it:[4] "A heavenly life upon earth, an imitation of the faithful angels, to live spiritually in the flesh, and not to love the vices of the world, a truly pleasant paradise, in which grow so many fruits of virtues." Alcuin (804) exclaims: "O happy life of the monks, pleasing and appeasing to God, and loved by the angels."[5] St. Bernard of Clairvaux compares the monastic orders to the angelic choirs and calls the religious life the shortest route to heaven.[6]

But there were also dissentient voices. One was that already noticed, of the heretic Jovinian. In the thirteenth century violent attacks were made on the religious state by a powerful and influential party, of which William of St. Amour was the recognized leader.[7] These new opponents, however, were, at least theoretically, silenced by St. Thomas of Aquin,[8] who wrote several smaller treatises against them and set forth the theological viewpoint with great force in his immortal "Summa" (Qa Qae). St. Bonaventure employed his truly seraphic pen against the adversaries of the Friars Minor.[9] William's errors were condemned by Alexander IV in more

1 Cf. Migne, P. L., 22, 489.

2 Ibid., 23, 211 ff.; however, exaggerations occur in St. Jerome's writings; cfr. Bardenhewer-Shahan, Patrology, 1908, p. 465.

3 Migne, P. L., 37, 372, 1277.

4 Ibid., 70, 734.

5 Migne, 100, 298.

6 Ibid., 182, 912; 183, 595.

7 Procter, O. P., The Religious State by St. Thomas Aquinas, London, 1902, p. III.

8 S. Thomas, Contra Retrahentes a Religionis Ingressu; Contra Impugnantes Dei Cultum (Paris ed., t. XX; English by Sands & Co., London, 1903).

9 Liber Apol. in eos qui Ordini Min. Adversantur; Expositio in Reg. Fratrum Min.; De Paupertate Christi contra Guil. (opp., Lugd., 1668, t. VII).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

than one Constitution.[10] The diabolical errors of Wiclif were reprobated by Martin V and the Council of Constance.[11]

The Pseudo-Council of Pistoja (1786) could not refrain from attacking the monastic or religious state, against which it issued several decrees, which were proscribed by Pius VI in his "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794. The framers of these condemned decrees kindly permitted one order, viz., that of St. Benedict, to exist, but pruned it to suit their Febronian-Josephinistic taste, allowing a certain amount of psalmody and a certain restricted capacity for the sacred ministry, abrogating the distinction between choir monks and others, rejecting the perpetual vow of stability, etc.[12]

We cannot help touching the attitude of certain followers of "Americanism" which was rejected by Leo XIII in his letter to Cardinal Gibbons, "Testem benevolentiae," Dec. 25, 1898. As this papal document clearly shows, the depreciation of the so-called passive virtues, such as obedience and humility, led the champions of that unecclesiastical tendency to belittle those congregations which are devoted to the contemplative life, and to underestimate the religious state as such, which, they maintained, is not in harmony with the spirit of our times, inasmuch as the vows restrict human liberty too much and are adapted more to weak than to strong minds. All this, says Leo XIII, is opposed to the very nature of liberty, which is fostered by the religious vows and raised into a higher sphere; and contrary to the teaching of history. He calls attention to the fact that the first missionaries to the United States were religious, and that a statue has been publicly erected to one of them, Père Marquette.[13]

10 Denzinger, Enchirid., n. 380.
11 Ibid., 490–511; 520 f., 574, 665.
12 Denzinger, l. c., nn. 1443 ff.
13 Cf. Eccl. Review, 1899, Vol.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code's definition of the religious state comprises three elements: stability, vows, and the common life. Before entering upon a discussion of these points we note that the Code says: "quo fideles." "Monks," solitaries or ascetics, were and are found in more than one pagan race, as among the Buddhists.[14] The essential difference between non-Christian and Christian asceticism lies, not so much in their extrinsic form,— for both tend to self-perfection by some kind of penance — but in the difference of their specific aims. Non-Christian asceticism aims at self-annihilation, Christian asceticism at love, as St. Thomas[15] so admirably states. "The Christian ideal is frankly an ascetic one, and monachism is simply the endeavor to effect a material realization of that ideal, or organization in accordance with it, when taken literally as regards its counsels as well as its 'Precepts.'"[16] Between counsels and precepts there is a difference of degree only, not of essence. For the end and aim of all Christians and, in fact, we may say, of every human being, is perfection, as Yahwe bade Abraham "walk before me and be perfect." This perfection consists in the love of God and men, which brings man to his eternal goal. However, aside from the love attained by the Blessed in heaven, there are diverse degrees of charity which we earthly pilgrims may arrive at; one is necessary for salvation, and therefore a matter of strict precept, whereas the other is merely a matter of counsel for those who desire to approach the ideal of perfection possessed by the Blessed. "Now it is in this effort that perfection

30, p. 406 f.; Card. Gasparri also refers to that document.

14 Cfr. Aiken, The Dhamma of Gotama the Buddha and the Gospel of Jesus Christ, 1900; Idem in the Cath. Encycl., III, 32 f. Ascetics were found also among the Aztecs and Incas.

15 Procter, l. c., Ch. II, p. 9.

16 Cath. Encycl., X, 459 (Huddelston, O. S. B.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in this life consists, to which we are invited by the counsels."[17] This effort is a striving after perfection; but where and how is it to be made?

1. In a stable condition or state, for state implies a certain position which is not easily changed or moved, but quiet and favorably disposed. This can be brought about in movable and changeable man only by assuming a voluntary obligation to remain in the state once chosen.[18] Therefore it is absurd to say that religious have abdicated their freedom and natural liberty. The very act by which they enter the religious state is a voluntary one, performed with full deliberation. But it is also unreasonable to deny, with Bouix,[19] the necessity of the obligation insisted upon by St. Thomas. For no other tie is imaginable — except physical coaction, which has entirely ceased — that would bind a man to a state of life not prescribed by the Lord of life and death.

This state is called the religious state. Religion signifies, not any kind of worship, but the worship of God. It is that virtue by which man offers service and homage to his Creator. Therefore those are strictly called religious who give themselves entirely to the divine service, as a burnt offering so to speak,— a holocaustum.[20]

2. This offering is made by taking the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. A vow is a promise made to God of a thing or action which we are not obliged to offer at all, or at least not to the extent or in the form promised. It has the character of a stable promise, and therefore is apt to produce or ratify the state chosen. The object of a vow is something not 17 Procter, l. c., Ch. 6, p. 17; St. Thomas, Summa Theol., 2a 2ae, q. 184.

18 Summa Theol., 2a, 2ae, q. 183, a 1.

19 De Iure Regularium, 1857, I, p. 7.

20 Summa Theol., 2a 2ae, q. 186, a. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

merely good and lawful [21] in itself, but better or more noble. Lastly, a vow is something sacred because it partakes of the virtue of religion and has God himself for its direct aim and object. From these qualities follows the binding or obligatory character of a vow. It is a promise made to God with the special intention to do Him homage, and the man who makes this promise has the firm will to keep it unless prevented by unforeseen obstacles. That the three vows mentioned really and peculiarly belong to the religious state may be seen from what St. Thomas [22] says about them. They remove the obstacles that impede the road to perfection or love of God and men: (1) poverty, the disorderly inclination to gain and hold earthly possessions, (2) chastity, the impetuous aspirations of the flesh and human ties, and (3) obedience, the powerful love of oneself. Of the three, that of obedience belongs most peculiarly to the religious life, since by it man sacrifices his own will, and therefore everything, because obedience includes both poverty and chastity, for it is by his own free will that a man makes use either of his body or his goods.[23] From this we may understand why St. Benedict did not explicitly mention poverty and continence as special vows in his rule, for they are, partly at least, included in obedience.

3. But though a religious state which enjoins the three vows may and did exist among the ancient hermits, yet now-a-days the Church limits this state to a life in common, because a solitary life, unless assumed after due preparation or by a special divine grace, is full of dangers and illusions. Life in common, then, (cenobitic

21 The vow of Jephta (Jud. 11, 30) was lawful in itself but too indiscriminately made, its fulfillment — the killing of his daughter — was simply unlawful.

22 Summa Theol., 2a 2ae, q. 186 (Procter, l. c., Chs. 7–11, p. 18 ff.).

23 Ibid., q. 188, a. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google life), means a stable mode of living under the same rule and roof, although all the members may not be dwelling in the same convent or monastery or provincial house.

Canon 488

In canonibus qu. sequuntur, veniunt nomine:

1.° Religionis, societas, a legitima ecclesiastica auctoritate approbata, in qua sodales, secundum proprias ipsius societatis leges, vota publica, perpetua vel temporaria, elapso tamen tempore renovanda, nuncupant, atque ita ad evangelicam perfectionem tendunt;

2.° Ordinis, religio in qua vota sollemnia nuncupantur; Congregationis monasticae, plurium monasteriorum sui iuris inter se coniunctio sub eodem Superiore; religionis exemptae, religio sive votorum sollemnium sive simplicium, a iurisdictione Ordinarii loci subducta; Congregationis religiosae vel Congregationis simpliciter, religio in qua vota dumtaxat simplicia sive perpetua sive temporaria emittuntur;

3.° Religionis iuris pontificii, religio quae vel approbationem vel saltem laudis decretum ab Apostolica Sede est consecuta; iuris dioecesani, religio quae ab Ordinariis erecta, hoc laudis decretum nondum obtinuit;

4.° Religionis clericalis, religio cuius plerique sodales sacerdotio augentur; secus est laicalis;

5.° Domus religiosae, domus alicuius religionis in genere; domus regularis, domus Ordinis; domus formatae domus religiosa in qua sex saltem religiosi professi degunt, quorum, si agatur de religione clericali, quatuor saltem sint sacerdotes;

6.° Provinciae, plurium religiosarum domorum in-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ter se coniunctio sub eodem Superiore, partem eiusdem religionis constituens;

7.° Religiosorum, qui vota nuncuparunt in aliqua religione; religiosorum votorum simplicium, qui in Congregatione religiosa; regularium, qui in Ordine; sororum, religiosae votorum simplicium; monialium, religiosae votorum sollemnium aut, nisi ex rei natura vel ex contextu sermonis aliud constet, religiosae quarum vota ex instituto sunt sollemnia, sed pro aliquibus locis ex Apostolicae Sedis praescripto sunt simplicia;

8.° Superiorum maiorum, Abbas Primas, Abbas Superior Congregationis monasticae, Abbas monasterii sui iuris, licet ad monasticam Congregationem pertinentis, supremus religionis Moderator, Superior provincialis, eorundem vicarii aliique ad instar provincialium potestatem habentes.

This canon explains the terms which are used in the Code in connection with the religious life.[24] They are the following:

1. Religio (institute) indicates a society, approved by legitimate ecclesiastical authority, whose members strive after evangelical perfection by observing the special laws of that society and by making public vows, either perpetual or temporary, the latter to be renewed when the time expires.

2. Ordo (order) denotes a religious organization in which solemn vows are taken. Congregatio monastica is a union of several independent monasteries under one superior. Religio exempta means a religious organization of either solemn or simple vows that has been with-

24 The translation of this canon is, on the whole, taken from the Eccl. Rev., 1918 (Vol. 58), p. 141 f., by Very Rev. Fr. Stanislaus Woywod, O. F. M.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

drawn from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary of the diocese. Congregatio religiosa, or simply Congregatio, signifies a religious body in which only simple vows are taken; these simple vows may either be perpetual or temporary.

3. Religio iuris pontificii, or a religious pontifical institute, is a religious organization which has received from the Holy See either approval or at least a decretum laudis. Religio iuris dioecesani, or a religious diocesan institute, is a religious organization which has been instituted by the Ordinary and has not yet obtained a decretum laudis from the Holy See.

4. Religio clericalis, or clerical institute, means a religious organization most of whose members are priests; if they are laymen, it is called religio laicalis.

5. Domus religiosa, or a religious house, signifies the residence of a religious organization. Domus regularis, or house of regulars, is the house of an Order. Domus formata means a religious house in which reside at least six professed members, of whom, if there is question of a clerical organization, at least four must be priests.

6. Provincia, or province, is a combination of several houses of religious under one superior, constituting part of a religious Order or Congregation.

7. Religiosi, or religious, are those who have taken vows in any religious community; religiosi votorum simplicium, or religious with simple vows, are those who have taken vows in a religious Congregation; regulares, or regulars, are the professed members of an Order; sorores, or Sisters, are women who have taken simple vows; moniales, or nuns, are religious women with solemn vows, unless either by the nature or the context of the canons the term is to be interpreted otherwise. There are also nuns whose vows are by their rule solemn, but

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have for certain countries been declared simple by the Holy See.

8. Superiores maiores are the Abbot Primate, Abbots who are superiors of monastic Congregations, Abbots of Monasteries that are independent though belonging to some monastic Congregation, the Superior General of any religious organization, the Provincial Superiors and their Vicars, and all others who have the same jurisdiction as Provincials.

Some notes seem required. Religio is here taken as part and parcel of the Christian religion, or religious state, as in a sense signifying preëminently what religion broadly implies, viz., worship or service of God. The etymological derivation of religio is given by Cicero [25] and adopted by theologians is from diligently treating and, as it were, carefully rereading (re-legere) the things that pertain to the worship of God. Religion in the sense of religious state, therefore, is nothing else but a concrete and emphatic, nay, we may say, exclusive occupation with divine things or at least things that have reference to God, inasfar as man's perfection is thereby most securely achieved.

But, since it belongs to the whole Church, a religio is not to be thought of without the approbation of the legitimate ecclesiastical authority. True, we do not read of any formal approbation of the rules of St. Basil or St. Benedict,[26] but if they had not been in conformity with the spirit of the Church, their existence would have been not only precarious but short. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the founders of religious institutes

25 De Natura Deorum, l. II, c. 28: "Qui autem omnia, quae ad cultum deorum pertinerent, diligenter retractarent et tanquam relegerent, sunt dicti religiosi ex relegendo."

26 St. Gregory the Great (Dial., II, 36) praises the rule of St. Benedict, but only as an ecclesiastical writer; the bull alleged by some is spurious.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

thought it necessary to seek the formal approbation of the Holy See, and the fourth Lateran Council [27] and subsequent laws made this step imperative,— which does not, however, mean that ecclesiastical approbation is required by divine law.[28]

Approbation involves two elements: an authentic judgment and power conferred on the religious superior to accept vows and receive members. The authentic judgment, which is generally held to be infallible, at least concerning religious orders and in its final stage, implies nothing else but a declaration that the institute is becoming, licit, and useful; or, as Suarez [29] says, it is a kind of canonization, by which the institute is declared holy. The faculty is required, because the superior must act as a public person or in the name of the Church, wherefore the vows accepted by him are called public vows.

There are, however, different degrees of approbation. Before stating the mode by which the Roman Court is now wont to proceed, it is necessary to distinguish between orders and congregations. Orders, or organizations with solemn vows, are not easily approved now unless they accept the rule of one of the ancient orders as their fundamental code, to which they may add their own constitutions.

Rule means the sum-total of the regulations which the first founder gave to his community, whilst constitutions are additions or by-laws which modify or explain the original code. Thus the various (fourteen) Benedictine Congregations all obey the Benedictine Rule and, besides, each has its own constitutions. Later orders, e. g.,

27 C. 9, X, III, 36; c. un. 6°, III, 17; c. 1, Extrav. Comm., III, 11.

28 Suarez, De Statu Religioso, I. II, c. 15, n. 2 (ed. Paris, 1859, t. XV, 192).

29 Ibid., n. 13 ff.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

the Jesuits and Barnabites, call their original rule by the name of Constitutions.

Those modern Congregations which do not follow any of the ancient rules have Constitutions, not rules. But even if they follow a "rule," e. g., that of St. Francis, they must have constitutions approved by the bishop or Holy See. As long as their constitutions are not approved by the Apostolic See, or have at least received the decree of recognition (decretum laudis) from the same authority, the institute is simply diocesan, subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinary. And it matters nothing whether or not the members follow a rule already approved.

The Constitutions of a monastic congregation or of a branch of a clerical order require the papal approbation, but the procedure is not the same as for the approbation of religious congregations. For the former send their "Constitutions" to the S. C. Relig., which, after hearing one or more consultors, returns them with its remarks to the head of the monastic or clerical body concerned with the clause: "ad triennium or quinquennium ad experimenti instar." When the time thus set has elapsed, application for a further trial or for final approbation must be made, whereupon the S. Congregation gives its decision.

In the case of religious Congregations with simple vows the procedure [30] is as follows:

1. If the institute has only one or two houses, and no constitutions properly so called, the sacred Congregation sometimes issues a letter praising the institution of the founder or the scope of the institute. This document is nothing else but a recommendation and does not make [30] Normae secundum quas S. C. EE. et RR. procedere solet in approbandis Novis Institutis votorum simplicium, Rome, 1901.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the institute a papal one. However, we would not deny it the nature of a religious institute, provided episcopal approbation has been obtained.

2. The decree of recognition or praise, decretum laudis, is the first step by which the Holy See raises the institute to papal rank. This decree is granted after the institute has spread sufficiently and given proof of its spiritual and material vitality. To obtain the decretum laudis,

a) A petition [31] must be sent to the Sovereign Pontiff, signed by the superior and his assistants, begging for approbation. This petition must be accompanied by

b) Letters of recommendation from the Ordinary or Ordinaries in whose dioceses the congregation has houses. These letters should contain the opinion of the Ordinary concerning the nature, utility, and work of the congregation as well as a request for its approbation and suggestions as to desirable changes in the constitutions. Each letter must be signed and sealed by the bishop and addressed to the S. Cong. of Religious.[32]

c) An accurate report must be made to Rome on the foundation of the institute and its present condition,—personal, spiritual, and material. The personal report must state the number of professed members, novices and candidates, and if there is a distinction between members (e. g., choir and lay members), how many there are of each class; also the number of houses in the diocese or dioceses. The spiritual or disciplinary report concerns the manner of, and progress in following the Constitutions,[33] the novitiate, and any serious difficulties that may have arisen with regard to the Constitution. The mate-

31 This must be written in Latin, French or Italian.

32 See Bastien, Directoire Canonique, translated by Lanslots, Handbook of Canon Law, 3rd ed., 1903.

33 A detailed statement of the government is not required, because this is supposed to be contained in the constitutions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rial or financial report must state the resources of the institute, whether a dowry (dos) be required and how much, whether there are any debts, etc. This report (under c) must be signed by the superior general, the treasurer, and the secretary general, and the Ordinary in whose diocese the mother house (domus princeps) is located must add his testimony as to the truthfulness and authenticity of the document.

d) Lastly, the Constitutions [34] as approved by the Ordinary must be included in either Latin, Italian, or French. At least twelve printed copies must be forwarded, because the various consultors are each entitled to a copy.

After the S. C. of Religious has issued the decree of recognition or praise, the Constitutions are not yet regarded as approved, but the institute is now under the jurisdiction of the S. C. Rel., and no change is allowed in the Constitutions. Before the Constitutions are approved, either on trial or definitively, the institute itself is approved and generally also the Constitutions receive an experimental approval; but this is granted only after a certain lapse of time, during which the Constitutions should be tried, and a faithful report made as to the practicability and efficiency of the same. During that time the changes and modifications inserted by the S. C. Rel. must be conscientiously followed and no changes should be made. Finally, after several experiments and a revision of the Constitutions according to the suggestions of the S. C. Rel., they are approved, whereupon neither the superiors of the institute nor the Ordinary of the diocese are allowed to change them. Note that any liturgical book, or directory, or calendar, or book of customs referred to in the Constitutions does not by vir-[34] If the text is not printed, it should be typewritten. French is permitted because it is the diplomatic language of the Roman Court.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tue of that approbation become "canonized" or formally approved. For instance, a so-called "Caeremoniale Monasticum" is not sanctioned by the approval of the Constitutions. Books referring to the liturgy of the Latin Church require a special approbation by the S. C. of Rites.

It may be well to mention here what the "Normae" [85] wish to see excluded from Constitutions submitted for approval.

1. No preface or introduction is allowed, nor any historical notes or letters of endorsement or recommendation except such received from the Holy See.

2. No quotations must be made from the Bible, the Church councils, or from the works of the Holy Fathers or theologians, much less may dogmatical or moral questions be brought in or doctrinal decisions cited, especially in matters of vows. Ascetic instructions and exhortations, spiritual and mystical considerations, questions from manuals or ceremonials, are also to be eschewed.

3. No reference is to be made to the office of bishops and confessors, because the Constitutions are not written for these; neither is mention to be made of the order of study and life of the students, or of the detailed order of daily exercises.

4. No mention is to be made of civil laws or magistrates, nor of the approbation by the government.

5. Minute regulations about the lower offices, such as pertain to the kitchen, infirmary, or vestry, are to be omitted.

6. Every term or expression which applies to institutes with solemn vows must be avoided for congregations with simple vows, such as regula, monasterium,

[85] N. 26–33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

moniales, instead of which must be used: constitutiones, institutum or domus, sorores, etc.

These three stages: simple acknowledgment or recommendation of the intention of the founder and his scope, the decree of praise, and formal approbation, are not always insisted on by the S. C. Rel., but sometimes the first is omitted, because not asked for.[36] But the decree of praise and formal approbation of the institute or Constitutions — the two may be combined — are always required, as the Code plainly states.

c) Lastly, note the phrase: vota publica, perpetua vel temporanea: public vows, either perpetual or temporary. Here a distinction between vows is asserted, to which we may add the one between solemn and simple vows, as this occurs in n. 2 of the same canon.

1. A vow or promise made to God is public if accepted in the name of the Church by legitimate authority.[37] Such an authority may be any ecclesiastic who is empowered by the Church to accept vows, either bishops or religious superiors, acting with proper or delegated power. Hence "public" here means not precisely notorious (though this is generally implied, especially since tacit profession is no longer admitted), but public in the proper sense, as we speak of public authority. A private vow, for instance, to make a pilgrimage, or not to marry, is one made without the intervention of the Church. The vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, taken in a religious congregation, are considered public.

2. Public vows may be either perpetual or temporary. They are perpetual if made without any time-limit and accepted as such by the legitimate superior. Note that the simple profession of members who pronounce their

[36] Normae, n. 7.
[37] Wernz, Ius Decretalium, III, n. 572 (ed. 1, p. 586).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vows in a religious order involves only temporary (triennial)[38] vows. Temporary vows are such as are made for a certain limited term, for instance, three years. They must be promptly renewed, for a congregation with expired temporary vows would not constitute members in the religious state.

3. In number two of our canon, an order is called an organization in which solemn vows are taken, whereas a congregation is defined as a religious body whose members make only simple vows. Here we have the famous and controverted distinction between simple and solemn vows. Whence is it derived?

The distinction between solemn and simple vows was known to Gratian[39] and the canonists that followed him. Difficulties arose at an early date with regard to the bearing of vows upon the validity of marriage. The question was settled by Boniface VIII, who declared that the solemnity of the vow was introduced by ecclesiastical law, and what is called an invalidating impediment is produced only by the reception of sacred orders or by profession in a religious congregation approved by the Apostolic See.[40] This seems to mean that the authority of the Church determines which vows are simple and which are solemn. However, the Church would act blindly, as it were, if there were no intrinsic distinction between the two. Hence canonists[41] have endeavored to establish the precise difference between solemn and simple vows, with due regard always to the decision of Boniface VIII. St.

38 Can. 574, § 1.

39 Cfr. dictum ad c. 8, Dist. 27: those who simply take vows and those whose vows are endowed with the blessing of consecration, or who make religious vows; from which it may be inferred that all religious vows were considered solemn; cfr. c. 20, X, III, 32.

40 C. un. 6°, III, 15.

41 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., s. v. "Vow" (Vol. XV, 512, by Vermeersch).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Thomas [42] places the solemnity of the vow in a certain spiritual blessing or consecration, in as far as this has special reference to the service of God. Hence we may say that the Angelic Doctor finds the difference between the two kinds of vows not in the ceremonies or the ritual as applied respectively in the administration of solemn and simple vows, but in the interior, more perfect and complete consecration to God, or, as a commentator [43] puts it, he does not speak of an accidental blessing or consecration, but of an internal consecration, which implies a more perfect and irretrievable surrender of oneself to God. If this is not a sufficient explanation, we doubt whether there is one. As regards the simple vows of the Jesuits, it required special papal constitutions [44] to render them productive of the truly religious state, to which, as the text says, their members belong because they devote themselves to the service of God,— but not irrevocably. Their's is a peculiar condition on account of the effects attached to their simple vows, and hence it must not be drawn into the question here at issue.

The general assumption of the Church up to the sixteenth and even nineteenth century was that a religious offers himself as a holocaust to God and thereby surrenders himself entirely to the Church, who has the power to declare whether, considering the circumstances,[45] it is opportune to accept and declare the surrender to be irrevocable to the whole extent or for all members and institutes alike. The intention of the Church is identical

42 Summa Theol., 2a 2ae, q. 88, a. 7.

43 Joh. a S. Thoma, Cursus Theol., in II-II, ed. Lugd., 1653, p. 438.

44 Greg. XIII, "Quanto," Feb. 1, 1583; "Ascendente," May 26, 1584.

45 Pius IX, "Neminem latet," March 19, 1857 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, 1885, p. 853 f.). The explanation given by Vermeersch (Cath. Encycl., l. c.) is less intelligible than that of St. Thomas, and we prefer the opinion of Wernz, l. c., III, n. 572.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with that of the person who takes the vows, which is extensively and intensively just what the Church declares it to be.

A monastic congregation is a union of several autonomous or independent monasteries under the same superior. Such congregations sprang up after the IVth Council of the Lateran (1215), for instance, the congregation of St. Vannes, that of the Cassinese, and again after the Council of Trent, which renewed the decretal of Innocent III and insisted upon the formation of congregations.[46] At present there are fourteen Benedictine Congregations, two of them in this country; and if both were amalgamated, it would hurt neither Church nor State, nor their own efficiency.

An exempt religious order is one withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary. Whilst all regulars who make solemn vows are ipso iure exempt, it needs a special Apostolic indult or privilege to exempt religious congregations, for instance, the Redemptorists, Passionists, etc.[47] A religious congregation is one whose members take simple vows only. They are either papal institutes or diocesan institutes, the difference between them lying in the manner of approbation or decree of praise. This distinction was canonized by the Constitution of Leo XIII, "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900.

A clerical religion is one the majority of whose members are priests. Note that "clerical" and "monastic" are no longer[48] adequate distinctions, as the Code plainly shows, for the clerical character may be possessed by monastic congregations as well. Historically speaking, 46 Sess. 25, c. 8, de reg.; c. 7, X, III, 35.

47 Both were declared exempt by Pius VI.

48 Formerly this distinction was employed by canonists.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

monastic congregations or orders belong to the contemplative orders, which were of a lay character. Since the tenth century [49] so-called barbati (bearded) or conversi, i. e., lay brothers, were introduced and flourished especially among the Vallombrosians. Besides, after the eleventh century, many monasteries allowed their members to serve as pastors or curates at their chapels and churches, which thus became incorporated with the monastic bodies. This led to an increased number of monks with clerical character, and thus most of the monastic orders became clerical orders.

The division into provinces is due to the Mendicant Orders. St. Francis in 1217 divided his order into twelve provinces. The term domus formata is new and difficult to translate. It means a "canonically established house." Though the term is new, the object which it designates dates back to the decrees of Urban VIII and Innocent X, who subjected houses with less than twelve (or at least six) members to the jurisdiction of the diocesan Ordinary, which regulation has partly entered into the new Code.[50]

The Abbot Primate is mentioned first among the higher superiors or superiores maiores. This dignity was created by Leo XIII ("Summum semper," July 12, 1893) to foster and maintain the "fraternal confederation" established in the same year [51] among the "black" Benedictines. The Abbot Primate is not to be compared to the General of the Franciscans or the Jesuits, as our Code itself states.[52] We might call him a diplomatic representative of the Benedictines with limited power, 49 The abbey of Einsiedeln in Switzerland had such barbati already under Abbot Gregory in the last decades of the Xth century.

50 Cfr. can. 617, § 2.

51 Studien O. S. B., 1893 (Vol. 14), p. 279 ff.; p. 454 ff.

52 Can. 501, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

accredited to the Holy See according to the Apostolic Brief of Leo XIII. His residence is at the College of St. Anselm [53] on the Aventine Hill, of which he is also abbot with ordinary jurisdiction. He is elected for a period of twelve years, but may be reëlected for twelve years more by the abbots presidents or by all the actual (not titular) abbots called to Rome. The election, in order to be valid, must be effected by a two-thirds' majority. This, in brief, is the history of a new creation which was wisely intended to produce a closer union among the Benedictines. Without a certain unity, now-a-days, in times of universal organization, any society appears to be doomed to failure.

CAN. 489

Regulae et particulares constitutiones singularum religionum, canonibus huius Codicis non contrariae, vim suam servant; quae vero eisdem opponuntur, abrogatae sunt.

CAN. 490

Quae de religiosis statuuntur, etsi masculino vocabulo expressa, valent etiam pari iure de mulieribus, nisi ex contextu sermonis vel ex rei natura aliud constet.

The rules and constitutions of all religious orders or institutes or congregations, provided they do not clash with any canon of this Code, remain in force; but any regulation or law or statute which is contraray to a canon of the Code, no longer binds either superiors or [53] Innocent XI by his Constitution "Inscrutabili" (1687) erected a Benedictine college at St. Callisto in Trastevere, which was temporarily suppressed by reason of the revolutionary tendencies of 1834 and the following years, but reopened in 1888 and transferred in 1896 to the Aventine.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

subjects. Thus elections must henceforth be held according to the Code,[54] and all special rules regarding the confession and communion of religious,[55] or the causae fidei belonging to the Holy Office,[56] or studies and ordinations [57] and profession are revoked.[58] As to privileges, see canon 613. The Code forbids what is contrary to the canons therein established. Hence whatever merely goes beyond the canons, or is a more explicit explanation thereof, may be lawfully retained. General and particular decrees are abrogated when they are opposed to the prescriptions of the Code. If no opposition exists, particular decrees given to an individual Congregation or Congregations, still continue to bind. On the other hand, in this same hypothesis general decrees, which are not explicitly or implicitly contained in the Code, have no longer any force. (See the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, 1918.)

Canon 490 lays down the general rule that whatever is enacted about religious, also binds religious women, even though the text may employ the masculine gender, except, of course, in matters not applicable to the female sex, or where the wording itself excludes them. A similar example is that of privileges, which, if granted to a male order, also apply to the nuns (second order), all other things being equal. It is evident that the regulations concerning studies or ordination or preaching or hearing confessions do not touch women. On the other hand, the expression "si quis," though expressed in the masculine, obliges women.

54 Can. 507.
55 Can. 519 ff.; can. 595, § 2.
56 Can. 501, § 2.
57 Can. 587, § 2; can. 964–967; can. 2410.
58 Can. 572.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PRECEDENCE

CAN. 491

§ 1. Religiosi praecedunt laicis; religiones clericales, laicalibus; canonici regulares, monachis; monachi, ceteris regularibus; regulares, Congregationibus religiosis; Congregationes iuris pontificii, Congregationibus iuris dioecesani; in eadem specie servetur praescriptum can. 106, n. 5.

§ 2. At clerus saecularis praecedit tum laicis tum religiosis extra eorum ecclesias atque etiam in eorum ecclesiis, si agatur de religione laicali; Capitulum vero cathedrale vel collegiale eisdem praecedit ubique locorum.

Religious precede laymen; clerical religious precede lay religious; canons regular precede monks; monks precede the rest of the regulars; regulars precede religious congregations; papal religious congregations precede diocesan congregations. Concerning precedence among religious of the same kind, the rule laid down in can. 106, n. 5 must be observed.

With regard to the precedence between the secular clergy and the regular clergy, the rule is that the secular clergy precede laymen as well as religious,[59] but the latter only in churches which do not belong to the religious, unless a church belongs to a lay religious community; in which latter case the secular clergy precede the religious even in their own church. A cathedral or collegiate chapter everywhere enjoys precedence over the religious.

Noticeable in this regulation is the fact that no distinction is made between monks and clerics regular, such as the Barnabites, Theatines, Jesuites, etc. Only the canons [59] The secular clergy, however, are supposed to wear surplice and biretta, if they claim precedence; S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 3, 1847 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 558).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

regular,[60] such as those of the Lateran and the Premonstratensians (Norbertines), precede the monks, e. g., Benedictines, Cistercians, Trappists (if these are priests), who in turn take precedence over all other regulars, if they are clerical orders. But among the other regulars — the Code makes no distinction between mendicants and non-mendicants — the rule laid down in can. 106, n. 5 must be observed.

This canon is taken from the Constitution of Gregory XIII, "Exposcit," of July 15, 1583. It establishes that among regulars those precede who can prove quasi-possession of precedence in the place or city where a controversy has arisen; and if no quasi-possession can be proved, those who have first established a monastery or house in the controverted place precede those who came later. These are the rules the bishop should follow in settling controversies concerning precedence. The Friars Preachers (Dominicans) had precedence over the other Mendicants according to a decision of Pius V,[61] but since the Code takes the decision of Gregory XIII as the general norm for all regulars except monks, it is safe to say that the Dominicans must now follow the general rule.

Concerning the three families of the Friars Minor: the brown Franciscans (Fratres Minores ab Unione Leonina), the black Franciscans or Conventuals, and the Capuchins, the rule of precedence has been established as follows:

That family precedes which has been in a city or town for a longer time than another of the same order (O.

60 Pius IV, Sept. 23, 1563, settled the controversy between the Black Benedictines and Canons Regular in favor of the latter. Barbosa, De Off. et Pot. Episc., P. III, alleg. 78, n. 29 (Vol. II, 322).

61 Barbosa, l. c., n. 30; Summa Apost. Dec., s. v., "Praecedentia," n. 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

F. M.), unless quasi-possession of precedence can be proved by the latter. However, since quasi-possession is often subject to controversies, the term of ten years, from Jan. 1, 1900, to Aug. 15, 1910, during which a family of Friars Minor has had actual possession of precedence before another family supplies proof of actual possession, unless there was no occasion to assert that precedence; in which latter case longer existence in city or town determines precedence. If a convent has been suppressed and ceased to exist in a city or town for fifty years, the date of return must be taken as the date from which existence is to be measured. If no convent of their own exists in a district outside the city or town, the general rule is that the Friars Minor of the Leonine Union (brown Franciscans) precede the Conventuals, and these in turn the Capuchins.[62]

We finally draw attention to the term chapter. A cathedral or collegiate chapter presenting itself in a body precedes all religious, even prelates and abbots, e. g., in processions or on other ecclesiastical occasions. The text says everywhere, hence in the churches of religious[63] as well as on their own premises. The vicar-general, although appearing alone and not as a canon, precedes all the regular clergy, nay even abbots and prelates regular, because he represents the bishop.[64]

62 Pius X, "Seraphici Patriarchae," Aug. 15, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 713 ff.).

63 But the abbot's choir stall must not be ceded to the first dignitary of the chapter, because that seat signifies, not only dignity, but jurisdiction.

64 Can. 370; can. 106.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE IX

ERECTION AND SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS, PROVINCES, AND HOUSES

CAN. 492

§ 1. Episcopi, non autem Vicarius Capitularis vel Vicarius Generalis, condere possunt Congregationes religiosas; sed eas ne condant neve condi sinant, inconsulta Sede Apostolica; quod si agatur de tertiariis in communi viventibus, requiritur praeterea ut a supremo Moderatore primi Ordinis suae religioni aggregentur.

§ 2. Congregatio iuris dioecesani, quamvis decursu temporis in plures dioeceses diffusa, usque tamen dum pontificiae approbationis aut laudis testimonio caruerit, remanet dioecesana, Ordinariorum iurisdictioni ad normam iuris plane subiecta.

§ 3. Nec nomen nec habitus religionis iam constitutae assumi potest ab iis qui ad illam legitime non pertinent aut a nova religione.

The text is silent about the foundation of new religious orders, and only mentions (can. 497) the establishment of religious exempt houses, supposing, perhaps, that there is no need of a new religious order, or that a congregation may arise which may later develop into an order. In § 1 the law permits bishops, and these only, to found new religious congregations. Vicars-capitular and vicars-general, even if endowed with a special mandate, have no authority to make such foundations. As the text says bishops, not Ordinaries, it seems logical to exclude also religious superiors, even though they enjoy quasi-episcopal jurisdiction. Abbots nullius or prelates nullius, on the other hand, would be allowed to found new congregations, because they have the same power as residential bishops.[1]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

There is, however, a twofold condition attached to the leave of founding such communities:

1. The bishops must consult the Holy See and may not permit a foundation to be made without taking advice with the S. C. of Religious.

2. A congregation of tertiaries who live in common must be affiliated by the superior general of the first order to his own religion.

The first condition calls for special emphasis, since the Holy See has more than once insisted on it. Thus Leo XIII, by his Constitution "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900, and Pius X by his Motu proprio, "Dei providentis," July 16, 1906, have regulated the foundation and juridical character of religious congregations. The substance of their precepts is as follows:

a) Before applying to Rome, in fact before admitting any religious sodality into his diocese, the Bishop must examine its constitutions as to their orthodoxy and moral character, and satisfy himself that they conform to the sacred canons, the decrees of the Roman Pontiffs, and the scope intended. This examination must also extend to the founders,— whether or not they are inspired by prudent zeal for the glory of God and for their own spiritual welfare and that of others. Sometimes it happens that personal spite and rancor, or the itch for honors, or a desire to wear a different habit causes separation. Probate spiritus.

[1] Can. 323, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) If possible, rather than permit the foundation of a new congregation, the bishop should call in members of a congregation already approved, if its purpose is the same.

(c) The purpose or aim of the new congregation must be well defined and not too diversified, which would be the case if the congregation should propose to devote itself to all kinds of charitable works.[2]

The "Conditae" as well as the "Normae" give some examples of occupations which are less suitable to Sisters.

(α) Sisterhoods who make it their special purpose to nurse the sick in their homes by day and by night are not entirely forbidden, but liable to be rejected by Rome, unless very solid reasons are given and certain precautions provided. The same is true concerning sisterhoods who take daily care, as quasi-domestic servants, of the families of poor laborers.

(β) Sisterhoods who conduct hospitals open to both sexes indiscriminately, or houses destined exclusively for infirm priests, must also provide conditions and means apt to prevent danger and avert scandal. The Roman Congregation is even stricter with sisterhoods who have for their (secondary) purpose the management of clerical seminaries or colleges of male students, or schools wherein co-education is practiced.[3]

(γ) Much less, say the Normae, should sisterhoods be approved whose scope is to take direct care of babies or of maternity homes (confinement cases) or similar occupations not befitting "virgins consecrated to God." The Constitution "Conditae" does not mention such congre-

2 "Conditae," I, 3; an exception is made in favor of missionary countries; cfr. Normae, n. 8.

3 "Conditae," I, 3; Normae, n. 13 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gations, and the Normae say "direct care." Hence, if hospital sisters keep a special department for such purposes and leave the immediate care of babies and women, especially assisting at operations or delivery, to physicians and trained nurses, the law would not be against them.[4] Circumstances of time and persons, especially in industrial centers, would seem to require a moderation of the former strictness.

Concerning "mixed schools," many parish schools would have to be closed in our country if the Normae would be put into effect. Here, too, circumstances must be considered. Finally, it must be added that, not only in America, but the world over it is charitable works of every kind that enkindle the flame of faith, attract non-Catholics, and confound bigots.

(d) Before approving any new congregation the bishops must also inquire into the material and financial support of these communities. The "Conditae" as well as the Normae justly insist upon the old law[5] that no approbation should be given to institutes which lack the resources necessary for a decent livelihood. Congregations which live on alms or go begging from door to door are scarcely to be approved,[6]—a point which will be more accurately determined later.

These, then, are a few points which the bishops should ponder before giving their approbation to any institute, or applying to Rome for that of the Holy See. The other condition touches tertiaries, i. e., congregations which purpose to follow the rule of an ancient order, but with modified constitutions and simple vows. Note that

4 Bastien-Lanslots, l. c., p. 46.

5 Cfr. c. 1, X, III, 1; c. 1, X, III, 7; c. un., 6°, III, 16; Trid., sess. 25, c. 3 de reg.

6 "Conditae," I, 3; "Singulari quidem," March 27, 1896; cfr. can. 621–624.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in new congregations no distinction between rules and constitutions is admitted, but all are comprised by the name Constitutions.[7] Yet, if Franciscan Tertiaries frame their Constitutions, they must be, at least substantially, based on the Rule of St. Francis, and we believe that this Rule, together with the Constitutions, may be called the Code of their common life. Of course, approbation is given only to the Constitutions, which remain the chief, and, in fact, the only obligatory norm for such Tertiaries. These must then be affiliated, as the Code says, or aggregated by the superior general to the first order, whose name and habit they assume. Hence of the three Franciscan families the three respective superiors general are competent to affiliate Tertiaries. Thus also the Dominican, the Augustinian, the Carmelite and the Servite Generals. But what of the Benedictine Sisters? There is a difficulty here, arising from the peculiar position of the Benedictine Order. The Abbot Primate has not the same power as one of the Generals of the Orders above named. Besides, history records that monasteries of nuns were affiliated to single monasteries, not to Congregations, except perhaps that of Cluny. The case was different with the Cistercians, because of the jurisdiction of the Abbot of Citeaux. Until an authentic solution of the difficulty is given, we are at a loss to state who is empowered to affiliate the Benedictine Tertiaries. Since Benedictine Oblates are incorporated in the individual abbeys, we believe that the neighboring abbot should see to it that the Tertiaries are incorporated. There is no difficulty in incorporating them because the aim of affiliation, even with the Tertiaries of centralized orders, is only to make them capable of partaking of the indulgences and spiritual favors granted to the first 7 S. C. EE. et RR., March 2, 1861 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 791).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

order.[8] There is, then, no question of juridical incorporation, as if the jurisdiction of the Diocesan Ordinary would thereby be curtailed. For, unless a special Apostolic indult grants them exemption, all Tertiaries are under episcopal jurisdiction.[9]

Therefore § 2 rules that any diocesan congregation, although spread over several dioceses, remains a diocesan institute subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries according to canon law, until it has received pontifical approbation or the decree of recognition. The episcopal approval, which is absolutely required in order to make the institute lawful and ecclesiastical, has another effect, viz., to subject the members to the jurisdiction of the Ordinary or Ordinaries[10] with regard to the internal and external administration, the election of superiors, though these be chosen by the members, canonical visitation, spiritual direction and discipline.[11] In fact such an institute is no more than a parish consisting of members who partake of the religious state and are considered by canon law as ecclesiastical persons endowed with clerical privileges. But they are not to be called corporations, in the ecclesiastical sense, as they lack autonomy or independence. Of course, civil law may give them corporative character and class them among privileged societies.

The text says, furthermore, that if these diocesan institutions are spread over more than one diocese, the respective Ordinaries enjoy equal jurisdiction over them. Hence no Ordinary may claim jurisdiction or direction over houses in another diocese, because this would be tantamount to reaching into the sphere of another bishop;

8 "Normae," n. 16.

9 Some exemption was given to the Sisters of the Holy Cross at Ingenbohl in Switzerland.

10 Cfr. can. 495.

11 "Conditae," I, 9–11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nor is the bishop of the diocese in which the mother-house is situated, to be considered the quasi-spiritual director of the houses located in other dioceses.[12]

The last paragraph of our canon ordains that the name and habit of a religious order already established may not be assumed by persons who do not lawfully belong to said order, or by any religious order to be newly founded. A distinctive religious habit was certainly worn by the earliest religious, as historical documents prove. For the terms velamen and velare (veil, to veil) occur as early as the third century and were used for the act of consecrating virgins.[13] That the veil was given in church may be surmised from the fourth Council of Toledo (633). The tenth council of the same city (656) mentions, besides the dress given by the bishop or clergyman, also a red or black cloth (pallium) worn on the head as a mark of distinction.[14] The religious habit was given by St. Francis to St. Clare. As to monks, it is known that St. Benedict in his rule speaks of the religious habit.[15] But even before that time a distinct religious habit was worn by Pammachius.[16] The synod of Gangrae (334) complains of the Eustathians (an Arian sect), for despising the common dress and wearing instead the periboleion, or mantle of the monks, in order to deceive the unwary.[17] Thus the religious habit appears of venerable antiquity. In the eighth and ninth centuries abuses crept into the monastic bodies,— a fact deplored and rebuked by St. Odo of Cluny.[18] St. Bede[19]

12 S. C. EE. et RR., March 23, 1860 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 778, and passim).

13 Cfr. Migne, 13, 1183; Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 47.

14 Mansi, Coll. Conc., X, 625 (can. 56); XI, 31 (can. 4).

15 Reg., c. 58.

16 Cfr. above, p. 4 sq.

17 Can. 12; c. 15, Dist. 30.

18 Vita Odonis, III, 1; Collatio, II (Migne, 133, 75; 213).

19 Hist. Eccl., IV, 25 (Migne, 95, 215 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google complains of fancy habits worn by English nuns. It seems that fashion played its part also in the later Middle Ages, for a well-known decretal of Clement V at the Council of Vienne determines the color (black, brown, and white) as well as the kind and measure of the religious habit, and admonishes the religious to be modest in their dress and to avoid costly vestments. A hood (caputium) and scapular are also mentioned, over which, the decretal says, the religious may wear an almutium or large cap of black cloth or fur. Monks as well as abbots and priors are allowed a cowl. Boots and shoes are also permitted.[20] A hat is not mentioned in the decretal, but we know that Benedict of Aniane (821) and later the Clunians allowed the monks to wear hats of felt or wool. The Clunians also insisted upon neatness and cleanliness.

The text then says that neither individuals nor new congregations may assume the habit of an established religious order to which they have no juridical relation. To permit this would be like letting a ship sail under a flag not its own, and would bring confusion into the Church. This danger is quite real.[21]

Here may also be inserted a few wise rules stated in the Normae.[22] Material, form, cut, and color of the habit should be in harmony with religious modesty and poverty. Gold or silver ornaments, except a cross or medal of silver, are not allowed, and the image on these crosses or medals, as well as their inscriptions, must be approved or at least tolerated by the Church. Silk dresses or other showy apparel which would cause talk 20 C. 1, § 1, Clem. III, 10 de statu monachorum.

21 When in Rome the author tried to count the different habits, but soon gave up the attempt as superhuman.

22 Nn. 66–70.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and ridicule must be entirely avoided. A distinction between the habit worn by the superior and the teaching or choir sisters, and between that of the latter and the habit worn by the lay sisters may be admitted, but the difference should not be so great that the habits make them appear as members of different congregations. This would be the case if the color were entirely different. A distinctive sign may be used in the habit of the professed sisters and that of the novices. The Constitutions which are sent to Rome should contain an accurate description of the habit. After the religious congregation has been approved or recognized, the habit may not be changed without the express permission of the S. C. Relig.

As to the name or title of new religious congregations, the "Normae" contain, besides the prohibition mentioned in the Code, some hints which may also find a place here. The title of an institute may be taken either from the attributes of God, or from the mysteries of our Holy Religion, or from the feasts of our Lord or His Blessed Mother or the Saints, or from the particular scope of the institute itself. For instance, Sisters of Divine Providence, Sisters of the Incarnation, Ladies of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of St. Joseph, School Sisters, etc. If the title or name of an existing congregation is taken, a characteristic addition must be made, for instance, Sisters of St. Francis of the Poor, or of St. Vincent de Paul of the Servants of the Poor. All titles should be simple, free from levity or sensationalism, and eschew reference to devotions not approved by the Holy See.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS INSTITUTES

CAN. 493

Quaelibet religio etiam iuris dioecesani tantum, semel legitime condita, etiamsi unica domo constet, supprimi nequit nisi a Sancta Sede, cui etiam reservatur de bonis in casu statuere, semper tamen salva offerentium voluntate.

The first of the next three canons — all of which treat of the same subject, wherefore we connect canon 498 with the rest — has reference to the suppression of a religious congregation, or rather of a religio in general. Such a religio, lawfully established, though it may be only a diocesan institute and consist of but one house, may be suppressed by the Holy See alone. To the latter is also reserved the right of disposing of the property belonging to the suppressed religio, with due respect to the will of the donors.

The Code is undoubtedly somewhat stricter here than Leo XIII's "Conditae," which permitted the bishops to suppress diocesan institutes. It is not difficult to see the reason for this stricter legislation. Joseph II, carrying out the teaching of Febronius, endeavored to "purify" the religious state, and his example has misled many others, so that Pius IX had to condemn the error that the civil government may suppress religious families at will,[23] and Leo XIII was compelled to raise his voice against the encroachments of France and Portugal. "The Church sighs, for besides being wounded in her vital rights, she also feels the drawback in her activity, which is developed by the concordant work of the secular and regular clergy; who touches these, touches the apple 23 "Probe memineritis," Jan. 22, 1855; "Cum saepe," July 26, 1855; Syllabus, n. 53.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of her eye." [24] These reasons no doubt prompted Benedict XV to make the suppression of religious dependent on the Holy See, which ever protected and fostered them. If the Apostolic See suppresses a religious institute, it generally provides that the members who are in sacred orders be subject to the Ordinary, or permits them, if they so prefer, to choose another order or religio. But those who have no sacred orders, like the lay brothers, appear to be free from the obligations of the simple vows.[25] As to the property of suppressed religious it is church and corporative property, and hence subject to the Holy See as the supreme administrator of all church property. However, if the donors are still alive, their wishes must be respected. The same is true if the donors are dead but have left special clauses in the legacy regarding the disposal of the property in such a case. The Holy See will also take care that the members of the suppressed religio shall receive back their dowries, or an equivalent thereof. But they can lay no claim to an equal share, as if they had been members of a stock company. Neither may the Ordinary of the diocese demand a share, for the disposal of the whole rests with the Holy See.

On the suppression of a religious house the Code rules as follows:

CAN. 498

Domus religiosa sive formata sive non formata, si ad religionem exemptam pertineat, supprimi nequit sine beneplacito apostolico; si ad Congregationem iuris pontificii non exemptam, supprimi potest a su-

24 Le Religiose Famiglie, June 29, 1901 (Analecta Eccl., 1901, IX), p. 281 f. (French text, ibid., p. 283).

25 We believe that this is the intention of the Holy See, who will mention that in the decree of suppression.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

premo Moderatore, consentiente Ordinario loci; si ad Congregationem iuris dioecesani, sola Ordinarii loci auctoritate, audito Congregationis Moderatore, salvo praescripto can. 493, si de unica domo agatur, salvoque iure recursus in suspensivo ad Sedem Apostolicam.

This canon makes a distinction between a religio and a religious house. A religious house, be it one with at least six religious members (formata) or one with less than that number (non formata), if it belongs to an exempt religio, may not be suppressed without a papal indult.

This is the logical consequence of can. 497, § 1, which requires a papal indultt for the foundation.

If the house belongs to a non-exempt papal institute, it may be suppressed by the superior general of that congregation with the consent of the Ordinary. The latter has jurisdiction over both house and congregation, and is therefore interested in its suppression.

If a house belongs to a diocesan institute, and is not the only one of the congregation, the Ordinary himself may suppress it, after having heard the opinion of the superior of the congregation. Against this decision recourse may be had to the Apostolic See, but not in suspensivo, although Rome may reverse the decision of the Ordinary. The Holy See may suppress any house, even of exempt religious, without any reason, although we do not know of a case in which Rome proceeded arbitrarily. But the general rule holds good, because the Pope is the sovereign judge of his own actions in matters subject to him, and may suppress whole orders, as happened in the case of the Beguins and the Knights Templars.[26]

[26] Cfr. c. un., 6°, III, 17; c. 1, Clem., III, 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Superior General needs the express consent (written or oral) of the Ordinary of the diocese, because, as was said, the latter is directly interested in the suppression, not only on account of his jurisdiction, but also by reason of the diminished service of God and the sacred ministry.

The Ordinary may suppress a house of a diocesan congregation, unless it be the sole house of that institute. In the latter case the matter belongs exclusively to the Holy See. The Ordinary in suppressing a house is not bound to the consent [27] of the Superior General of the congregation, but may proceed freely. Neither is the Ordinary of one diocese dependent on the consent of another in whose diocese the mother house is situated, for all Ordinaries have equal rights over diocesan congregations. However, an Ordinary should not suppress a religious congregation except for weighty reasons, suppression being an extreme measure. Such reasons would be, for instance, serious relaxation of religious discipline, abandonment or change of the purpose of the institute, financial troubles which could not otherwise be remedied, refusal to obey the common law as well as the injunctions of the Ordinary, etc.

It may be asked: What about the inmates of suppressed houses? The decisions of the Roman Court on this point may be summed up as follows:

(a) Solemnly professed members must, unless the papal Constitution of suppression has dispensed them, continue to observe their vows as well as they are able; if they can obtain admission into other houses of the same or some other religio, they are obliged to do so, if no dispensation from the vows has been granted either in 27 "Audito consilio" means advice, not consent; cfr. can. 105, 1; "Conditae," I, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google general or in particular to those who asked for it.

(b) Members with solemn vows, who are in sacred orders and wish to remain in the diocese, may with the permission of the Ordinary take up their residence there and obtain incardination within six months from the date of suppression. They are subject to the Ordinary in virtue of obedience, and must, besides, observe their solemn vows, as far as their condition allows. This permission to stay in the diocese outside of a religious community is, of course, granted only by special indult, especially if the members of the suppressed institute cannot be gathered into other houses or if they do not wish to leave their native country.[28]

(c) Members of religious congregations with simple vows, we believe, are free from any obligation if the suppression was decreed by Rome. But if the suppression of one house was decreed either by the superior general with the consent of the Ordinary, or by the Ordinary of the diocese, where there is question of a diocesan institute, the members remain bound by their vows, especially that of chastity, from which they can be dispensed only by the S. C. of Rel., and therefore should seek other houses of the same institute, which must receive them.

If religious in sacred orders, i. e., priests, after the suppression of their institute, remain in the diocese, the Ordinary may compel them to help in the sacred ministry, especially the care of souls.[29]

As to the vow of poverty, this remains in case of religious with solemn vows, and therefore their property

28 Pius VI, Brief of April 13, 1782; S. Poenit., Instructio of June 28, 1866; Declaratio of April 18, 1867 and Sept. 12, 1872; S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 15, 1861; S. C. super Statu Regul., Aug. 5, 1872; cfr. Piatus M., l. c., I, 210 f.; Nervegna, De Iure Practico Regul., 1900, p. 163; Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 163.

29 S. C. EE. et RR., July 30, 1881.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and whatever they may acquire after suppression, belongs to the order or congregation, unless the members have been secularized, or have obtained a dispensation from the Holy See to use their belongings for other purposes.[30] The vow of obedience also continues to bind the solemnly professed members of a suppressed institute, so far as their actual state permits them to observe it; but it may be transferred from the local to the immediate superior, provincial or general, to whose jurisdiction they are subject.[31] Therefore they also remain under the obligation of reciting the Breviary according to their own calendar and must follow the rite of their order if they say Mass in their own churches; elsewhere, of course, they have to follow the general rubrics.[32]

CHANGE OF PAPAL INSTITUTES

CAN. 494

§ 1. Religionem pontificii iuris in provincias dividere, constitutas iam provincias coniungere vel aliter circumscribere, novas condere conditasve supprimere, monasteria sui iuris a monastica Congregatione separare et alii unire, ad unam pertinet Sedem Apostolicam.

§ 2. Exstincta provincia, de eius bonis statuere, salvis iustitiae legibus et fundatorum voluntate, spectat, nisi constitutiones aliud caveant, ad Capitulum generale vel, extra tempus Capituli, ad Moderatorem generalem cum suo Consilio.

By change of a religious institute is meant any alteration of the original or former condition of an order or 30 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 20, 1839; March 6, 1840; Piatus M., l. c., I, 212.

31 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 5, 1872.

32 S. Poenit., April 18, 1867; Nervegna, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

congregation. Our canon treats of such as have received the papal approbation or a decree of recognition. § 1 reserves to the Apostolic See the right of dividing such a religio into provinces, of amalgamating provinces, of changing their boundaries, of founding new provinces, of suppressing existing ones, and of severing one monastic congregation from, or uniting it to, another. Canonists, applying the Decretal [33] which prohibited the transfer and division of episcopal sees to Apostolic legates, deemed a papal indult necessary to effect a change in the existing order of a religious institute. Now this opinion is made law, and therefore any change of the kind set forth in the text is taken out of the hands of the general chapter and reserved to the Holy See.

However, § 2 allows the general chapter (unless the Constitutions should forbid the exercise of such power) to settle the property affairs of an extinguished province, with due regard to the rules of equity and the laws of foundation. If no general chapter is in session at the time of the change and settlement, the superior general with his council may take the necessary steps. Equity requires that the remaining property should be employed for purposes similar to that for which the province was founded, that the buildings should not be entirely alienate from their original object, and that the people should be recompensed for the loss they suffer by the departure of the religious. Equity also would seem to require that, if there remains a congregation or province of the same order or congregation in the country, this latter should first be benefited. This would no doubt coincide largely with the will of the founders. But, as has been said, the general chapter, or the superior general with his counsellors, is competent to decide that point. We believe the superior is dependent on the consent of his consultors, unless the Constitutions provide otherwise.

[33] C. 4, X, I, 30, de officio legati; but the enactment of our canon is certainly new.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SPREAD OF DIOCESAN INSTITUTES

CAN. 495

§ 1. Congregatio religiosa iuris dioecesani in alia dioecesi domos constituere non potest, nisi consentiente utroque Ordinario, tum loci ubi est domus princeps, tum loci quo velit commigrare; Ordinarius autem loci unde excedit, consensum sine gravi causa ne deneget.

§ 2. Si ad dioeceses alias eam propagari accidat, nihil de ipsius legibus mutari liceat, nisi de consensu singulorum Ordinariorum quorum in dioecesibus aedes habeat, salvis iis quae, ad normam can. 492, § 1, Sedi Apostolicae fuere subiecta.

In order lawfully to found a house of a diocesan congregation the consent of both Ordinaries, viz., that of the bishop in whose diocese the mother house is located, and that of the bishop in whose diocese the new house is to be founded, is required. However, the Ordinary of the diocese whence the foundation is made should not refuse his consent without a solid reason. Such a reason would be, e. g., if in his prudent judgment either the members of the mother house were not sufficiently numerous to do justice to the work they wish to undertake in his diocese, e. g., in schools or hospitals, or if the financial condition would not allow a division.

If new foundations are actually made in several dioceses, the respective Ordinaries in whose dioceses the houses are located are not allowed to change the consti-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tutions of the congregation except by unanimous consent, and if the change involved is substantial, the Holy See must be consulted, for such a change is tantamount to founding a new congregation,— which right, according to can. 492, § 1, is reserved exclusively to the Holy See. This, at least, is our interpretation, and we believe, it is the only correct one. For it seems unnecessary to consult the Holy See, to which reference is made in § 2 of can. 495, regarding the foundation of a new house which is merely a branch of a diocesan congregation about whose foundation the Apostolic See has already been consulted, can. 492, § 2 mentioning congregations, not houses. Besides, there would be no distinction between congregations and houses if the foundation of both required papal consent, and this can. 495 would be entirely superfluous. However, if, as stated, substantial changes, especially such as affect the scope or government of an institute, are contemplated by the Ordinaries in whose respective dioceses houses of a diocesan congregation are to be erected, the Holy See must be consulted.

SUPPORT OF RELIGIOUS HOUSES

CAN. 496

Nulla religiosa domus erigatur, nisi iudicari prudenter possit vel ex reditibus propriis vel ex consuetis eleemosynis vel alio modo congruae sodalium habitationi et sustentationi provisum iri.

An early synod of Arles (813) enacted that no monastery or canonry should receive more members than could be decently supported from its revenues.[34] This law was renewed by the Decretals of Gregory IX, ex-

[34] Can. 8 (c. 1, X, III, 7).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tended to nuns by Bonitace VIII,[35] and adopted by the Council of Trent,[36] which ruled that no more religious should be admitted than could easily be maintained either from the revenues of property owned by the monastery or from the usual alms. This ruling was constantly upheld by the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars,[37] which always insisted that especially dowries should be invested in secure, stable, and remunerative goods, landed property, or securities.

Our canon provides that no religious house shall henceforth be founded unless there are good prospects and a sufficient guarantee that its members shall be decently lodged and supported either from some steady source of income, or from the usual alms, or from some other source. No exception is made and no distinction between exempt and non-exempt congregations, between mendicant and non-mendicant orders, between congregations of either sex. The canon simply says: "nulla religiosa domus."

To the two traditional modes of income (revenues and alms) the Code adds a third by saying: vel alio modo. The income or revenues proper to a house are such as it owns in its own name (reditus proprii), and are stable and regular, whereas alms cannot be said to be property, especially since almsgiving is not prescribed by the virtue of justice.

Under the name revenues are comprised all kinds of regular income, such as movable and immovable property which renders fruits; shares and title deeds; civil or ecclesiastical pensions, capital as well as interest; legacies for perpetual masses; income from parochial and missionary work; dowries of nuns; tuition fees from 35 C. un., § 1, 6°, III, 16.

36 Sess. 25, c. 3, de reg.
37 Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 637, p. 644 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

boarding and day scholars; royalties on books, patents, and copyrights. Manual stipends are not considered revenues, but alms, because they are neither regular nor dependable. Neither are the daily distributions among canons of a chapter regarded as revenues or reditus.[38]

What is the other source mentioned in the Code? Perhaps donations of a somewhat irregular and uncertain character, but still due for work done or by reason of a promise. Hospitals generally depend on such resources unless they are amply endowed; also orphanages, although these are more often maintained by alms, and sometimes by begging, if not beggary (chain letters, etc.), concerning which, as will be seen, the Code has laid down special rules. As to the mendicant religious who are acknowledged as such by the Church, their respective Constitutions will tell how far they are capable of possessing property, and to what extent they have to depend on alms.[39]

The Code further says that there should be good prospects and a reasonable guarantee that the religious will be decently supported. This judgment or verdict ("prudenter iudicari possit") must be given by the bishop in whose diocese the new house is to be founded. Hence he must investigate the material condition and prospects of the institute, and in order to obtain this information, study the character and scope of the institute. If the Congregation devotes itself to charitable works (schools, hospitals, etc.), or to the sacred ministry, its revenues may be regarded as assured. But if the members lead a contemplative life, to the exclusion of teaching and works of charity, its existence, especially in our

38 Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Appell. "reditus."

39 Concerning the Friars Minor, see c. 3, 6°, V, 12; c. 1, Clem. V, 11; Richter, Trid., p. 395 ff.; Reiffenstuel, III, 26, nn. 403, 435 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google country, is apt to be precarious, unless substantial donations are secured, or a sufficient fund is established, or sufficient dowries are demanded to guarantee support.

The bishop has also to consider the religious houses already existing in the city or town where a new house is to be erected. Concerning this point several constitutions have emanated from the Holy See which are still of practical value. The first point to be considered is whether the religious houses already existing are likely to be injured by the establishment of a new one. This is more likely in the case of such as live on alms, yet even in school and parish work and in charitable pursuits competition and rivalry may easily cripple an older institution. Therefore Clement VIII obliged Ordinaries to consult with the superiors of existing convents before giving permission for a new foundation.[40] Gregory XV commanded that the superiors and all others interested within a radius of 4000 paces of the new foundation should be consulted.[41] No exception was made in favor of any order, for while it is true that the houses of Mendicants are chiefly named in said Constitution, others are also mentioned. Neither are houses of female congregations exempt from these laws, especially now, after the Code is promulgated, as it simply says, "no religious house." The reasons are the same for both male and female institutes, as far as external works are concerned. Too many institutes within a limited space are, even now-a-days, not only a detriment to the material support one of the other, but a menace to the existence of religious institutes in general.

The Code lastly says that the law concerning sufficient 40 "Quoniam," July 23, 1603; Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Conventus," art. I.

41 "Cum alias," Aug. 17, 1622 (Ferraris, l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

provision has reference to both habitation or dwelling place and support. Hence the bishop, who is the first judge in the matter, must satisfy himself as to decent lodging. A decent lodging is one with which a man of modest aspirations, let us say of the middle class, would be content. The same may be said of material support. For not luxuries and dainties are to be sought in religious houses, but a moderate living, gauged by the amount and kind of work performed by the inmates, and the ordinary comforts to which a self-respecting human being is entitled. From this we may infer that if the new house to be established could live decently where older houses were suffering restrictions as to comfort, etc., this fact would be no reason for denying consent to the foundation. However, this consideration touches only the material aspect of the situation: peace and merit are factors that must also be reckoned with.

PERMISSION FOR FOUNDING A NEW RELIGIOUS HOUSE

CAN. 497

§ 1. Ad erigendam domum religiosam exemptam, sive formatam sive non formatam, aut monasterium monialium, aut in locis Sacrae Congregationi de Prop. Fide subiectis quamlibet religiosam domum, requiritur beneplacitum Sedis Apostolicae et Ordinarii loci consensus scriptis datus; secus, satis est Ordinarii venia.

§ 2. Constituendae novae domus permissio facultatem secumfert pro religionibus clericalibus habendi ecclesiam vel publicum oratorium domui adnexum, salvo praescripto can. 1162, § 4, et sacra ministeria peragendi, servatis de iure servandis: pro omnibus religionibus, pia opera exercendi religionis propria, salvis conditionibus in ipsa permissione appositis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Ut aedificentur et aperiantur schola, hospitium vel similis rationis aedes separata a domo etiam exempta, necessaria est et sufficit specialis Ordinarii scripta licentia.

§ 4. Ut constituta domus in alios usus convertatur, eaedem sollemnitates requiruntur de quibus in § 1, nisi agatur de conversione quae, salvis fundationis legibus, ad internum regimen et disciplinam religiosam dumtaxat referatur.

So far mention was made of the material requirements of a new foundation. Canon 497 further establishes the necessity of a legal formality, which consists in the consent of the proper authority.

1. To establish an exempt religious house, no matter whether it be formata (with at least six members) or non-formata, or whether it belong to regulars or nuns with solemn vows, a papal indult and the written consent of the diocesan Ordinary are required. The same requirements are demanded for the foundation of any house (whether exempt or not) in the territories subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide. For the foundation of a religious house which does not belong to exempt religious or nuns with solemn vows and which is not subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide, the permission of the Ordinary is sufficient. This decision definitively settles a controversy which existed among canonists [42] up to at least the publication of the Constitution, "Romanos Pontifices" of Leo XIII, May 8, 1881. Though the decretals [43] mention the Apostolic indult, it appeared to exclude or to supply the Ordinary's license. The Council of Trent [44] required only the Ordinary's consent. The decretals 42 Cfr. Bouix, De Iure Regul., 1857, I, 247 ff.; also Bizzarri, l. c., p. 78.

43 C. un., 6°, III, 17; c. un., 6°, III, 6.

44 Sess. 25, c. 3, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

were directly intended only for the Mendicants, and, as Bizzarri admits, there existed a controversy founded on no less an authority than Fagnani,[45] as to whether later papal constitutions were intended for the countries "beyond the Alps" (ultra montes). Benedict XIV was of the "opinion" that in as well outside of Italy both an Apostolic indult and the permission of the Ordinary were required. The controversy was settled for England by the above quoted constitution of Leo XIII, which was extended to our country in 1885, and has now entered the Code and consequently become binding everywhere. Hence a religious house in which members of an exempt order, or nuns with solemn vows, are to live habitually in common (be it called a monastery, or a convent, or an independent priory) if it conforms to the notion of a religious house, may no longer be founded without a papal indult and the written permission of the Ordinary. The same statement holds good concerning any religious house, whether exempt or not, to be founded in missionary territories subject to the Propaganda, which in 1901 demanded that all religious houses founded without such an indult should petition for a rectification of their status.[46]

Religious congregations, either of papal or of purely episcopal approbation, which are not subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide, need only the permission, written or oral, of the Ordinary in whose diocese they wish to found a new house. The reason for this difference undoubtedly lies in the exemption, which can be imparted only by the Holy See, and for houses subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide the reason must be sought, as a decree[47] of the same 45 Comment., l. III, tit. 7, cap. "Non amplius," n. 55 ff.; Reiffenstuel, III, 48, n. 38 f.

46 The S. C. Prop. Fide, Dec. 7, 1901 (Analecta Eccl., X, 1902, p. 21) complained that Leo XIII's Constitution was not observed everywhere.

47 Dec. 7, 1901.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google congregation insinuates, in the desire for an orderly and uniform regime.

§ 2 of canon 497 determines the effect and consequence of the legitimate permission, which carries with it (a) for all clerical religious the right to have a church or public oratory attached to their house and to exercise the sacred ministry, (b) for all religious the right to perform the pious works proper to them under the conditions laid down in the act of permission.

As to (a) the Code appends one special condition, viz., that of obtaining another permission, viz., from the Ordinary for building a church or public oratory.[48] It would follow that they need two permissions from the Ordinary: one for building a house, and another for building a church. This may at first sight seem to savor somewhat of bureaucracy or "red tape." It would be difficult to imagine a Benedictine community without a public oratory, and hence the permission for building a religious house of that order was always considered as including that of having a public oratory. However, the legislator probably felt that the parish organization might suffer from the multiplication of religious houses. Benedict XIV plainly hints at this obstacle, especially in cities,[49] but the chief obstacle he finds in the fact that the people are attracted by the celebrations held in the churches of religious orders and consequently often neglect to hear the word of God. Perhaps the great Pontiff had the Eternal City and Bologna in view. He also wished the hour of services in parish churches and the churches of religious to be so regulated that one should not interfere with the other. The Code therefore most reasonably prescribes that the special permission of the 48 Cf. can. 1162, § 4.

49 "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 15; Id., Inst., 44; 105.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinary be asked for the erection of churches by religious, thus enabling the bishop to regulate parish work so that it may not suffer from the building of churches and public oratories. The matter of financial support as well as the right of the parish priest to see his flock in his own church may have been another reason for demanding a special permission of the Ordinary.

The Code adds: servatis de iure servandis, which signifies, with due regard to that which is to be observed according to law. Hence religious are allowed to exercise the sacred ministry only in so far as it does not clash with the rights of others engaged in the same ministry. And here first of all the pastor's rights, as laid down in the Code,[50] are to be duly considered and respected. Note that the Code does not enumerate among the strict parochial rights the blessing of ashes on Ash Wednesday, and that of palms and candles,[51] nor has the parish priest any right to protest against or forbid religious saying low masses on feast-days before or at the same time he says his Mass.[52] The Code then establishes the right of all religious to pursue and exercise the pious works which they have assumed as their proper task. Therefore, if the Ordinary, when giving his permission, makes no restrictions (which he is at liberty to do) the religious may freely fulfill their obligations and pursue the end for which they were founded.

§ 3 contains a slight modification of Leo XIII's "Romanos Pontifices." It declares that a special written permission of the Ordinary is required and suffices for building or opening a school or a hospice or similar building separate from a religious house, although the 50 Can. 462 f.

51 S. Rit. C., April 8, 1702 (Decreta Authentica, n. 2098).

52 S. Rit. C., April 21, 1635; March 23, 1641 (ibid., nn. 620, 745), quoted also by Cardinal Gasparri.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

latter may belong to exempt religious. Leo's above mentioned Constitution had commanded all religious to obtain the express permission of the Ordinary and of the Apostolic See for founding or opening a new college or school, but made a distinction between elementary or parish schools and colleges, which latter it exempted from the Ordinary's jurisdiction. Nevertheless in the next paragraph the same Constitution demanded the permission of both the Holy See and the Ordinary. The Code is satisfied with enjoining the latter's written special consent. Special consent here signifies one that is not included in the permission for building a religious house, but is directed explicitly to the school or hospice or similar building to be erected separately from the religious house. Separated seems to imply that the buildings mentioned must be distinct from the religious house, so that they are not under one roof with the latter, but form a distinct and independent entity, for instance, for fire insurance or taxation. How far they must be separated the Code does not explicitly state. They may be called separated or distinct even if connected by a covered hallway or corridor. But if a school were erected inside the monastery or convent walls there would be no separation, but simply a religious house, part of which is destined for a separate purpose. In this latter case the special permission of the Ordinary would not be needed.

What school means is quite evident and shall be further explained in Book III, Title 22, De Scholis. Here it may be noted that the Code does not distinguish between elementary schools, high schools, universities, etc., and hence all kinds of schools are included. Hospitium is taken from the Latin hospes (guest),[53] and therefore may mean a lodging-house for guests, or a hospice or

[53] Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Hospitium."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

convent and refuge for travellers such as are kept by the canons of St. Maurice in Valais, Switzerland, on St. Gotthard and Great St. Bernard. But it may also mean a summer or health resort for religious, a mansion where they spend their vacation or sojourn for the sake of their health. These were the old grangiae [54] or country seats, villas which belonged to the religious and secular clergy as well as to laymen. Lastly by the name of hospice may also be understood a rural house inhabited by a lay brother who acts as superintendent or "farm boss" for the monastery.[55]

It may now be asked why the consent of the Ordinary is required for building or opening such houses. To answer this question is easy concerning schools, because the jurisdiction of the bishop extends to these and they are, moreover, institutions for the public welfare. But as to hospices a distinction was expected in favor of exempt religious, who are, however, expressly included in the text.[56] We may be permitted to observe that on the score of alienation exempt religious, with the exception of nuns and Sisters, are not bound to obtain the consent of the Ordinary.[57] Perhaps the reason for the law lies in the fact that hospices or similar buildings may have an oratory, for which, unless they are quasi-priories or dependencies of the main house, an Apostolic indult is needed, which is granted only after the bishop has inspected the chapel.[58] If a semi-public oratory is to be erected in such hospices the Ordinary's permission suf-

54 Ibid., s. v. "Grangia."

55 Piatus M., Praelectiones Iuris Reg., II, p. 230.

56 Gasparri refers to "Romanos Pontifices," but this constitution does not mention hospices.

57 Cfr. can. 534, Apostolic indult.

58 Benedict XIV, "Magno cum animi," June 2, 1751, §§ 11, 18; can. 1195. The Jesuits have the privilege to erect private oratories in such hospices, if they are quasi-houses of their order and dedicated to divine worship; cfr. Piatus M., II, 231 (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fices.[59] In such cases, therefore, the intervention of the Ordinary is quite intelligible. But apart from the erection of a private or semi-public oratory in such hospices we fail to see the necessity of the Ordinary's permission; for such a house is neither a religious nor a sacred place.

§ 4 of can. 497 mentions the formalities required for changing a religious house, already established, into one devoted to a different purpose. They are the same as those prescribed in § 1 of the same canon: Apostolic indult and episcopal permission for exempt houses; the Ordinary's permission for other houses not subject to the S. C. Prop. Fide. The stress lies on change. What is the nature of the change that requires these formalities? A change may be local or material. No local change is here mentioned, which is somewhat surprising, since in the "Romanos Pontifices" a change from one place to another is made subject to the same formalities as are required for a new foundation. Place must be taken in the sense of a municipality, or at least township or parish; for a mere local change of site would not require the observance of these formalities.[60]

The text of the "Romanos Pontifices," from which our Code is evidently taken, goes on to determine what material change in a religious house means. Such a change would take place if a school were converted into a church, a convent into a college or boarding school or hospital, and conversely. A change of this kind would fall under the regulations that require full solemnities, viz., a papal indult and the written permission of the Ordinary, for it would be equivalent to a new foundation.[61] If the original destiny of the house is retained, and merely a secondary purpose added, for instance, a

59 Can. 1192.
60 Piatus M., l. c., II, 279.
61 C. un., 6°, V, 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

novitiate or junior department or house of studies for members of the congregation, the change would not transcend the purpose of the institute but be merely an act of administration and internal discipline requiring no formalities. If, on the other hand, the scope of the house should be widened, if, for instance, a school for interns or a scholasticate would be made a boarding school open to outsiders, the aforesaid formalities would have to be observed. The Code adds: salvis fundationis legibus, with due regard to the will of the founder, which means that if the house was endowed by a pious founder, his will must be respected, and a substantial change of its provisos would require the twofold permission of Pope and bishop, even though it would not exceed the limits of internal discipline. Of course, the last will must be in writing or at least testified to by two unimpeachable witnesses, else it is presumed that the founder has not laid down any specific conditions.

For can. 498 see supra, pp. 75 sqq.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE X

THE GOVERNMENT OF RELIGIOUS

CHAPTER I

SUPERIORS AND CHAPTERS

After dealing with the foundation and suppression of religious congregations and houses, the Code proceeds to treat of the organization or government of religious. Here, of course, no detailed enumeration of the different classes of superiors and their powers over the various institutes can be expected. Though the norms cover a wide range, they admit enough elbow space for the different constitutions, as far as these do not conflict with the new law. The superiors specially mentioned are: the Roman Pontiff, the Cardinal Protector, the Ordinary, the religious Superiors, the general Chapter and Counselors.

CAN. 499

THE ROMAN PONTIFF AND THE CARDINAL PROTECTOR

§ 1. Religiosi omnes, tanquam supremo Superiori, subduntur Romano Pontifici cui obedire tenentur etiam vi voti obedientiae.

§ 2. Cardinalis Protector cuiuslibet religionis, nisi aliud expresse cautum fuerit in peculiaribus casibus, iurisdictione in religionem aut in singulos sodales non pollet, nec potest se interiori disciplinae et bonorum administrationi immiscere, sed eius est tantummodo bonum religionis consilio et patrocinio promovere.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

All religious are subject to the Roman Pontiff as their highest superior and must obey him also by virtue of the vow of obedience.

This general principle is based upon the ordinary, full, and universal power vested in the Pope, in virtue of which he is the highest superior of all religious.[1] This means that no religious order or congregation may lawfully exist without his sanction, even as human societies need the permission of higher authority for legal existence. Furthermore it implies that the papal ordinances and laws, as far as they touch religious, either in general as members of the Catholic Church and as a body, or in particular as single bodies, orders or congregations, must be complied with by all without exception. And this obedience must be offered to any and every legally elected pope, no matter what his personal qualities may be.[2]

But the same obedience is due also to the immediate legal representatives of the Sovereign Pontiff, and therefore religious must obey especially the S. Congregation of Religious and the tribunals of the Roman Court which are set up by papal authority, and also papal legates, if they have special faculties concerning exempt religious. Religious also owe obedience to general councils, and, during the vacancy of the Holy See, to the Cardinals who govern the Church in the meanwhile.

The extent of this obedience is partly personal, partly material. Personally it comprises all religious, exempt and not exempt, those with solemn and those with simple vows, as well as papal and diocesan institutes. For though the latter are only approved by the Ordinary, yet

1 Sometimes the title "abbas abbatum" is given to the Pope to signify that he has jurisdiction even over abbots. In the XIIth century the abbots of Monte Cassino and Cluny contended for that title.

2 Known is the attitude of Savonarola towards Alexander VI.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

they would not belong to the religious state without at least an implied ratification by the highest superior of all religious. Hence no exception may be claimed by any religious. As to the material extent of this obedience a distinction must be made between that owing to the Pope as the supreme head of the Church, and that due to him in virtue of the vow of obedience.[3] The former reaches farther than the latter because the vow of obedience has its limits, as will be seen when we come to discuss the obligations arising from vows. In virtue of the vow of obedience religious are bound to obey the Pope as far as their rule and constitutions demand,[4] and no farther; for a religious has no intention to bind himself farther than the limits assigned by his rule and constitutions, wherefore he says: "According to that rule I promise," etc. The consequence is that where the rule stops, the vow of obedience also ceases, and even the Sovereign Pontiff cannot stretch it, because he himself has approved the rule or constitution. Hence the Pope could not, in virtue of the vow of obedience, command a religious to leave the order and accept secular dignities, or embrace the married state, or pass to a stricter or even a milder order,[5] although he has the power to dispense.

Nor could he, in virtue of the vow of obedience, command a Benedictine to pass from one congregation to another, because the vow of stability is made for the congregation, nay even (at least it was so in former times) for a particular monastery. Neither could the Pope command a member of the Minimi to accept the 3 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Votum," art. II, n. 29; Bouix, l. c., II, p. 434; Piatus M., I, 298; II, 367 (ed. 2).

4 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. Votum, art. II, n. 28.

5 Suarez, De Statu Religioso, l. 10, c. 10, nn. 1 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mitigation of fasting, or force a Jesuit of the fourth class of professed members to accept an ecclesiastical dignity, because these have taken a special vow not to accept dignities. But whatever is explicitly or implicitly contained in rule and constitutions as falling under obedience to the religious superior, the Roman Pontiff is entitled to command in virtue of the vow of obedience. Still farther reaches his power as the supreme head of the Church. As such he may command any religious to accept any ecclesiastical dignity or office for the utility or necessity of the Church,[6] because the supreme jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters rests with the Sovereign Pontiff. Should any special vow be in the way of obeying the Pope's command, dispensation would be granted. This, however, does not exclude the possibility and admissibility of reverent remonstrances against acceptance. As to civil or secular matters we do not believe that the Pope should or would use his influence or power of command, because this sphere is not his. But in any matter not against the rule or constitutions the religious must obey the Pope in virtue of the vow of obedience.[7]

The next paragraph (§ 2) describes the power of the Cardinal Protector. A Cardinal Protector is given to every religious institute unless the Pope reserves the protectorate to himself. Leo XIII reserved to himself the protectorate over the united Franciscans; Pius X over the Benedictines. These are peculiar provisions which entirely depend on the will of the Pope. Otherwise a Cardinal Protector residing in Rome (in curia) is appointed for every religious order and congregation. This custom was introduced by St. Francis of Assisi.

6 Suarez, l. c., l. 11, c. 20, n. 21 f.

7 The Friars Minor have a special formula concerning obedience to the Pope, but whether or not it forms a special vow the authors dispute. Cfr. Piatus M., I, 295 (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Bishops are not appointed for this office, in order that they may not assume authority over another diocese.[8] But the Cardinal Protectors appear to have usurped a jurisdiction over orders and congregations which prompted the Constitution of Innocent XII, "Christi fidelium," Feb. 16, 1694, which reduced the authority of the Cardinal Protector to a merely paternal and consultive one, forbidding him to interfere in official information, dispensations, favors and the execution of rescripts, all of which is directly communicated by the Roman Congregations to the respective religious superiors.[9] These laws have been embodied in the Code, which rules that the Cardinal Protector enjoys no jurisdiction over the religious as a body or over single members of the same and may not interfere with their internal discipline or administration of property. His duty consists merely in promoting the welfare of the congregation by his advice and protection. Of course the Pope may, for particular reasons, grant a certain amount of actual jurisdiction to a Cardinal Protector, as the Code says; but there are few cases that require such extraordinary interference, e. g., serious trouble between the religious and the Ordinary, or relaxed discipline.

THE ORDINARY'S POWER

CAN. 500

§ 1. Subduntur quoque religiosi Ordinario loci, iis exceptis qui a Sede Apostolica exemptionis privilegium consecuti sunt, salva semper potestate quam ius etiam in eos locorum Ordinariis concedit.

§ 2. Moniales quae sub iurisdictione Superiorum

8 S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 21, 1851 (Bizzarri, p. 590, n. 12).

9 S. C. EE. et RR., May 9, 1715 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 302 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

regularium ex praescripto constitutionum sunt, Ordinario loci subduntur tantum in casibus iure expressis.

§ 3. Nulla virorum religio sine speciali apostolico indulto potest sibi subditas habere religiosas Congregationes mulierum aut earum religiosarum curam et directionem retinere sibi specialiter commendatam.

After having determined the relation of the religious orders towards the Sovereign Pontiff and their respective Cardinal Protector, the Code regulates their relation to the Ordinary of the diocese. To him all religious of the diocese are subject, except those who have obtained the privilege of exemption from the Apostolic See, and these, too, in certain cases expressly provided by law.

The first paragraph states as a general principle that religious should by right be subject to the Ordinary of the diocese, because locally all religious belong to the diocesan organization. Of exemption, which in general means freedom from episcopal jurisdiction, enough has been said in the Introduction. Observe that the Code has done away with the Tridentine distinction between the Ordinary as such and the Ordinary as papal delegate, simply maintaining the right of the Ordinary. As to religious Congregations, the power of the Ordinary is more extended respecting diocesan institutes and less extended concerning papal institutes. The difference appears in the election of superiors, canonical visitation, administration of property, etc. Spiritual guidance and the administration of the Sacraments should not offer any great divergency.

As to nuns, i. e., female orders with solemn vows, § 2 establishes that, if their constitutions subject them to the jurisdiction of regular superiors, they are withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary, except in cases expressly stated in the Code. The only nuns of this class in the U. S., so far as we know, are those of five Visitation Convents, according to a decision of the S. Congregation of Bishops and Regulars in 1864,[10] which at the same time decreed that in all the monasteries to be afterwards erected the vows of these sisters should be simple only. We doubt very much whether the convents of the Visitation Sisters are actually exempt. They certainly are subject to the Ordinary, not to regular superiors. All other nuns in the U. S. take simple vows, unless otherwise decided by an Apostolic rescript.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code says, further, that congregations of women with simple vows may never, unless a special Apostolic indult is granted to that effect, be subjected to a religious order or congregation of men, nor is any such order or congregation allowed to retain the care and direction of such sisters as if specially entrusted to them. No male institute, exempt or not, may henceforth claim any jurisdiction, authority, or spiritual guidance over any sisterhood, for such power would curtail the bishop's rights and be tantamount to exemption. The Holy See has justly reserved to itself the appointment of such a spiritual director, and any jurisdictional or authoritative affiliation of a congregation of Sisters with a congregation of men is prohibited by common law and needs a special indult.[11]

Here it may not be amiss to mention what were called double monasteries, that is to say, religious communities of men and women living under the same rule and roof, or if not under the same roof, at least near together.

10 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 735. The five convents are: Georgetown, Mobile, St. Louis (Kaskaskia), St. Aloysius (Frederick, Md.), and Baltimore.

11 S. C. EE. et RR., April 11, 1862 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 153 f.); "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900, I, 8: "In spiritual matters the congregations are subject to the bishops in whose dioceses they are established."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ecclesiastical legislation opposed such institutes,[12] but notwithstanding we find double monasteries in France, England, and Germany. Whitby in England was a famous abbey ruled by Hilda, who enjoyed great fame.[13] In France Remirmont was a most renowned foundation, as was that of Robert d'Arbrissel (+ 1117), who subjected nuns and monks alike to the jurisdiction of an abbess.[14] Such institutes were, of course, possible only on a basis of strict discipline and complete separation of the sexes, and may be explained by the peculiar conditions existing under the feudal system. Not seldom they were founded by the abbess herself or her near relatives, and she was therefore looked upon as the proprietress or "lady" of the monastery.[15] The priests and clerics who supplied the spiritual wants of the nuns had to conform themselves to her "rule." Fountevrauld claimed to represent the beloved Disciple under the maternal guidance of the Blessed Virgin,—a rather mystic view. Benedict XIV seems surprised that the superioress of Fountevrauld should be exempt from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary, but he does not deny the fact.[16] Now-a-days it would hardly be advisable to found such monasteries. Only one affiliation, as stated under can. 492, § 1, is admissible, viz., that of Tertiaries by the superior general of the first order, to enable them to participate in spiritual favors.

RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

The Code now lays down some rules concerning the powers of religious superiors and chapters, their election and obligations.

12 Cc. 12, 23, C. 18, q. 2.

13 St. Bede, Hist. Eccl., IV, 23 (Migne, 95, 209).

14 Studien O. S. B., 1885, 2, 64 ff.

15 Cfr. Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, I, 194 f.

16 "Quamvis iusto," April 30, 1749, § 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

POWERS OF RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 501

§ 1. Superiores et Capitula, ad normam constitutionum et iuris communis, potestatem habent dominativam in subditos; in religione autem clericali exempta, habent iurisdictionem ecclesiasticam tam pro foro interno, quam pro externo.

§ 2. Superioribus quibuslibet districte prohibetur quominus in causis ad S. Officium spectantibus se intromittant.

§ 3. Abbas Primas et Superior Congregationis monasticae non habent omnem potestatem et iurisdictionem quam ius commune tribuit Superioribus maioribus, sed eorum potestas et iurisdictio desumenda est ex propriis constitutionibus et ex peculiaribus Sanctae Sedis decretis, firmo praescripto can. 655, 1594, § 4.

A distinction is here made between domestic power and jurisdiction. The domestic power is granted to all superiors and Chapters over their subjects, but only in so far as their Constitutions and the common law permit; ecclesiastical jurisdiction, on the other hand, in the court of conscience as well as in foro externo, is possessed by the superiors of clerical exempt institutes only. Hence we have two kinds of superiors, namely (1) single persons and chapters; (2) such as are endowed with domestic power only, and such as enjoy jurisdiction proper.

1. Single superiors are either maiores or higher, or inferiores, lower or local. Among the higher superiors our Code enumerates the abbot primate, the abbot president of a monastic congregation, the abbot of an independent monastery, although the latter belongs to a mo-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nastic congregation, the superior general, the superior provincial and the latter's representatives, as well as those who enjoy a power similar to that of provincials. All these persons, if they belong to an exempt clerical order, are possessed of jurisdiction proper, and are therefore called prelates.[17] For a prelature is a dignity that combines precedence or preëminence — hence the name prælatus, from praeferre, to prefer — with jurisdiction. What jurisdiction means has been explained in the second volume of this work, to which we refer.[18] It implies public legislative, judiciary, and coercive power within certain limits. This is not the case with the domestic power (potestas dominativa), which consists in the authority of the superior to direct the members of a religious body to the end for which the institute was founded, and is therefore confined to the scope of the institute itself and limited by its constitutions and rules. This power is essential to any community for the reason that without authority no organization can attain its end. As S. Scripture says: "Where there is no governor, the people shall fall" (Prov. 11, 14). The extent, then, of the domestic power of the superiors is coterminous with the end of the institute as defined in its constitutions, and religious superiors are not at liberty to permit substantial deviations from the regular life.[19] To this right vested in the superiors corresponds the duty of obedience in the members, of which we shall treat under the heading of obligations.

This domestic power was for centuries the only one

17 Cfr. can. 488, 8; Suarez, De Statu Rel., tr. VIII, l. II, c. 1, n. 1 ff. (ed. Paris, 1860, t. 16, pp. 77 ff.).

18 Can. 196; Suarez (l. c., tr. VII, l. II, c. 18, n. 5, ed. Paris, 1859, t. 15, p. 218) says that the power of jurisdiction belongs to the power of the keys (potestas clavium); but so does the sacramental power, and yet it involves no jurisdiction proper.

19 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 1, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

religious superiors could wield. Gradually, especially since the tenth and more largely since the eleventh century, there was added to it the power of jurisdiction, which grew when certain orders attained exemption. Hence, when St. Benedict speaks in his Rule [20] of excommunication, he means what we call monastic, not ecclesiastical excommunication, although the two are similar.

It remains to say something of lower superiors, for the Code stops at the rank of provincials who are the last in the series of higher (maiores) superiors. Are guardians, conventual priors, rectors, higher superiors? It appears that the affirmative opinion may safely be held. Benedict XIV states that these are local superiors before whom trials concerning nullity of religious profession must be instituted.[21] Besides they are in law looked upon as dignitaries or at least such as may be appointed legates.[22] Hence there seems to be little doubt that they may be termed superiors in the sense of our Code. The same may not be said of cloistral priors (priores claustrales), who do not fall under the category of dignitaries (in dignitate constituti).[23]

The power of the superiors of exempt clerical religious orders is called ordinary because given in virtue of their office. For the same reason the Code states that these superiors are to be comprised under the name of Ordinaries.[24] The jurisdiction of these superiors is called quasi-episcopal, inasmuch as it extends to acts of jurisdiction, though not all, proper to bishops.[25] The Ordinary of the diocese has certain rights which these 20 Reg., cc. 23 f.

21 "Si datam," March 4, 1748, referred to by Gasparri, can. 488, 8.

22 C. 11, 6°, I, 3, De Rescriptis; c. 2, Clem., I, 2; Piatus M., l. c., I, 493.

23 C. 2, Clem., I, 2; Reiffenstuel, I, 29, n. 70 f.

24 Can. 198.

25 Suarez, De Rel., tr. VIII, l. II, c. 2, n. 14 (ed. Paris, 1860, t. 16, p. 90 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

superiors must respect. Aside from this it is generally admitted that, as Pius V states, the religious superiors endowed with jurisdiction may exercise the same power over their subjects as the bishops over the clergy and faithful.[26] Hence when the Code speaks of "Ordinarius," without the addition "loci" (diocesan), the religious superiors are included, unless the wording or context plainly excludes them.

Superiors of religious orders which are not exempt enjoy only domestic power within the limits of their respective constitutions. Therefore ecclesiastical censures, dispensations from ecclesiastical laws, absolution from reserved cases, etc., are not within the range of their power, for in such matters the members and superiors of non-exempt religious are subject to the Ordinary, who may, however, communicate the necessary faculties to the superiors.[27]

Besides the superiors there are the chapters (capitula) of the orders and congregations, which are assemblies held for the purpose of treating matters pertaining to the institute. St. Benedict already inculcated the necessity of calling together either the whole community, or at least the seniors, that the Scriptural injunction might be followed: "Do nothing without counsel; and thou shalt not repent when thou hast done" (Eccles. 32, 24). He might also have alleged the text, Proverbs 11, 14: "There is safety where there is much counsel." But after all was said and done the abbot decided. Only in elections the constitutional element appears. Later, with the changed position of abbots endowed with jurisdiction and often with feudal powers, the legislation of the 26 "Romani Pontificis," July 21, 1571, § 3, which explicitly mentions the Dominican Priors.

27 Cfr. "Conditae," II.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Church bound them not only to the advice, but to the consent, of the monks.[28] The English Benedictines set a good example and thereby helped to frame "the great charter" of a constitutional monarchy which was absolutely necessary to counteract the almost frightfully increased power of the abbots. If the rule of St. Benedict is cited against us, we answer that no rule, and no law of human origin is destined to last the same forever. Besides, if the abbots have been endowed with prerogatives not even hinted at in the Rule of St. Benedict, it is difficult to understand why the monks should be denied development of their capitular rights.[29]

The Cistercians, therefore, and the great Mendicant Orders, riding the wave of the times, introduced into their constitutions the institution of chapters, which later were approved, nay insisted upon by the Fourth Lateran Council as well as by that of Trent.[30]

Chapters are either general, or provincial, or local, according as they meet from the whole order, or from a province, or from one convent. The convocation of a chapter belongs to the superior who is empowered to call it by the constitution of the order; for there is a variety of rules which we cannot detail here.[31] The same is true concerning the subject matter to be treated in chapters. The manner of procedure may be defined by the constitutions; if it is not, the common law (see canon 101) must be followed. Whatever requires the consent (consensus) of the chapter affects the validity of the acts which the superior performs, and he would therefore act validly if he neglected the chapter's rights. But 28 Cfr. cc. 2, 3, 6, X, III, 10, touching chiefly English monasteries.

29 Molitor, Religiosi Iuris Capita Selecta, 1909, passim, would have us go back 1400 years!

30 C. 7, X, III, 35; tit. 16 in 6°; tit. 10 in Clem.; Trid., sess. 25, cc. 1, 8, de reg.

31 Cfr. Piatus M., l. c., I, 613 ff. (2nd ed.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if the law or constitutions demand only the advice (consilium) of the chapter, transactions made by the superior without calling the chapter are valid.[32]

The power of a General Chapter is supreme in the respective order or congregation, not including the monastic congregations which are mentioned in § 3. It extends to the election, punishment and deposition even of the superior general, to the enactment and repeal of laws and statutes, unless these have been specifically ratified by the Pope. But the General Chapter may not enact laws or rules against the common law or against the rule of the order, either by making it stricter or relaxing its tenor, although mitigations may be introduced with the approval of the Holy See.[33] The power here described in general terms may, of course, be enlarged or restricted by the constitutions, which depend upon the approbation of the Holy See.

The Provincial Chapter, broadly speaking (for as to specified faculties the respective constitutions must be consulted), may enact laws touching the province, elect and depose provincial superiors, restrict and abolish privileges granted for the province, but not such as are granted to the whole order or congregation.

The Local Chapter is convoked for the consideration of matters touching the local community, especially novices and other affairs of importance. The monastic chapters are of greater authority than those of centralized orders whose convents generally consist of but a few members.

The rights of single capitulars in any religion are, habitually at least, granted by the first (simple) profession, although they may not be exercised during the time [32] Can. 105. [33] Piatus M., l. c., 616 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of simple or temporary vows.[34] But the Code has, as it were purposely, abstained from determining a more precise date for the exercise of capitular rights, evidently in order to avoid controversies. There is question about the requisite of sacred orders for the exercise of capitular rights in clerical religious. We can find no law text[35] whatever which requires a higher order for the right of voting, unless the chapters in question would be cathedral or collegiate chapters. It would, however, not contravene any law of the Church were the constitutions to prescribe a sacred order as a necessary condition of exercising capitular rights.

As to those who are deprived of that right consult can. 167, which excludes from the right of voting all who are incapable of a human act, minors, and censured and infamous persons.[36] Under can. 639 f. all those who are either temporarily or forever secularized are deprived of capitular rights.[37] The Code further mentions as liable to be deprived of capitular rights those who violate the rules of common life in a serious manner.[38] Finally the lay brothers (fratres conversi) are not admitted to the chapter rights; for although they are religious, they do not, according to the common law of the Church, belong to the clerical or hierarchic order properly so-called.[39] Besides the law was doubtless made in order to prevent dissensions, which were not rare in former times, especially on the occasion of elections, and to exclude undue lay influence in purely ecclesiastical matters.

34 Can. 578, § 3.

35 C. 2, Clem., I, 6, mentions churches of canons (collegiate chapters); Trid., sess., 22, c. 4, refers to cathedral and collegiate churches only.

36 Cfr. also can. 2331, 2336, 2342, 2360, 2368, 2385.

37 Can. 639 f.

38 Can. 2389.

39 C. 32, § 1, 6°, I, 6; Engel, I, 6, n. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MATTERS PERTAINING TO THE HOLY OFFICE

Religious superiors, according to § 2 of can. 501, are strictly forbidden to handle or interfere with cases belonging to the Holy Office. Although the synod of Toulouse in 1229 had enjoined exempt abbots who were not subject to the Ordinary's jurisdiction to proceed like bishops against heretics and their protectors and promoters,[40] this injunction was, it seems, not conducive to the end for which the Inquisition had been instituted. Hence, especially after the Council of Trent, the causae fidei, or matters of faith, which fell under the jurisdiction of the Holy Office, were exclusively assigned to the latter in places where it was able to exercise its power. But when heresy sprang up and spread far and wide, the bishops were the natural defenders of the faith and judges in such matters. Paul V excluded religious superiors from proceeding in matters strictly belonging to the Holy Office.[41] These matters are the following:

a) Whatever appertains to heresy and schism, as well as the persons (bishops, inquisitors) who proceed against these crimes, if they are impeded or disturbed in prosecuting the guilty;

b) Whatever savors of divination, witchcraft, sorcery, superstition, astrology, etc.;

c) Whatever touches the sacredness of the confessional;[42]

d) Persons, lay or clerical, who, though not priests, attempt to say Mass or hear confessions.

e) The Code adds another, viz., religious who become 40 Can. 2 (Hefele, Concil.-Gesch., V, 873).

41 "Romanus Pontifex," Sept. 1, 1606, § 2; H. O., May 15, 1901.

42 Cfr. Santi-Leitner, l. c., I, 31, n. 70; Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Regul., 1903, p. 325; the sacredness of the confessional concerns sollicitatio ad turpia and refusal of absolution unless the name of the accomplice be revealed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

members of a Masonic sect or similar society must be denounced to the Holy Office.[43] These and similar matters, then, the religious superiors are not to prosecute, either criminally or judicially, by summoning witnesses or inflicting penalties, or in any way that would savor of inquisitorial procedure, but refer to the Holy Office if any proof is in their hands. They are not obliged to act on mere suspicion or rumor, because prudence and charity require an investigation; but they may administer fraternal correction or admonition. The culprits may be reported to the Ordinary or directly to the Holy Office.[44]

SUPERIORS OF MONASTIC CONGREGATIONS

These superiors, according to § 3, can. 501, have not the same power and jurisdiction as the higher superiors (superiores maiores), but only as much as they receive from their own constitutions and from special decrees of the Holy See. The same holds good also of the Abbot Primate of the Benedictine Order.

A special canon is devoted to the constitution of the Benedictines and their affiliated orders,— a deference for which these orders owe a debt to the sovereign legislator. To understand this the reader should consider that each Benedictine monastery deserving of that name is an autonomous or independent juridical person or corporation, whose head is from time immemorial called abbot (father). St. Benedict looked upon his communities as families over which the abbot was to rule with an authority similar to that of a Roman paterfamilias. He does not speak in his rule of an aggregation of the various monastic families, though it cannot be proved that the Benedictine Code excludes or condemns such amalgamation or confederation. To call the Cluniac Con-

43 Can. 2336, § 2.

44 H. O., May 15, 1901.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gregation or order, as it was styled, a distinct departure [45] from St. Benedict's rule seems to us a rather subjective judgment. And even granted — dato, non concesso,— that union in a stricter sense should be called a deviation from the primitive rule of St. Benedict, would it not be foolish to make even of a sacred Code a petrified thing impervious to any, even salutary changes, which do not touch the substance or nerve of the rule? Changed conditions require a change of rules. In England, France, Italy, and Germany, especially after the IVth Lateran Council,[46] congregations and chapters seem to have been a necessary requisite for maintaining discipline and order, as well as to exert influence in, and command the respect of, the outside world. It could not escape the far-sighted Pope Leo XIII, who was so deeply interested in the Greek Union [47] and the Union of the Franciscans, that a closer confederation of the houses of the Order of St. Benedict would be productive of many advantages and benefits. With the coöperation of Cardinal Dusmet he succeeded in establishing a "fraternal confederation of the Black Benedictines," over which he put an Abbot Primate, to be chosen for twelve years from any of the congregations. He resides in the College of St. Anselm in Rome, whose abbot with ordinary jurisdiction he is. But he has no jurisdiction over the single congregations or abbeys, or over the various abbots or members. No powers or rights are pointed out in the Apostolic brief [48]

45 Cfr. Alston in the Cath. Encycl., IV, 73 f (s. v. "Cluny"); a more decisive deviation from the rule are temporary abbots. The author is correct insofar as the Cluniac system of priories was anything but Benedictine; but a union of abbeys is neither denounced nor recommended by the Rule.

46 C. 7, X, III, 35.

47 Cardinal V. Vanutelli reported to Leo XIII that the Benedictines would favorably impress the Orientals, and upon this report Leo XIII acted in supporting the new organization and reopening St. Anselm's College, Jan. 4, 1888.

48 "Summum Semper," July 12, 1893; Studien O. S. B., 1893, 454, 630 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that created the new dignity, but some were granted in the course of years by the Roman Court.[49] Thus the Abbot Primate may, leaving other faculties now dubious aside, call the abbots presidents for a meeting in Rome at least every six years.[50] But the decisions taken at such a meeting are not to be considered laws for the order, for no Order of St. Benedict, in the juridical sense, exists; nor are the presidents entitled to make laws for the order, or even for their congregations.

Chapters of each congregation are called by the presidents thereof, generally at stated times. Those who are to be present at the chapter are determined by the Constitutions of each congregation, which greatly differ from one another. Thus the English Congregation admits the president, the actual abbots, the Cathedral Prior of Newport, the delegates from single monasteries, the procurator at the Roman Court, the master of the schools, the assessor in judiciary matters and the inspector of the temporalities.[51] The American-Cassinese Congregation calls abbots and independent priors as well as delegates. The Swiss-American Congregation admits only abbots.[52] The reason why these chapters enjoy no legislative power for the congregation as such is because as long as a congregation is no juridically united body these authorities, even under the presidency of one acting as abbot president, no matter how solemnly they may gather, are merely single entities who represent their own communities, but not the whole congregation in the sense of an ecclesiastical corporation. We do not deny, however,

49 Cfr. Annales O. S. B., 1908, pp. 22, 46, 57; S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 31, 1902; Dec. 2, 1906; Dec. 21, 1907; Pius X, May 30, 1908.

50 Such a meeting was held in 1907.

51 Leo XIII, "Diu quidem," June 29, 1899 (Bull. Cong. Ang. O. S. B., 1912, p. 125).

52 This is an anachronism, to be removed like the regium placet.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google that the Sovereign Pontiff could endow them with legislative power, in which case they would act as delegates of the Pope. The members of such chapters may propose and deliberate on matters of reform and regular discipline as well as mutual assistance and material support.[53] Precisely from this point of view it would be conducive to uniformity of discipline if not only abbots would be present at the so-called general chapters, but, according to the model of the English Congregation, also representatives of the communities with at least a consultive voice. The reason why our Benedictine Congregations, or at least most of them, are not a corporative unit is that profession, and especially the vow of stability, is made into the hands of the abbot, and is, at least intentionally, confined to the single monastery. Besides, although there may be a mutual promise of material help, yet the property of each monastery belongs to that monastery and not to the congregation as such. Whether two vital elements of the Benedictine "Order" should or may be changed, we leave to others to decide.

CAN. 502

Supremus religionis Moderator potestatem obtinet in omnes provincias, domos, sodales religionis, exercendam secundum constitutiones; alii Superiores ea gaudent intra fines sui muneris.

This canon enacts that the superior general is endowed with power over all the provinces, houses, and members of his institute within the limits of its constitutions, and that other superiors have as much power as their office requires.

The Constitution "Conditae" of Leo XIII had estab-

53 Molitor, l. c., p. 526; p. 339 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lished the rule that the government of a religious congregation whose Constitutions are approved by the Holy See must not be tampered with by the Ordinary, but remains with the superiors, either general or local. Hence it empowered the supreme superiors to organize houses, to dismiss novices and professed members, etc., in accordance with the law as now set forth. But it also reserved to the Roman Pontiff the right to dispense from either temporary or perpetual vows.[54] How this is to be understood shall be explained under the title on dismissal. The limitations of the power granted to any superior, general or other, must be determined by the respective constitutions, which are supposed to be approved by the Holy See,— the supreme authority against which no inferior may act. It is not necessary to specify here because the different rights will be mentioned under various headings later. Only one point we will note. The domestic power includes the right of punishing delinquent members, but only in so far as no ecclesiastical censures or vindictive penalties are inflicted, because to mete out ecclesiastical penalties requires more than domestic power, viz., jurisdiction. But from the infliction of a punishment which does not exceed the domestic authority of the superior no appeal in the proper sense can be made, although recourse may be had to a higher superior or to the S. Congregation of Religious.

CAN. 503

Superiores maiores in religionibus clericalibus exemptis possunt notarios constituere, sed tantum pro negotiis ecclesiasticis suae religionis.

Canon 503 grants the higher superiors of exempt cleri-

54 "Conditae," II, 1 f.; Bastien-Lanslots, l. c., p. 173.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cal orders the right of appointing notaries to act in ecclesiastical matters pertaining to their order. This, as history tells, is an ancient custom. Abbots chose their own notaries, who were recognized by the civil courts.[55] Under the new Code their office is purely ecclesiastical, and consists chiefly in keeping records, taking depositions, and authenticating documents.[56] Before they enter upon their office, notaries must take an oath to perform their functions faithfully. This oath is to be made into the hands of the superior who appointed them.[57] Such notaries may play an important role in ecclesiastical lawsuits, e. g., such as concern the validity of the profession or expulsion of religious, also in cases of beatification and canonization, elections, the installation of religious superiors, etc.

QUALITIES OF SUPERIORS

CAN. 504

Firmis propriis cuiusvis religionis constitutionibus quae provectiorem aetatem aliaque potiora requisita exigant, ad munus Superioris maioris inhabiles sunt qui eandem religionem professi non sunt a decem saltem annis a prima professione computandis, non sunt ex legitimo matrimonio nati et annos quadraginta non expleverunt, si agatur de supremo religionis Moderatore aut de Antistita in monialium monasterio; annos triginta, si de aliis Superioribus maioribus.

This canon lays down the minimum requirements for the office of superior. (1) It leaves it to the respective constitutions of each institute to demand a higher age or 55 Reiffenstuel, II, 22, n. 260.

56 Authenticating relics would also belong to their office, but see can. 1283.

57 Can. 364.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more stringent requisites; (2) It rules that, to be elected higher superior, one must have been a member of the same institute for at least ten years from the date of his first or simple profession; (3) It demands that he must have been born of lawful wedlock; and (4) that the superior general of any religious institute and the superioress of nuns with solemn vows must have completed the fortieth, and every other superior the thirtieth year of age.

Concerning the first point note that while the religious constitutions may demand more extensive qualifications, they are not allowed to restrict the minimum determined by the Code; and hence all rules or constitutions contrary to canon 504 must be looked upon as abrogated.

The second point rules that the ten years during which one must have been a professed member of the religious institute of which he is to be elected superior are to be counted from the date of simple, not solemn, profession, that is to say from the date of that profession which is commonly made after the novitiate. Noteworthy is the phrase: "the same institute." Clement V issued a decretal saying that the election of one who belongs to another religio, for instance, of a Franciscan as abbot of a Benedictine monastery, would be null and void.[58] The Code says "religio," not congregation or province. From this point of view a religious of one monastic congregation of the same order may be validly elected abbot of a monastery of another congregation of the same order. However, a Cistercian could not legally be elected abbot of a monastery of Black Benedictines, because, though the original code of both is the same, yet they are justly called different orders.

The third requirement is legitimate birth. Various 58 C. 1, Clem. I, 3, de electione.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

councils, especially during the eleventh century, enacted strict rules concerning such as were born out of lawful wedlock; while admitting illegitimate children to religious profession, they excluded them from the higher offices, especially prelacies.[59] Sixtus V made still stricter rules concerning such as were born from an incestuous or a sacrilegious relation, entirely excluding them from the religious state.[60] A certain mitigation was introduced by the same pope by admitting such as were born from parents between whom a legitimate marriage could have existed at the time of birth, and who were legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents. The whole question, therefore, falls rather under marriage law, to which we refer.[61]

Of interest may also be that part of the declaratory Constitution of Sixtus V which provides that among the dignities from which religious of illegitimate birth are debarred, are the following: provosts, abbots, priors (conventual), guardians, custodes, provincials and generals. The offices of professors (lectores), confessors, doctors or masters of theology, preachers and rectors (of seminaries) are not considered dignities.[62]

The last quality required in a superior is age. The Decretals[63] were somewhat less rigorous on this point than is the Code, which extends the age limit, requiring forty years for a superior general and thirty for all other higher superiors, provincials, abbots, and local superiors. This rule is just, for theory and practice, theological knowledge and business abilities now-a-days require an experience not necessary in former times.

59 C. 1, X, I, 17 (synod of Poitiers, 1078); Reg. Iuris 87 in 6°.

60 "Cum de omnibus," Dec. 1, 1587.

61 "Ad Romanum spectat," Oct. 21, 1588; cfr. can. 1015, 1114, 1116.

62 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 845.

63 C. 43, 6°, I, 6 (abbess = 30 years); c. 1, Clem. III, 10, required only twenty-five years for a prior.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Inhabiles means that the lack of one of these requirements constitutes a canonical impediment.

DURATION OF OFFICE

CAN. 505

Superiores maiores sint temporarii, nisi aliter ferant constitutiones; Superiores autem minores locales ne constituantur ad tempus ultra triennium; quo exacto, possunt ad idem munus iterum assumi, si constitutiones ita ferant, sed non tertio immediate in eadem religiosa domo.

The text plainly betrays the preference of the legislator for temporary over permanent superiors. Unless the respective constitutions determine otherwise, the higher superiors should be elected for a certain limited term. As to minor local superiors the Code, setting aside the constitutions, simply rules that their term of office should not last more than three years, after the expiration of which they may be re-appointed for another term of the same length, provided the constitutions are not opposed to reëlection. But no one may serve three successive terms as superior of the same house.

The question whether it is more expedient to have temporary or permanent superiors is not without interest. That opinions upon it are divided is, we believe, due to more or less subjective prepossessions and perhaps to circumstances. It may be well to state the reasons for permanent superiors first. Superiors, like bishops, ought to be permanent, because permanency of tenure produces a stronger bond of charity between governor and governed. Besides, a perpetual superior is apt to take better care of his flock and to acquire experience which will benefit the subjects as well as the government itself.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Against perpetual superiors the following reasons are alleged: humility and zeal are promoted by short terms; experience teaches that temporary superiors do not repeat the mistakes of their predecessors. If the predecessor has been a bad or incapable ruler, the evil produced is neither so intensive nor so extensive, and can be more easily remedied. Corruption is not so apt to become rooted during a short regime. When perpetual superiors grow old, their government is also apt to grow old and rusty.[64] Lastly, favoritism does not grow so strong and pernicious under temporary superiors. It is not necessary to develop this argument further, but one thing is certain, viz., that the Congregations of the Roman Court have never been in favor of perpetual superiors for female orders and congregations. In Italy they do not even allow abbesses to remain in office more than three years, or to be reëlected for a third term, unless there is "a strict necessity" and a unanimous vote of the Sisters.[65] As to the Benedictines it is known that, under their rule, abbots are elected for life, and the Code permits this custom, if enacted by the Constitutions,[66] to continue.

Minor local superiors are not henceforth allowed to hold office for more than six years. Who are these superiors? All who are inferior in rank and power to the "provincials and their vicars and all others who have the same powers as the provincials." Therefore, conventual priors, guardians, custodes and similar superiors, who enjoy the same power in their houses as provincials, 64 Cfr. Piatus M., l. c., I, 491 (ed. 2). An expedient for counteracting the evils attendant upon old age is the election of a coadjutor, as was done in several instances, in these latter years, in the O. S. B.

65 There is a great number of decisions on this point in the regesta of the S. C. EE. et RR.

66 The Cassinese Congregation had triennial abbots, the English Congregation elects its abbots for eight years.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

do not fall under this prohibition.[67] But we do believe that all local superiors who are not endowed with jurisdiction but enjoy only domestic power, as in congregations of non-exempt religious, are affected by the law. Neither are superiors of diocesan institutes which have only one house exempt from the law of a triennial term. The mystic argument that a superior, like a mother, should not be removed from his family, has no juridical value.

ELECTION OF RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 506

§ 1. Antequam ad Superiorum maiorum electionem deveniatur in religionibus virorum, omnes et singuli e Capitulo iureiurando promittant se electuros quos secundum Deum eligendos esse existimaverint.

§ 2. In monasteriis monialium, comitiis eligendae Antistitae praesit, quin tamen clausuram ingrediatur, Ordinarius loci aut eius delegatus cum duobus sacerdotibus scrutatoribus, si moniales eidem subiectae sint; secus, Superior regularis; sed etiam hoc in casu Ordinarius tempestive moneri debet de die et hora electionis, cui potest una cum Superiore regulari per se ipse vel per alium assistere et, si assistat, praeesse.

§ 3. In scrutatores ne assumantur ipsarum monialium confessarii ordinarii.

§ 4. In mulierum Congregationibus electioni Antistae generalis praesideat per se vel per alium Ordinarius loci, in quo electio peragitur; cui, si agatur de Congregationibus iuris dioecesani, peractam electionem confirmare vel rescindere integrum est pro conscientiae officio.

67 Pius V, "Romani Pontificis," July 21, 1571; Sixtus V, "Ad Romanum spectat," Oct. 21, 1588.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 507

§ 1. In electionibus quae a Capitulis fiunt, servetur ius commune de quo in can. 160–182, praeter cuiusque religionis constitutiones eidem non contrarias.

§ 2. Caveant omnes a directa vel indirecta suffragiorum procuratione tam pro seipsis quam pro aliis.

§ 3. Postulatio admitti potest solum in casu extraordinario et dummodo in constitutionibus non prohibeatur.

These two canons establish the regulations or laws to be observed in the election of superiors. We may say that can. 506 determines the preliminaries, whilst can. 507 governs the act of election.

§ 1 of can. 506 enjoins all the members of religious institutes of men, before they proceed to the election of higher superiors, to take an oath by which they promise to elect only such candidates as they think should, before God, be chosen. This oath was prescribed by Clement VIII, and reinforced so strongly by a decision of the S. C. Concilii,[68] that not a few authors regarded it as essential.[69] The Code cannot be construed as enjoining it under penalty of nullity of the election, though it imposes it as a most serious and grievous obligation, as is evident not only from the sacredness of the oath itself, but also from the importance of the business in hand.

The oath may be administered either by the presiding officer or by the notary of the religious institute shortly before the election takes place, and must be taken by "each and every member of the chapter." This term

68 "Nullus omnino," July 25, 1599, § 23; S. C. C., Sept. 21, 1624, § 1.

69 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Electio," IV, 7 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would indicate that each has to take the oath singly, yet the electors would no doubt comply with the spirit of the law if all answered in a body, while one pronounced the formula of the oath.[70] The holding up of three fingers of the right with the left hand on the breast is sufficient, whilst the formula is pronounced.

The Code then defines the object of the oath. This object is more precisely described in the constitution of Clement VIII, thus: to elect him whom, in conscience, they believe to be more righteous and more fit. Our Code throughout uses the term "fit" (idoneus), not worthy (dignus). Therefore it is left to the conviction of everyone of the electors to give his vote to the one whom he believes more fit to fill the office. Fitness must be judged according to the qualities required by, and the obligations imposed on, the office under consideration. One quality should, according to St. Benedict's Rule, never be overlooked, viz., discretion.[71]

§§ 2 and 3 treat of the election of superiors in communities of nuns (moniales), that is, sisterhoods with solemn vows. If they are subject to the Ordinary of the diocese, the latter or his delegate, with two priests as tellers, must be present at the election of the superioress, without, however, entering the enclosure. If the nuns are subject to a regular prelate, he must be present, though also in this latter case the Ordinary of the diocese must be duly informed of the day and hour of the election, and may be present himself or by proxy at the election, together with the regular prelate, who must 70 The formula might read: "Ego N. N., huius capituli membrum, promitto et iuro, me electurum quem secundum Deum eligendum esse existimo. Sic me Deus adiuvet (et haec sancta Dei evangelia)" — these last words only if the Gospel is used.

71 Rule c. 64. Piatus M., l. c., I, 494, justly remarks that the physical, mental, and spiritual qualities should be considered conjointly.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cede the presidency to the bishop. The confessors in ordinary of the nuns may not be appointed tellers at such elections.

As already stated, there are only a few convents in this country to which this canon applies. Observe that the Ordinary or his delegate are not allowed to enter the enclosure, which is here intended to be the papal one; but they may watch the procedure at the grate of the church.

Neither the bishop, nor his chancellor, nor his vicar general, nor his delegate are entitled to gather or register the votes.[72] This right belongs to the two tellers, who, according to our Code, must be priests, but not regular confessors of the nuns. The same rule applies to the regular prelate who attends the election.[73] The votes must be deposited in a closed urn or box, which is to be opened by the prelate, bishop, or regular prelate, and the two tellers. The result is to be announced by the prelate. The same process must be repeated if the election was without result.

§ 4 rules that the Ordinary in whose diocese the election of a superioress general of a woman's congregation takes place, should assist thereat either himself or by a delegate. If the institute is a diocesan one, the Ordinary may ratify or nullify the election, according to his good pleasure and conscience. A distinction is here made between papal and diocesan congregations of women. At the election of a superior general of the first class the Ordinary in whose diocese the election is held, acts as delegate of the Holy See, and presides either himself or by proxy.[74] But he has no right to nullify the election

72 S. C. EE. et RR., June 19, 1671; April, 1729 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 265 f.; p. 323 f.).

73 Trid., sess. 25, c. 6, de reg.; Richter, Trid., p. 409; S. C. Rel., Aug. 27, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 732).

74 Leo XIII, "Conditae," II, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if it has been held according to common law and the constitutions of the order. If the Ordinary is accompanied by one or two priests, these are not to act as tellers or to meddle in the election, by insinuation or other means. They are mere spectators. The election of tellers is the first act of the chapter meeting. Besides two tellers or scrutineers, there should also be chosen a secretary.[75] The duties of the tellers consist, as explained in Vol. II under can. 171, in collecting the votes, counting them, and comparing their number with that of the persons entitled to vote. If the number of votes is equal to that of the voters, and no invalid ballot is found, the votes deposited in the urn are opened and read before the chapter. All these acts must be faithfully recorded by the secretary, who, like the tellers, is bound by the obligation of natural and official secrecy. The bishop and his delegate may be present in the election room, for the law of enclosure does not debar him.

Over diocesan institutes the Ordinary enjoys greater power. Not only may he preside at the election of the superioress, but he may nullify the election or reject the person elected according to the dictates of his conscience.[76] After the third ballot, if no election has taken place, the bishop may appoint anyone he chooses. This right belongs to the Ordinary also in elections of papal congregations.[77] The question may be asked whether the delegate of the bishop may claim the same right as the bishop himself if he were present. The answer is affirmative if the Ordinary enjoined his delegate to act for him without reservation, but negative if he has reserved to himself the power of ratification or nullification or made an exception in regard to a certain person,

75 "Normae," n. 226.
76 "Conditae," I, n. 9.
77 Cfr. can. 101, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or posited a condition. For, on the one hand, the Ordinary has full power over diocesan congregations, and, on the other, the delegate acts as a mandatarius, who must stick to the terms of his mandate and is not allowed to transgress the limits of his commission. However, in elections performed in papal congregations, the bishop's delegate must, like the bishop himself, observe the regulations laid down in the Constitutions and is therefore not at liberty to ratify or nullify the election unless a substantial mistake was made. Neither are the bishop or his delegate entitled to take exception to any person elected if she enjoys the qualities prescribed by the common law and the constitutions of the institute.

The three paragraphs of can. 507 govern the act of election. The first refers to the rules laid down in can. 160–182. Whenever, therefore, a chapter is held for the purpose of an election, the rules referred to must be strictly obeyed, and the regulations in the constitutions of the respective religious congregation or order governing elections may be followed only in so far as they are not against canons 160–182. These, we believe, have been sufficiently explained in our Vol. II.

§ 2 is taken verbally from Clement VIII's "Nullus omnino," which strictly forbids any soliciting or procuring of votes, either for oneself or for another, directly or indirectly. Direct solicitation consists in campaigning for a candidate by collecting votes or getting promises to the effect of having that person elected in preference to another. Indirect solicitation consists in secretly influencing the electors, by words, in writing, or by promises, insinuations, and favors, on behalf of a candidate. All such machinations are strictly prohibited. If direct, they may approach simony, i. e., giving temporal things for a spiritual thing, such as the office of superior.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Altogether different from soliciting votes is the tractatus praevius or preliminary meeting, at which the merits or demerits of the candidates are freely and charitably discussed, in order to facilitate the election. This is not forbidden, and often produces good results, especially in a community of which many members live outside the convent and know but little of the qualities of the candidates and the needs of the congregation at large. But even in such preliminary meetings all pressure and solicitation must be avoided.

§ 3 mentions postulation as being admissible in an extraordinary case if the constitutions do not prohibit it. Concerning that point enough has been said under can. 179 ff. But attention must be drawn to the injunction of the Code that one who is not strictly eligible to office by reason of a canonical impediment may be postulated only in an extraordinary case. This means that, as a rule, an election should take place, and only if the candidate suffering from a canonical impediment is absolutely necessary for the welfare of the community, may he be postulated. In the petition that has to be sent to the S. Congregation of Religious asking for the privilege of postulation, the fact must be mentioned that the Constitutions prohibit postulation if this is the case. In such a case the suppression of the prohibition mentioned would invalidate the grant of the favor, because the legislator could not be supposed to know of the particular law, i. e., the Constitutions, and therefore might not grant postulation if he knew. Therefore the reasons for postulation forbidden by the Constitutions and against the common law must be stronger than in the case of prohibition only against the common law.

Here again attention may be drawn to the strict definition of postulation and the canonical impediments set forth in can. 304. All confirm our view that the abbot of a Benedictine monastery may be elected but not postulated by another monastery of the same congregation. The reason why we restrict the statement to monasteries of the same congregation lies in the fact of stability, which, though primarily intended for the monastery, was occasionally extended to the congregation. Besides, since each congregation differs from all others in some point of discipline, it would not be advisable to elect an abbot from a different congregation, although the common law (can. 504) only speaks of profession in the same religio, and does not therefore exclude other congregations of the same order. The idea that there is a sort of mystic matrimony between the abbot and his monastery we reject absolutely, since it has no prop in the new Code, which rather favors temporary superiors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RESIDENCE OF SUPERIORS

CAN. 508

In sua quisque domo Superiores commorentur nec ab eadem discedant, nisi ad normam constitutionum.

Religious superiors shall reside in their respective houses, which they are not allowed to leave except as far as the Constitutions permit.

This is the law of residence enjoined on superiors, not only of higher, but also of lower rank, because the canon mentions superiors in general. What it says concerning the respective house is to be understood of the office itself. Hence the general has to reside in the generalate, or if this is not accessible, in the house which serves as generalate (casa generalizia, in Italian). The provincial must reside in the house assigned to him as his habitual dwelling; the local superior, in the house of the local community, and so forth. A stricter rule is laid down, as we shall see presently, concerning enclosure.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The obligation of residence, grave as it is in general, varies according to the importance and requirements of the office. If it is true that a bishop's duties demand his personal residence in the diocese, it is perhaps not too much to say that a religious superior must exert his influence and authority within the community assigned to him, because a religious superior, too, is chosen in view of his personal qualities (de industria personae). Furthermore, a certain amount of enclosure or separation from the world and its affairs [78] is incumbent also on superiors. Lastly, the vow of stability, for instance, with the Benedictines, forbids frequent absence from the monastery, for one is not released from this vow by becoming a superior. Of course, if business or necessity or evident utility, or Christian charity, or the command of a higher superior call one away, he is justified in absenting himself, not only in the court of conscience but before the legislator as well, provided, of course, the respective Constitutions are properly observed.

DUTY OF INSTRUCTING THEIR SUBJECTS

CAN. 509

§ 1. Omnis Superior debet notitiam et exsecutionem decretorum Sanctae Sedis, quae religiosos respiciunt, suos inter subditos promovere.

§ 2. Curent Superiores locales:

1.° Ut saltem semel in anno, statis diebus, publice legantur propriae constitutiones, itemque decreta quae publice legenda Sancta Sedes praescribet;

78 C. 1, § 5, Clem. III, 10, forbids the frequenting of princely courts, and § 7, ibid., strictly enjoins residence in the place of office, unless for the sake of studies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Ut saltem bis in mense, firmo praescripto can. 565, § 2, christianae catechesis habeatur instructio pro conversis et familiaribus, audientium conditioni accommodata, et, praesertim in religionibus laicalibus, pia ad omnes de familia exhortatio.

Superiors should see to it that the decrees made by the Holy See for religious are made known to their subjects and carried into practice. For this purpose n. 1 of the following paragraph insists that at least once a year, on stated days, the Constitution be publicly read together with those decrees which the Holy See shall prescribe to be read.

This is a timely injunction, in concordance with Malachy 2, 7: "For the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth; because he is the angel [messenger] of the Lord of hosts." Knowledge presupposes study of the law, and especially of canon law, whilst putting into effect supposes knowledge and authority, or at least good will. The decrees referred to as more particularly touching religious, are those of the Holy Office concerning matters of faith,—all of which, as explained under can. 501, § 2, pertain to that Congregation;[79] the decree about the manifestation of conscience;[80] the decree on the litterae testimoniales before receiving novices,[81] etc. This rule was made by the S. Congregation of Religious, which enjoined seven decrees to be read publicly.[82] However, since these decrees are at least substantially embodied in the Code we 79 S. O., May 15, 1901.

80 "Quemadmodum," Dec. 17, 1890.

81 S. C. super Statu Regul., "Romani Pontificis," Jan. 25, 1848.

82 The S. C. Rel., July 3, 1910, mentions, besides those two: "Singulari quidem," March 27, 1896; "Perpensis," May 3, 1902; "Sacra Tridentina," Dec. 30, 1905; "Praeter ea," Sept. 1, 1909; "Ecclesia Christi," Sept. 7, 1909; "Sanctissimum," Jan. 4, 1910.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

believe we are correct in stressing the future tense of n. 1, § 2. Hence, unless the reading of these old decrees is especially prescribed by the Constitutions, they need no longer be read publicly. But any decree which the Holy See shall in future order to be read, must be read publicly. It would, however, be in keeping with the spirit of our canon if the section of the Code dealing with religious would be frequently read in religious communities.

No. 2 of § 2 speaks of catechetical instruction to be given at least twice a month, in a manner adapted to their capacity, to the laybrothers or sisters and dependents (familiares) of every religious community, and in lay institutes a pious exhortation to all members of the family. The novices (see can. 565, § 2) should receive more frequent instruction. Observe that the canon does not insist on such conferences for clerical institutes, the reason evidently being that they are supposed to have been instructed before and trained in the principles of the spiritual life, and to live in a higher atmosphere. Too many conferences may easily become a burden to the conferencier as well as to the hearers. The legislator wisely tells the lecturer not to speak above the heads of the hearers. Some practical subjects are mentioned in a decree of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars, viz.: mental prayer, choir service, examination of conscience, frequent confession, silence, chapter of faults, reading at table and from Holy Scripture, pastoral conferences, regular discipline, acquisition of solid virtues, and other spiritual exercises.[83]

[83] Aug. 22, 1814 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 44 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DUTY OF REPORTING TO THE HOLY SEE

CAN. 510

Abbas Primas, Superior Congregationis monasticae et cuiusvis religionis iuris pontificii Moderator supremus debet quinto quoque anno vel saepius, si ita ferant constitutiones, relationem de statu religionis ad Sanctam Sedem per documentum mittere, subsignatum a se cum suo Consilio et, si agatur de Congregatione mulierum, etiam ab Ordinario loci in quo suprema Antistita cum suo Consilio residet.

The abbot primate, the superior of every monastic congregation, and the superior general of every pontifical institute must send every five years, or if the Constitution prescribes it, oftener, a written report on the status of his community to the Holy See. This report must be signed by the respective superior and his counsellors; and when the congregation is one of women, also by the Ordinary in whose diocese the general superioress with her counsel resides. This law, in its general form, is new, for the 1906 decree of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars touched only religious with simple vows.[84] This same decree has appended an "Instruction," which contains ninety-three questions to be answered, somewhat like a questionnaire for exemption claimants. This instruction, however, cannot be simply extended to all religious, and it might be reasonably shortened. It contains a preamble and three parts: on persons, things (especially property), and discipline, on which a report was to be made every three years. Hence the insertion into our Code of the phrase: "or oftener," if the 84 July 16, 1906 (Annal. Eccl., 1906, t. XIV, p. 340 ff.); English text in Appendix to this volume.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Constitutions so determine. The Code says, "per documentum mittere," to send a written statement, probably in order to preclude the pretext of taking a trip to the Eternal City. What was formerly demanded only of religious congregations, is now enjoined on all religious without distinction, except diocesan institutes, which are responsible only to the Ordinaries.

VISITATION

CAN. 511

Maiores religionum Superiores quos ad hoc munus constitutiones designant, temporibus in eisdem definitis, omnes domos sibi subiectas visitent per se, vel per alios, si fuerint legitime impediti.

CAN. 512

§ 1. Ordinarius loci per se vel per alium quinto quoque anno visitare debet:

1.° Singula monialium monasteria quae sibi vel Sedi Apostolicae immediate subiecta sunt;

2.° Singulas domos sive virorum sive mulierum Congregationis iuris dioecesani.

§ 2. Visitare quoque eodem tempore debet:

1.° Monasteria monialium, quae regularibus subduntur, circa ea quae ad clausurae legem spectant; imo etiam circa alia omnia, si Superior regularis ea a quinque annis non visitaverit;

2.° Singulas domos Congregationis clericalis iuris pontificii etiam exemptae, in iis quae pertinent ad ecclesiam, sacrarium, oratorium publicum, sedem ad sacramentum poenitentiae;

3.° Singulus domos Congregationis laicalis iuris pontificii non solum in iis, de quibus in superiore

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

numero, sed etiam in aliis, quae internam disciplinam spectant, ad normam tamen can. 618, § 2, n. 2.

§ 3. Quod ad bonorum administrationem attinet, serventur praescripta can. 532–535.

CAN. 513

§ 1. Visitator ius et officium habet interrogandi religiosos quos oportere iudicaverit et cognoscendi de iis quae ad visitationem spectant; omnes autem religiosi obligatione tenentur respondendi secundum veritatem, nec Superioribus fas est quoquo modo eos ab hac obligatione avertere aut visitationis scopum aliter impedire.

§ 2. A decretis Visitatoris recursus datur in devolutivo tantum, nisi Visitator ordine iudiciario processerit.

These three canons establish, first and above all, the duty of the religious superiors as to visitation, secondly, the part assigned by law to the Ordinary concerning the same business, and, lastly, the rights and duties implied by visitation.

The fourth Lateran Council (1215) ordained that at the general chapters visitors should be appointed, who should be sent out in the name of the Holy See and correct whatever needed correction.[85] The Council of Vienne (1311–1313) ruled that visitation should be made every year by the Ordinaries or others of the monasteries of nuns and opportune remedies employed against abuses which seem to have crept in.[86] The Council of Trent repeated the aforesaid canons and enjoined frequent visitation upon all superiors, especially the heads of orders, who should also visit the monasteries called com-

[85] C. 7, X, III, 35.

[86] C. 2, Clem. III, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mendae.[87] All these laws prove the importance of canonical visitation.

Can. 511 provides that the higher superiors of religious orders as well as congregations, whom the constitutions entrust with the office of visitors, should, at times stated in the constitutions, visit all the houses subject to them. If they are lawfully prevented from performing that office personally, they may send others in their stead. It is evident that here regular or ordinary visitors are intended, because they perform that task in virtue of their office. Besides these, there may be extraordinary visitors and visitations for certain special causes, which are made known to the visitors, or perhaps to the Apostolic See, which may send a visitor under the circumstances. Hence surprise visitations are possible.[88] As a rule, however, visitations are to be made at stated times, the determination of which is left to each institute.

The extent of the visit is indicated by the phrase all houses, in as far, namely, as they are subject to the superiors. For it may be that some houses are exempt from visitation, or at least from visitation by a certain superior. All such conditions should be determined by the rule and constitutions.

The Code permits the regularly appointed visitator, in case of a lawful impediment, to send a substitute, according to the well-known rule of Canon Law, "What one may do himself, he may do through another."[89] Note, however, that the delegate must follow the instructions of the delegans, and should the latter die before the delegate has begun his visitations, the delegation 87 Sess. 25, cc. 1, 8, 20, de reg.

88 The visit of the late Abbot-Primate of the Benedictines to America, in 1910–1911, was not a canonical visitation, nor had he been sent by the Holy See to our country for that purpose.

89 Reg. Iuris in 6°, 68, 72.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would cease unless it was given by the Constitutions. A visitation is supposed to have commenced after the reading of the letter of delegation to those who are to be visited.[90] For the rest, the delegate, unless something is especially excepted, enjoys the same power and has the same duties as the one who delegated him, as shall be seen in can. 513.

Under can. 512, § 1, the Ordinary of the diocese must, either himself or by delegate, every five years visit every convent of nuns in his diocese subject either to himself or immediately to the Holy See; also the houses of male and female diocesan congregations. The law gives full sway to the Ordinary over two kinds of institutes: Nuns with solemn vows, whose convents are subject either to the Ordinary himself or immediately to the Holy See, and diocesan congregations of both sexes. Concerning both no exception is made as to persons, places or things to be visited; and hence, as shall be seen in the following canon, they are subject to visitation in all respects. The only difference between the two kinds of religious, so far as episcopal visitation is concerned, lies in the fact that the convents of nuns with solemn vows are visited by the Ordinary as a delegate — de iure — of the Holy See, and the houses of diocesan congregations by the Ordinary in his own capacity. The effect is the same.

According to § 2 the bishop may also visit:

(1) The convents of nuns with solemn vows, which are subject to a regular superior, concerning the enclosure and everything else, if the regular superior has not made a canonical visitation for five years; for in this case the Ordinary is called upon to supply the negligence of the superior. As to the enclosure, the Ordinary is entitled to examine the communion-crate and the confes-

90 Piatus M., I, 638 (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sional-crate, the inner and outer walls of the enclosure, the interior choir, the dormitories, cells and other rooms under enclosure. The Ordinary should wear his rochette and mantellette, be accompanied by two priests, and proceed without the assistance of any religious. If the Ordinary visits a convent because of the neglect of the regular superior, he is entitled to ask any nun personally, inquire about the observance of the enclosure and the number of religious, alumnae, and servants, and require a statement of the temporal and financial affairs.[91]

(2) He may also visit the houses of clerical papal congregations, including those that enjoy exemption, but only in what pertains to the church, sacristy,[92] public oratory, and confessional. There may be doubt concerning the phrase: sedem ad sacramentum poenitentiae — the seat for sacramental confession. Is the singular number instead of the plural (sedes) purposely made use of? Benedict XIV, in "Firmandis," speaks only of one confessional, namely, that reserved to the parish priest.[93] But this interpretation appears to us too formal. Probably the term "seat" is here to be taken as a synecdoche or metaphor expressing all the confessionals. For the rest we refer to what we have said under canon 344.

(3) The Ordinary should also visit the houses of the lay institutes with papal approbation, not only concerning the places mentioned under n. 2, but also concerning other matters which belong to the internal discipline, with due regard to can. 618, § 2, n. 2.

As to the administration of temporal affairs, especially property, the Ordinary must observe the rules enacted in can. 532–535, which make a distinction between con-

91 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 8, 1725 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 319 f.).

92 The Latin reads sacrarium; but is certainly not to be understood of the waste place for sacred things, but of the sacristy proper.

93 Nov. 6, 1744, § 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vents of nuns and monasteries of regulars, houses of papal institutes and of diocesan congregations. Note, however, that the bishop or Ordinary has no right to make any change in any point of discipline which is in accord with the constitutions approved by the Holy See, or the approbation of which is pending.

Can. 513 determines the rights and duties of the canonical visitator, which, according to § 1, are to ask any religious who he thinks should be asked, and to take cognizance of everything pertaining to a canonical visitation. On the other hand all religious are obliged to answer truthfully, and the superiors are not allowed to prevent them from fulfilling this obligation, or otherwise to impede the visitation. The questions which the visitor should chiefly ask, according to approved authors,[94] are the following:

(a) About the regular discipline, observance of vows, rules and constitutions, life in common and spiritual exercises in the choir and elsewhere, fast and abstinence, fraternal charity;

(b) Concerning the duties to be performed by the superiors and officials, teachers and employers towards their subjects and inferiors, about conferences and chapters of faults, schools and instruction, reading of the decrees prescribed, observance of laws and customary rubrics;

(c) Regarding temporal affairs, especially Mass obligations, founded and manual, property and debts, method of bookkeeping, alienation, etc.

The Code furthermore says that the visitator should take cognizance of everything pertaining to visitation. Though not explicitly stated in the Code, a distinction lies between visitators endowed with jurisdiction proper, 94 Cfr. Piatus M., I, 639 ff. (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

such as Ordinairies and regular prelates, or exempt visitors, and visitators endowed with domestic power (potestas dominativa) only. The former may inflict censures, whereas the latter may not, but may deal out such penalties only as the constitutions permit; and these, since they are given for non-exempt religious, cannot include ecclesiastical censures. This distinction becomes important in the way of procedure, which may be either paternal (also called evangelical) [95] and judiciary or canonical, as is evident from § 2.

A visitator should proceed paternally and use the canonical remedies only in extraordinary cases, as, e. g., when a religious has committed a crime that calls for juridical procedure. But procedure supposes a plaintiff and witnesses, or at least a strong opinion against the accused religious, and therefore the beginning of a trial, as shall be explained in the fourth book.

The next question arises as to the obligation of answering truthfully the questions of the visitator. This supposes, first and above all, that the visitator has been admitted. If he acts in an official capacity and is lawfully appointed, admission cannot be refused to him by the religious. The members of the community must answer his questions, each according to the dictates of his conscience, with a view to the common welfare. But what if the visitator should demand of a religious that he reveal the secret misdeeds of other religious? Is the one thus asked bound to obey? Our answer is negative, for the office of visitator is limited to the public welfare of the community, and, therefore, as long as transgressions are secret, the transgressor has a right to his good name also before the visitator.[96] Should a crime have been com-

[95] Math. 18, 15; cf. Suarez, De Rel., tr. X, l. 10, c. 8, n. 9 (Vol. 16, 1101 f.).

[96] Suarez, l. c., maintains the affirmative opinion, but this must be called entirely peculiar to the So-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mitted, which is liable to become notorious to the detriment and diffamation of the whole community, the revelation of that crime would be required by the common welfare. But transgressions which have been committed long ago, or have been remedied, or are known only by hearsay, or to the visitator only as an entrusted secret, are not to be manifested, even though the visitator should demand it.

The last clause of § 1 admonishes superiors not to deter their subjects from doing their duty at the time of visitation, and not to impede the latter. The text is plain enough. Superiors should not send religious away at the time of the visitation, or force them by threats to keep silence.

§ 2 of can. 513 says that no appeal in suspensivo from the decrees of the visitator is permissible, unless he has proceeded in a judiciary way. Reference is made to the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," of March 30, 1742, which rules that no inhibition, or what is here called recourse, may be had from decrees concerning divine worship and its due observance according to the sacred liturgy nor from decrees concerning the care of souls, the repair of churches, the administration of the sacraments in churches, the spiritual and temporal government of convents of nuns.[97] Therefore the decrees and corrections enjoined by the visitator must by all means be carried into effect. Should they prove irksome, or, what is worse, should they contradict the Constitutions and lawful customs of the congregation, recourse may be had to the S. C. of Religious. Sisters of papal congregations may appeal from the decrees of the Orciety of Jesus; his quotations from sacred writers are to be taken for what they are worth. The natural law is above individual pious sentiments.

97 Bull., Prati, 1845, t. I, p. 164, nn. 6, 10, 19, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dinary to the metropolitan or the Apostolic Delegate.

We add that the visitator, unless he foresees judiciary procedure, should not take anyone with him, either as secretary or counsellor, as the paternal way requires secrecy.[98]

PASTORAL DUTIES AND RIGHTS

CAN. 514

§ 1. In omni religione clericali ius et officium Superioribus est per se vel per alium aegrotis professis, novitiis, aliisve in religiosa domo diu noctuque degentibus causa famulatus aut educationis aut hospitii aut infirmae valetudinis, Eucharisticum Viaticum et extremam unctionem ministrandi.

§ 2. In monialium domo idem ius et officium habet ordinarius confessarius vel qui eius vices gerit.

§ 3. In alia religione laicali hoc ius et officium spectat ad parochum loci vel ad cappellanum quem Ordinarius parocho suffecerit ad normam can. 464, § 2.

§ 4. In funeribus servetur praescriptum can. 1221, 1230, § 5.

§ 1 says verbaily — the text is too important to brook paraphrastic translation —: "In every clerical institute the superiors have the right and duty to administer, either themselves or through another, the Eucharistic Viaticum and Extreme Unction to the sick professed members and novices and to others who dwell day and night in the religious house, either by reason of service, or education, or hospitality (hospitii) or sickness." This is a reasonable and welcome extension of the privileges granted to some orders[99] in favor of their dependents.

98 Piatus M., I, 643 (ed. 2).

99 For instance, to the Barnabites; S. C. EE. et RR., July 21, 1848 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 563 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(1) All clerical institutes (i. e., orders or congregations), no matter whether exempt or non-exempt, whether of papal or diocesan institution, enjoy the right and have the duty of taking spiritual care of their sick members. This care devolves first and above all upon the superior, and, in case he is impeded, upon any one commissioned by him. Note that only clerical institutes are here intended, that is to say, orders and congregations whose members are mostly priests, or should be mostly priests by virtue of their constitutions, though, perhaps, in consequence of extraordinary conditions, for instance an epidemic, war, etc., the number of lay brothers is greater than that of priests.

(2) The sick members enumerated are of a twofold class: religious and others. The term religious comprises the novices, concerning whom no difficulty was ever raised. But the term aliive was not always understood in the same sense. These others, then, must dwell by day and by night in the religious house. By "day and by night" may signify habitual or protracted dwelling, or one day of twenty-four hours; however, "diu" (from dies) generally has the meaning of a protracted stay, i. e., lasting more than one day, although we believe that in case of sickness the principle that "favors should be widely interpreted" may be applied here. The next term, "religious house," is doubtless to be taken as the entire premises or precincts which belong to a religious house, for it seems to stand for the well-known canonical expression "intra septa[1] monasterii," i. e., within the walls or hedges of the monastery. Hence even a number or group of buildings may be understood as constituting "a religious house," so long as religious actually

1 Septa is used by Cicero to designate the inclosure within which the Roman people voted in the assemblies (comitia).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

possess and inhabit the buildings. Thus a hospital, hostelry, school, house for hired hands, workshops, etc., if they form part and parcel of a religious house, though distinct from it, may truly be said to be religious houses. However, these buildings must be within the precincts of the dwelling of the religious, else they would not fall under the category of religious houses, which are houses inhabited by religious. Therefore a distant farm house or villa, or a college or school entirely separated from the religious house and attended perhaps by only one religious, cannot be said to share the privileges of religious houses.

Religious houses, then, may shelter servants, students, guests or sick people. The first class, servants — causa famulatus — are those who work for the religious and live within the precincts of the monastery under the habitual (though not religious) obedience of the superiors.[2] Hence they must have board and lodging in the religious house, or at least in a building on the premises of the religious house, though they may truly be called hired hands. But if they have their lodging outside the religious house they may not be called servants. Another class who falls under the category of familiares or dependents is that of boarding students, who, together with their education, also receive board and lodging from the clerical institute. But day-scholars are excluded. The next category is that of guests, who live in the religious house habitually. Hence if a religious house would keep boarders, say, for instance, young Catholic men or students who work in shops or study at school, these would be living in a religious house.[3] Thus, also, if a pilgrims' house would be attached to a religious house, the

2 S. C. EE. et RR., July 21, 1848 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 564 ff.).

3 Ibid.; the case is identical with the one in the text.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

guests would belong to the latter. We furthermore believe that also single guests who have come to visit some of their religious relatives or friends, and live in the religious house or guests' department (foresteria) at least for one full day, may be beneficiaries of our canon. The last class is that of sick persons who are cared for by the religious in their own house, no matter whether they are related to the religious or not. Of course, this would be all the more so if the religious should manage a hospital on their own premises. Workingmen employed by the monastery, who would not otherwise enjoy the privilege, if nursed in their sickness in a clerical religious house, would also be included.

(3) The sacraments to be administered are the Sacred Viaticum and Extreme Unction. These appertain to strictly parochial rights.[4] Confession and communion, the administration of which is not exclusively the pastor's right, needed no mention. This paragraph marks a decided but benevolent change from former restrictions.[5]

Can. 514, § 2 vindicates the same rights and duties to the confessor of nuns with solemn vows and his locum tenens. Therefore, should any of the foregoing classes of persons live in a monastery of nuns, the confessor or his representative may administer the last sacraments to him. Female servants, alumnae (the socalled educande[6] in Italian monasteries), female guests — the male sex is excluded in virtue of the inclosure,— and sick persons would have to be attended by the confessor, not by the parish priest in whose parish the convent is situated.[7]

4 Can. 462, 3.

5 Pius IX, "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, II, 14.

6 A number of decisions in the Regesta S. C. EE. et RR. treat of these.

7 S. C. EE. et RR., May, 1788 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 348); two sisters were collecting for nuns but maintained by the same as their quasi-servants.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Note, however, that this is a privilege granted only to nuns with solemn vows.

§ 3 of the same canon says: in every other lay institute the same right and duty is incumbent on the pastor or the chaplain appointed by the Ordinary under can. 464, § 2.

Hence, in all lay institutes of religious, male or female,[8] the religious themselves as well as their servants, students, guests, and sick persons in their care, must by right be attended by the pastor in whose parish the institute is located. For, unless papal exemption can be proved, the parish priest is the pastor of such non-clerical and non-exempt religious. A difficulty might arise in our country from the fact of linguistic parish divisions. Where English and Italian or German speaking parishes overlap, who is the pastor? This depends, first and above all, upon the will of the founder or foundress, which should, if possible, be respected. Secondly, custom must be consulted, and, lastly, if these two factors are not sufficient to settle the question, the Ordinary should decide, so as to satisfy the needs of the community as well as the claim of the pastor.

However, as stated above, the Ordinary may, for just and weighty reasons, exempt any religious community from the jurisdiction of the pastor and subject it to its own chaplain. In that case the spiritual rights and duties mentioned in § 1, viz., concerning the administration of the last sacraments, belong to the chaplain and the pastor may not interfere. Of course, prudence and justice require that the Ordinary notify the pastor of such quasi-exemption, in order to avoid unnecessary trouble.

8 The Salesian sisters employed in education had asked for exemption, but the S. C. EE. et RR., April 19, 1844 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 497), answered: not expedient.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Notice the beginning of the text: lay religious. After mentioning clerical orders and nuns with solemn vows, the legislator proceeds to lay religious, where there are no distinctions made as to exemption. This affects the Christian Brothers as well as the Brothers Hospitallers of St. John of God; for both are lay institutes. However the bishop may — and certainly the institutes named deserve that attention — give them their own chaplain.

§ 4 of canon 514 determines the sepulture of religious, which is fully treated under can. 1221 and can. 1230, § 5, but may here be briefly described as follows: The bodies of professed members and novices are to be carried into the church or chapel of the religious house, unless novices have chosen another church for their funeral; the right of accompanying the corpse to the church of burial belongs to the religious superior. Should any member die outside the religious house and so far away from it that the corpse could not easily be transported to the church of the religious, he shall be buried from the parish church where he died; but novices may choose any church they wish.

Servants, as described above, have the same privileges in regard to sepulture as novices, and may therefore be buried from the chapel of the religious or any other church they may select.

Sisters and novices of sisterhoods who die in the religious house should be carried by the Sisters to the threshold of the enclosure, and thence, if they are exempt from the pastor's jurisdiction, to the church of the religious house, where the chaplain shall perform the funeral rites. If they are not exempt from the pastor's jurisdiction, the pastor must conduct the funeral services from the entrance of the enclosure to the church and chapel, where he shall hold the exequies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

HONORARY TITLES DENIED TO RELIGIOUS

CAN. 515

Prohibentur tituli dignitatum vel officiorum mere honorifici; soli, si id permittant constitutiones, tolerantur tituli officiorum maiorum, quibus religiosi in propria religione reapse functi sint.

Ambition is the root of many evils in the Church and a vice more contemptible in a religious than in any other person. Therefore our canon quite naturally forbids religious to accept any honorary titles of dignities and offices. However, if the Constitutions permit, they may retain the title of higher offices which they once held in their own institute. This precludes the assumption of the title of Monsignore by any religious. The privilege of pontificating does not entitle one to bear the name of titular abbot if the dignity of abbot was never really held by the claimant. As to the Franciscans Pius X decided that only ex-ministers and ex-procurators general are allowed to keep that title in the whole order, and the ex-provincials in their province, together with precedence and active and passive voice at the general or provincial chapter, respectively, but not at the meetings of the "definitores."[9]

COUNSELLORS AND PROCURATORS

CAN. 516

§ 1. Supremus religionis aut monasticae Congregationis Moderator, Superior provincialis et localis saltem formatae domus habeant suos consiliarios, quorum

[9] "Quo magis," Oct. 23, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 560 f., n. VIII); such titles were sought for by hook and crook to share in the chapters and elections; S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 8, 1718 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 305 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

consensum aut consilium exquirant ad normam constitionum et sacrorum canonum.

§ 2. Sint etiam pro administratione bonorum temporalium oeconomi: generalis qui religionis universae bona administret, provincialis qui provinciae, localis qui singularum domorum; qui omnes suo fungantur munere sub directione Superioris.

§ 3. Oeconomi generalis et provincialis munus gerere Superior ipse non potest; munus vero oeconomi localis, quamvis melius a munere Superioris distinguatur, componi tamen cum eo potest, si necessitas id exigat.

§ 4. Si de modo oeconomos eligendi constitutiones sileant, a Superiore maiore cum consensu sui Consilii eligantur.

§ 1 of can. 516 prescribes that the superior general of religious, and the president of a monastic congregation, the provincial and local superior of a canonically established house (domus formata), should have counsellors, whose consent or advice they should ask according to their constitutions and the prescriptions of the sacred canons. This was the wise counsel given by St. Benedict to abbots, and later entered as a law into the Decretals.[10]

A decree of 1909 made it imperative for all superiors to have counsellors, especially in financial matters.[11] This decree has partly been embodied in our Code, which, however, is not very explicit about the number or mode of electing the counsellors, although Cardinal Gasparri refers to that decree, which determines the number of counsellors as well as the manner of electing them. The counsellors should be at least four in number in com-

10 Reg. S. Ben., c. 3; lib. III, tit. 10, de his quae fiunt a praelato sine consensu capituli.

11 Cfr. A. Ap. S., I, 696 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

munities with twelve or more chapter members, and two in such as have a smaller number of capitulars. All of them should be elected by the chapter for three years. They give their vote by secret ballot, whenever a decisive (not a merely consultive) vote is required. Thus, according to the same decree, the local superior would be bound by their vote in making debts or assuming obligations to the amount of less than $200, the provincial in cases amounting to less than $1000. However, since the Code directly mentions the constitutions as a norm for establishing the necessity of obtaining the consent of the counsellors, these must also be looked to for guidance regarding the affairs and amounts for which such consent is required. But one thing is certain: counsellors there must be, and they should be chosen by the chapter, not by the superior alone; otherwise it would be illusory to require the vote of counsellors, who are supposed to represent the chapter, or convent, or province. For if the superior were allowed to choose three, and the chapter one, the superior would be able always to have his own way. And this is neither the intention of the law-giver nor the purpose of counsellors.

The most important affairs which demand the consent (not merely advice) of the counsellors, according to our Code, are:

(a) The appointment of an administrator or procurator (oeconomus) (Can. 516, § 4);

(b) The alienation of property (Can. 534, § 1);

(c) Admission to the novitiate or simple profession (Can. 575, § 2);

(d) The dismissal of a professed member (Can. 547, § 1; Can. 650, § 1).

§ 2 of can. 516 requires an oeconomus or administrator of temporal affairs (procurator) — one for the whole

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

institute, one for the province, and one for each single house; all to perform their duties under the direction of the respective superiors.[12]

§ 3 says that the superior himself may not be general or provincial administrator at the same time, but that the offices of local superior and local administrator are compatible, if it is necessary to combine them.

§ 4 says that if the constitutions do not determine the mode of appointing the administrator, the latter must be chosen by the higher superior with the consent of the counsellors. The Council of Trent had ruled that the administration of the property of religious should be in the hands of officials who could be removed at will by the superior. However, if the administrator is chosen with the consent of the counsellors, it is, to say the least, becoming that they should also be consulted about that official's removal. Only a few Benedictine congregations appoint an administrator for the whole congregation, but a local procurator is chosen from among the community, according to the Holy Rule (can. 31), generally by the abbot, without whose command he may do nothing. Hence, though the constitutions be silent about the mode of appointing the procurator, the rule of the O. S. B. vindicates that right to the abbot; but the Code requires the coöperation, i. e., consent of the counsellors, and this ruling must be followed.

THE PROCURATOR GENERAL

CAN. 517

§ 1. Quaevis virorum religio iuris pontificii procuratorem generalem habeat, qui, secundum constitutio-

12 Note that the procurator is not a superior, and hence subject to minor superiors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nes designatus, negotia propriae religionis apud Sanctam Sedem pertractet.

§ 2. Antequam praescriptum in constitutionibus tempus exspiret, ne amoveatur, inconsulta Sede Apostolica.

Every papal congregation of men must have a procurator general, who is to be designated according to the constitutions, and must transact all business between the congregation and the Holy See.

The procurator general may not be removed from his office without the consent of the Holy See before his term determined in the constitutions has expired.

The S. Congregation of Bishops and Regulars by a decree approved by Pius VII, Aug. 22, 1814, ordained that all religious institutes which were not at all or inadequately represented in the Papal States, should have a procurator general residing in Rome.[13] Most of the older and more centralized orders had such an official for centuries. As to the Benedictines, single congregations, e. g., the Cassinese, the English, and that of Subiaco, maintained relations with Rome by means of a procurator general, and the right of each congregation to have its own procurator in Rome was not taken away when the abbot primate was created.[14] 13 "Ubi primum," Bizzarri, l. c., p. 42 f.

14 Leo XIII, "Summum semper," July 12, 1893, I.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

CONFESSORS AND CHAPLAINS

CONFESSORS OF CLERICAL INSTITUTES

CAN. 518

§ 1. In singulis religionis clericalis domibus deputentur plures pro sodalium numero confessarii legitime approbati, cum potestate, si agatur de religione exempta, absolvendi etiam a casibus in religione reservatis.

§ 2. Superiores religiosi, potestatem audiendi confessiones habentes, possunt, servatis de iure servandis, confessiones audire subditorum, qui ab illis sponte sua ac motu proprio id petant, at sine gravi causa id per modum habitus ne agant.

§ 3. Caveant Superiores ne quem subditum aut ipsi per se aut per alium vi, metu, importunis suasionibus aliave ratione inducant ut peccata apud se confiteatur.

These three paragraphs treat of the appointment of confessors and of the faculties of superiors in houses of religious institutes of clerics.

§ 1 provides that in each house a number of confessors proportionate to the number of inmates should be appointed, duly approved, and endowed with the faculty of absolving from cases reserved in the religious order concerning exempt religious. Here appointment means nothing else but the designating of one as confessor. This is generally done after an examination, or at least a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verification of the fitness of the person to be appointed. Approval signifies the grant of jurisdiction or faculty to hear confessions validly and licitly. This is an act of public jurisdiction (in foro externo), for although the faculty of hearing confessions belongs to the court of conscience, yet the granting of that faculty is a result of jurisdiction proper. Therefore approval can be given only by one who enjoys jurisdiction. Concerning clerical exempt religious orders, the superiors of the same are empowered to grant delegated jurisdiction or approval, not only to priests of their own order, but also to priests of the secular clergy or of another order. The superior of an exempt lay congregation may present a confessor to the Ordinary in whose diocese the house is located in order to obtain from him the necessary jurisdiction.[1] Hence in the former case the religious superior of exempt clerical religious grants, in the name of the Sovereign Pontiff, yet in virtue of his ordinary power, the delegated jurisdiction to those whom he deems fit, whereas in exempt lay congregations the jurisdiction is given by the Ordinary.

The number of confessors to be appointed should be in proportion to the number of religious whose confessions are to be heard. Clement VIII speaks of two, or three, or more, according to the number of religious.[2] The opinion of some authors, that to each confessor should be assigned a certain number of religious, so that they would be bound to confess to that one exclusively, is intolerable.[3]

The members who may confess to the confessors approved by the superior of clerical exempt religious are

1 Can. 875.

2 "Sanctissimus," May 26, 1593, § 3.

3 Justly rejected by Piatus M., I, 402 (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

those mentioned under can. 514, § 1, viz.: the religious, the novices, the servants, the students, the guests, and sick persons, provided the conditions set forth in said can. 514, § 1 are verified.[4]

The superiors who may grant delegated jurisdiction, or the faculty of hearing the confession of these members, are the higher superiors who enjoy jurisdiction in foro externo; therefore, the superior general of an exempt order, the provincial, and, in the case of monastic bodies, the abbot of each independent monastery.[5] Concerning conventual priors and guardians some authors doubted their jurisdiction or power of granting faculties, but the majority were on the affirmative side, and justly so; for the Constitution of Pius V, "Romani Pontificis," expressly mentions the conventual priors as endowed with the same faculties as the Ordinaries with regard to absolution and dispensation.

Concerning female religious and novices of orders as well as of congregations, no matter whether they be otherwise subject to a regular prelate, the faculty of hearing their confessions is given by the Ordinary alone in whose diocese their house is located.[6]

Finally a word about reserved cases from which the confessors duly approved either by the religious superior or by the Ordinary may absolve. Clement VIII had permitted religious superiors, with the consent of their counsellors, to reserve certain cases, eleven in number.[7] Our Code[8] grants the same power to the superiors gen-

4 See can. 875.

5 The Abbot Primate and Abbots Presidents are not empowered to give faculties either for the order or for their respective congregation; neither may cloistral priors, except by subdelegation, grant such faculties, because this power is from the Pope and may therefore be subdelegated.

6 Can. 876.

7 "Sanctissimus," May 26, 1593, § 3.

8 Can. 896.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eral and abbots with their counsellors' consent, with due regard to certain restrictions, as seen in can. 519. However, after having granted that power, the Code restricts the number of reserved cases to four. Therefore it seems evident that the legislator wishes to limit the eleven cases to not more than four, and these of the "most grievous and atrocious crimes of public character."[9] Consequently we hold that the religious superiors are now-a-days no longer entitled to reserve more and other cases than determined by the Code. An obligation of reserving cases has never been enjoined, neither is it stated in the Code, which, moreover, plainly says that any duly approved confessor can absolve from them without being bound to refer the case to the superior.

§ 2 states that religious superiors who have power to hear confessions, may, if asked by them spontaneously and of their own accord, hear the confessions of their subjects, but should do so only for grave reasons and not habitually; besides, they must observe the laws and regulations prescribed (servatis de iure servandis). But they should beware lest they, either themselves or by means of others, endeavor to induce any of their subjects to confess to them. This law, already insisted upon by Clement VIII,[10] the Code emphasizes anew.

What is meant by "servatis de iure servandis"? Nothing else but the observance of the rules laid down in the Code concerning the administration of penance,[11] because the superiors, too, are bound to the seal of confession and may make no use of what they know from confession for the government of their subjects in whatever shape or form.

9 Can. 897.

10 Clem. VIII, "Sanctissimus," § 2; S. O., July 5, 1899.

11 Can. 885 ff.; can. 908 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE

CAN. 519

Firmis constitutionibus quae confessionem statis temporibus praecipiunt vel suadent apud determinatos confessarios peragendam, si religiosus, etiam exemptus, ad suae conscientiae quietem, confessarium adeat ab Ordinario loci approbatum, etsi inter designatos non recensitum, confessio revocato quolibet contrario privilegio, valida et licita est; et confessarius potest religiosum absolvere etiam a peccatis et censuris in religione reservatis.

This canon embodies a decree, first issued for Rome, and then extended to all religious,[12] which aroused the religious zeal or anger of some superiors who endeavored to move Pius X to withdraw it.[13] And yet it stands, and now appears in the Code. It says: "Without detriment to the constitutions which prescribe or advise confession to be made at stated times to appointed confessors, a religious, even an exempt one, may, to quiet his conscience, go to confession to a confessor approved by the Ordinary of the diocese, though this confessor be not one of those appointed for religious, and the confession thus made is valid and licit, every privilege to the contrary being hereby revoked; besides, said confessor (though not of the appointed ones) can absolve such a religious also from all sins and censures reserved in his order." This decree did away with restrictions — of very doubtful efficacy — concerning the obligation of confessing to a traveling companion or that of confess-12 Aug. 5, 1913; May 3, 1914; S. C. EE. et RR., July 4, 1862 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 155).

13 We were in Rome at that time and could give the name of a certain superior who approached the Pope.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing to appointed confessors only. On the other hand, it leaves the regular discipline about usual confessors and confessions untouched. That part of the constitutions which regulates this point is still in force, unless they run counter to the present canon, in which case they are void. The number of times which the religious may choose to go to another than the appointed confessor is not determined. His conduct is conditioned simply and solely by the state of his conscience,— a purely subjective matter with which the religious superior has no right to interfere. Hence a religious may choose another confessor whenever and as often as he thinks it wholesome for his conscience. Religious are now treated like other Catholics and this so-called privilege is done away with — to the relief of consciences and to the avoidance of torture and other worse consequences.

But what about the cases reserved in the order or congregation to which the disturbed religious belongs? The Code does not prohibit such reservation,[14] as stated above; but the confessor chosen may absolve from reserved cases without any scruple or obligation to report to the religious superior, which report is always connected with the danger of breaking the seal of confession.

CONFESSORS OF SISTERS

The following canons treat of the confessor-in-ordinary of Sisters, of extraordinary confessors, of provisions in particular cases, of the qualities, appointment, duration of office of confessors and their removal from office. It may be safely said that these canons embody former Apostolic constitutions, and especially that most excellent one of Benedict XIV, "Pastoralis curae," of 14 Supposing, however, that their number does not exceed four.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Aug. 5, 1748, and it is to be hoped that these wise laws will finally be carried into effect by every prelate everywhere.

THE ORDINARY CONFESSOR

CAN. 520

§ 1. Singulis religiosarum domibus unus dumtaxat detur confessarius ordinarius, qui sacramentales confessiones universae communitatis excipiat, nisi propter magnum ipsarum numerum vel aliam iustam causam sit opus altero vel pluribus.

§ 2. Si qua religiosa, ad animi sui quietem, et ad maiorem in via Dei progressum, aliquem specialem confessarium vel moderatorem spiritualem postulet, eum facile Ordinarius concedat; qui tamen invigilet ne ex hac concessione abusus irrepant; quod si irrepserint, eos caute et prudenter eliminet, salva conscientiae libertate.

§ 1 of this canon says that only one confessor-in-ordinary should be appointed for each house of nuns (and Sisters). He shall hear the confessions of the whole community, unless because of too great a number or for another just cause it is necessary to employ several confessors. The reason for appointing but one confessor lies in the unity and uniformity of regular discipline and spiritual guidance for religious women. It is exactly the same reason for which only one pastor is appointed for each parish. However, the number of persons to be heard, or other reasons may make it advisable to appoint one or more additional confessors, which the canon promptly grants. Thus, e. g., the S. Congregation of the Council permitted the canons regular of Rimini to assign a vice-confessor in cases of absence or sickness of the ordinary confessor of nuns.[15] Note here and throughout the following canons, that no distinction is made between nuns and Sisters; for the approbation depends in all cases entirely upon the Ordinary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If any Sister, in order to quiet her conscience or to progress more rapidly on the path of holiness, should demand a special confessor or spiritual director, the Ordinary should readily grant the request, but at the same time see to it that no abuses arise, and if such should spring up, he shall root them out cautiously and prudently, duly safeguarding liberty of conscience. The first clause of this paragraph is almost verbally taken from the above-quoted Constitution of Benedict XIV, who justly reproaches some religious superiors for acting too severely towards Sisters. The Pontiff at the same time lays down the prudent rule that the qualities of the Sister as well as those of the confessor demanded should be carefully examined, and if no reason for suspecting either is to be discovered, the request may safely be granted. Abuses would be a disturbance of the regular discipline, extravagant expenses, a bad example, etc. But a little inconvenience to the superiors or the portress or the cook could not be styled an abuse.

CAN. 521

§ 1. Unicuique religiosarum communitati detur confessarius extraordinarius qui quater saltem in anno ad domum religiosam accedat et cui omnes religiosae se sistere debent, saltem benedictionem recepturae.

§ 2. Ordinarii locorum, in quibus religiosarum communitates exsistunt, aliquot sacerdotes pro singulis domibus designent, ad quos pro sacramento poeniten-

15 Richter, Trid., sess. 25, c. 10, de reg., p. 412 f.; this confessor, of course, needed also the approbation of the bishop.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tiae in casibus particularibus recurrere eae facile possint, quin necessarium sit ipsum Ordinarium toties quoties adire.

§ 3. Si qua religiosa aliquem ex iis confessariis expetat, nulli Antistitae liceat nec per se nec per alios, neque directe neque indirecte, petitionis rationem inquirere, petitioni verbis aut factis refragari, aut quavis ratione ostendere se id aegre ferre.

This canon grants an extraordinary confessor to every religious community at least four times a year.[16] To him all the Sisters must present themselves, at least to receive his blessing if they do not wish to confess. This confessor, of course, like the ordinary one, must be approved by the Ordinary of the diocese, although he may have been presented by the regular superior. The Sisters are not obliged to confess to the extraordinary confessor if they do not wish; but they must present themselves in order to receive his blessing. This is also done for a special purpose, viz., that they may not accuse either the Ordinary or the superior of neglecting their duty with regard to offering an opportunity for quieting their conscience.

But the lawgiver goes still further in § 2, calling upon the Ordinary in whose diocese communities of Sisters exist, to designate for each house several priests on whom the Sisters may call for confession in particular cases.

The decree of Feb. 3, 1913, from which our text is taken, says that these confessors should be designated for each house.[17] Now it may be asked whether confessors appointed, for instance, for the Sacred Heart Convent, may validly hear confessions in the Precious 16 Trid., sess. 25, c. 10, says three times a year.

17 A. Ap. S., V, p. 63, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Blood Convent. That this question is not quite superfluous appears from a query put to the S. C. Concilii, thus: Whether the regular confessors who had been appointed and approved for hearing confessions of nuns of one monastery or for one time may be considered approved for hearing confessions of all monasteries and forever? The answer[18] was, "Negative." However, we must pay attention to the term designent used in our canon. Hence the solution must be: If the Ordinary has granted general faculties[19] for hearing confessions of nuns or Sisters, and has not made a special condition or inserted a restrictive clause, the confessors appointed for the Sacred Heart Convent may validly hear confessions in the Precious Blood Convent, and vice versa. As to licitness, the answer depends partly on the will of the Ordinary, and partly on custom.

If a religious, says § 3, demands one of the aforesaid confessors, the superioress is not permitted, either directly or indirectly, either personally or through others, to inquire for the reason of the demand, or to refuse the petition either in word or deed, or to show herself displeased in any way. Neither the counsellors, nor the mistress of novices, nor any other official or third person is entitled to interfere in matters of conscience, either directly by demanding reasons for the petition, or indirectly by asking what the Sister may have done, where she was, who has spoken to her, who was in the parlor, etc., even by way of a joke. Nor may the superiors deny the petition by an evasive or downright refusal, or by sending her on an errand, or giving her work that would prevent the fulfilment of her wish. Neither should they shrug

18 S. C. C., June 7, 1755 (Richter, Trid., p. 413).

19 This should be expressed in terms like these: etiam ad monialium, or better: etiam ad omnium religiosarum confessiones audiendas.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google their shoulders or use uncharitable words, or "make a face" at the petitioner, or let her feel it afterwards, or ridicule or criticise her.

CAN. 522

Si, non obstante praescripto can. 520, 521, aliqua religiosa, ad suae conscientiae tranquillitatem, confessarium adeat ab Ordinario loci pro mulieribus approbatum, confessio in qualibet ecclesia vel oratorio etiam semi-publico peracta, valida et licita est, revocato quolibet contrario privilegio; neque Antistita id prohiberc potest aut de ea re inquirere, ne indirecte quidem; et religiosae nihil Antistitae referre tenentur.

If notwithstanding the concessions made in can. 520 and 521, a Sister, to quiet her conscience, goes to a confessor approved by the Ordinary for hearing confessions of women, the confession thus made in any church or public or semi-public oratory is valid and licit, every privilege to the contrary being hereby revoked; neither is the superioress allowed to hinder such a one or make inquiries about the matter, even indirectly, nor are the Sisters obliged to report to the superioress.

The Roman congregations [20] had made allowance for secularized religious and for Sisters who because of their health or for other motives are compelled to confess outside the religious house. Such Sisters could go to confession to any priest who was approved for hearing confessions of both sexes (pro utroque sexu), although he had not been specially approved for hearing Sisters' confessions (pro monialibus). This decision was received into the decree of Feb. 3, 1913, which adopted the phrase "pro utroque sexu." Our Code has another reading, 20 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 22, 1852 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 129).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

viz., "pro mulieribus approbatum." In some countries, Belgium, France, and our own State of Louisiana, if we are not mistaken, the Ordinaries give special faculties for hearing women's confessions.[21] However, in most of our provinces there is no distinction made as to secular or lay persons concerning sex, but the formula generally reads: "ad audiendas fidelium confessiones." Hence wherever the clause "pro mulieribus approbatum" is not in use, any confessor approved for hearing the confessions of the faithful of both sexes has the faculty of hearing the confessions of Sisters who come to a church or public or semi-public oratory.

Attention may be drawn to the term religiosae, nuns or Sisters. It stands to reason that a strictly cloistered nun is not allowed to leave the enclosure to go to confession. This is clearly expressed in the decree of 1913, which reads: "If it should happen that any nun or Sister would, for any reason, be outside her own religious house." Therefore a strictly cloistered nun could leave the convent only for such reasons as permit a departure from the conventual "clausura." The admonition to the superioress is plain enough in the light of what has been said in the preceding canon.

CAN. 523

Religiosae omnes, cum graviter aegrotant, licet mortis periculum absit, quemlibet sacerdotem ad mulierum confessiones excipiendas approbatum, etsi non destinatum religiosis, arcessere possunt eique, perdurante gravi infirmitate, quoties voluerint, confiteri, nec Antistita potest eas sive directe sive indirecte prohibere.

21 Cfr. Innoc. XIII, "Apostolici ministerii," May 23, 1723; Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Morale, 1893, Vol. V, p. 286 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Any Sister who is seriously ill, though not in danger of death, may call any priest approved for hearing the confessions of women, though not especially appointed for Sisters, and confess to him as often as she desires during the duration of her illness, and the superioress may not forbid it, either directly or indirectly. This is a concession for all Sisters, whether cloistered or not, and is more extensive even than that granted by Benedict XIV, because he added that the sick Sister must be in danger of death. Concerning the distinction of approbation for women and for Sisters nothing else need be added except that the Ordinary is bound to explain or emphasize that distinction.

QUALITIES OF CONFESSORS

CAN. 524

§ 1. In munus confessarii religiosarum et ordinarii et extraordinarii deputentur sacerdotes, sive e clero saeculari, sive religiosi de Superiorum licentia, morum integritate ac prudentia praestantes; sint insuper annos nati quadraginta, nisi iusta causa, iudicio Ordinarii, aliud exigat, nullam potestatem in easdem religiosas in foro externo habentes.

§ 2. Confessarius ordinarius non potest renuntiari extraordinarius nec, praeter casus in can. 526 recensitos, rursus deputari ordinarius in eadem communitate, nisi post annum ab expleto munere; extraordinarius vero immediate ut ordinarius renuntiari potest.

§ 3. Confessarii religiosarum tum ordinarii tum extraordinarii interno vel externo communitatis regimini nullo modo sese immisceant.

As confessors-in-ordinary and confessors extraordinary the bishop should appoint priests either of the secu-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lar or regular clergy (the latter with the permission of their superiors) who are known for probity of life and prudence. They should be forty years of age unless in the Ordinary's judgment a just reason requires a departure from this rule. These confessors have no jurisdiction in foro externo over the religious. Benedict XIV required for both ordinary and extraordinary confessors [22] certain qualities which are now modified somewhat. Thus the Code makes no distinction between priests of the secular and the regular clergy. Mature age is required, unless circumstances such as a want of priests justify a suspension of that rule, in which case the lack of age must be supplied by good moral standing and prudence, which even age does not always guarantee. These confessors are warned to exercise no power or jurisdiction in foro externo, for instance, by censuring the religious or settling affairs or reserving cases which require an ecclesiastical trial.[23] Neither may they dispense in cases in which the pastors are empowered to dispense,[24] for this power, though given by law and belonging to the extra-judiciary court, requires jurisdiction in foro externo. This warning is or was opportune in convents of nuns subject to the regulars, who may have thought that their prelate, whom they represented, was endowed with such jurisdiction proper.

The ordinary confessor of a Sisters' community may not be appointed extraordinary confessor except a year after his term as ordinary confessor has expired; nor may the ordinary confessor be re-appointed for the same community until a year has elapsed (exceptions noted in 22 "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743, § 24; "Pastoralis curae," "Quamvis iusto," April 30, 1749, § 14.

23 Can. 893, § 1.

24 Can. 1245, § 1: dispensation from servile work, fast and abstinence; of course the confessors may declare in single cases of single penitents that the law of fast, etc., does not bind.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can. 526) ; but the extraordinary confessor may be immediately installed as confessor-in-ordinary.

The confessors of Sisters, ordinary as well as extraordinary, shall in no way meddle in the internal or external government of the community. This canon should deter confessors from playing the " factotum " of the Sisters. The internal regimen means religious discipline, authority of the superiors, election of superiors and officials, order of the day and employment of Sisters in the various branches, schools, hospitals, etc. The external government comprises the relation of the Sisters to the Ordinary, the visitator, and the parish priest, their congregational business, administration of property, etc. All these things do not concern the confessor, who, however, if asked, is allowed to give advice.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFESSORS

CAN. 525

Si religiosarum domus Sedi Apostolicae immediate subiecta sit vel Ordinario loci, hic eligit sacerdotes a confessionibus tum ordinarios tum extraordinarios; si Superiori regulari, hic confessarios Ordinario praesentat, cuius est eosdem pro audiendis illarum monialium confessionibus approbare et Superioris negligentiam, si opus sit, supplere.

The Ordinary of the diocese appoints confessors-in-ordinary as well as extraordinary for such Sisters' houses as are either immediately subject to the Apostolic See or to the Ordinary himself. If the house is subject to a regular prelate, the latter presents the confessors to the Ordinary of the diocese, who grants the usual approbation (faculties) for hearing the confessions of the nuns, and also, if necessary, supplies the superior's negligence.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It is not necessary to explain this canon, because of nuns subject to a regular prelate there can scarcely be question among us. However, if there should be such houses, the negligence here mentioned must be that of granting an extraordinary confessor or of refusing to comply with can. 520, §2, and can. 521, 522, 523.

Benedict XIV mentions a special case, which, however, falls under the rubric, "quieting of conscience," viz., if a Sister should have a strong and almost invincible aversion against a regularly appointed confessor. In such cases, he says, the Ordinary may supply a confessor, and even allow the nun to have recourse to the S. Poenitentiaria.[25]

DURATION OF THE CONFESSOR'S OFFICE

CAN. 526

Religiosarum confessarius ordinarius suum munus ne exerceat ultra triennium; Ordinarius tamen eum ad secundum, imo etiam ad tertium triennium confirmare potest, si vel ob sacerdotum ad hoc officium idoneorum penuriam aliter providere nequeat, vel maior religiosarum pars, earum quoque quae in aliis negotiis ius non habent ferendi suffragium, in eiusdem confessarii confirmationem, per secreta suffragia, convenerit; dissentientibus tamen, si velint, aliter providendum est.

The rule is that no confessor of Sisters (nuns) shall hold this office for more than three years. However, the Ordinary may leave him in office for three and even six years longer, if (a) no other priest fit for the place is available, or (b) if the majority of the religious votes, by secret ballot, for the confirmation in office of the confessor; in which scrutiny also such religious may cast a 25 "Pastoralis curae," (Bull., II, p. 401 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vote who would otherwise be excluded from voting. However, for those who vote against ratification provision should be made, if they demand it.

The limit, therefore, is nine years, beyond which term the Ordinary has no right to stretch the period of office. The regular term is three years, and only in two instances may this be protracted.

Concerning fitness, can. 524, § 1 must be consulted; it implies maturity of age, probity of life, and prudence.

But what is the Ordinary to do if a pastor is confessor of a religious house located in the country? If he does not wish to change the pastor after nine years, he has to appoint the neighboring priest as confessor, at least for one year, after which, according to can. 524, § 2, the pastor may again become confessor for another nine years.

What is said above concerning the majority of votes is to be understood of the absolute majority. Those who are entitled to vote are all the professed Sisters, though perhaps only in temporary vows, who would otherwise be prevented from voting, for instance, in business matters or at the election of a superior.[26]

How to provide for those who are opposed to the reinstatement of the confessor is, of course, a rather delicate matter. They must manifest their desire of having another confessor to the Ordinary, who shall send another priest, for a time at least, until the feeling of animosity has subsided.

REMOVAL OF CONFESSORS

CAN. 527

Loci Ordinarius, ad normam can. 880, potest, gravem ob causam, religiosarum confessarium tam

26 Cfr. Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 116; Normae, n. 217 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ordinarium quam extraordinarium amovere, etiamsi monasterium regularibus subdatur et ipse sacerdos a confessionibus sit regularis, nec tenetur causam amotionis cuiquam significare, excepta Apostolica Sede, si ab ea requiratur; de amotione autem debet Superiorem regularem monere, si moniales regularibus subdantur.

This canon is modelled upon can. 454, § 5, and must be combined with can. 880. The Ordinary of the diocese may, for weighty reason, remove a Sisters' confessor, ordinary or extraordinary, even though the convent be subject to regulars and the confessor be one of the regulars. The bishop is not bound to state the reason for removal to any one except the Apostolic See, upon demand; but he must inform the regular superior to whom the nuns are subject.

Though the canon, as it sounds, is new law, yet the bishop could formerly remove a confessor of nuns subject to regulars if the latter's superior had been notified and failed to comply with the bishop's demand.[27] Even now the bishop is not entitled to remove a confessor except for grave reasons which touch the office, and, besides, he may not remove all confessors of the same religious house at one time because such a removal would be not only senseless, but injurious to the spiritual welfare of the nuns[28] and to the moral character of the priests involved.

27 Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 1622, § 5, and the decisions of S. C. C., ad calcem, ibid.

28 Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 6; S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 20, 1615 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 21: "ex nova causa eaque ad confessiones ipsas pertinente").

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONFESSORS OF LAY INSTITUTES OF MEN

CAN. 528

Etiam in laicalibus virorum religionibus deputetur, ad normam can. 874, § 1, 875, § 2, confessarius ordinarius et extraordinarius; et si religiosus aliquem specialem confessarium expostulet, illum Superior concedat, nullo modo petitionis rationem inquirens neque id aegre se ferre demonstrans.

Also in lay institutes of men an ordinary and an extraordinary confessor must be appointed, according to can. 874, § 1, where the Ordinary is enjoined to give a confessor either from the secular or religious clergy, and the religious must have the permission of his superior for being confessor; and according to can. 875, § 2, where it is said that in exempt lay institutes the superior may propose the confessor to be approved by the Ordinary. If any member wishes to have a special confessor, the superior must grant the petition and is not allowed to ask for a reason or to show displeasure.

CHAPLAINS

CAN. 529

Si agatur de religionibus laicalibus non exemptis, Ordinarii loci est sacerdotem a sacris designare et a concionibus probare; si de exemptis, Superior regularis eosdem sacerdotes designat eiusque negligentiam supplet Ordinarius.

In non-exempt lay institutes the Ordinary of the diocese appoints a priest for saying Mass and preaching; in exempt lay institutes the regular superior designates these priests, or, in case of the superior's negligence, the Ordinary of the diocese.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The functions of a chaplain, therefore, consist in holding divine service and preaching;[29] beyond that he is only allowed to perform sacred functions for which the Ordinary grants special powers, or in as far as the religious are exempt from parish organization.

Chaplains, too, should abstain from meddling in the internal and external régime of the communities to which they are assigned.

MANIFESTATION OF CONSCIENCE

CAN. 530

§ 1. Omnes religiosi Superiores districte vetantur personas sibi subditas quoquo modo inducere ad conscientiae manifestationem sibi peragendam.

§ 2. Non tamen prohibentur subditi quominus libere ac ultro aperire animum suum Superioribus valeant; imo expedit ut ipsi filiali cum fiducia Superiores adeant, eis, si sint sacerdotes, dubia quoque et anxietates suae conscientiae exponentes.

All religious superiors are strictly forbidden to induce their subjects by any means whatever to manifest their conscience to them. But the subjects may of their own accord open their mind to their superiors: nay it is even expedient for religious to approach their superiors with confidence, and if they are priests, to reveal to them doubts and anxieties of conscience.

Note that all superiors, not only those of nuns,[30] are affected by this general prohibition. Voluntary manifestation of conscience is not forbidden, but rather recommended.

29 See can. 1338, § 3.

30 "Quemadmodum," Dec. 17, 1890, was chiefly intended for superiors of Sisters.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

TEMPORAL POSSESSIONS AND THEIR ADMINISTRATION

CAN. 531

Non modo religio, sed etiam provincia et domus sunt capaces acquirendi et possidendi bona temporalia cum reditibus stabilibus seu fundatis, nisi earum capacitas in regulis et constitutionibus excludatur aut coarctetur.

Can. 531 establishes nothing else but the well-known and ancient truth that there are religious who are capable of owning property and others who are not. Not only the institute as such, it says, but each province and house are capable of acquiring and possessing temporal goods together with a stable income or funds, unless their rule or constitutions exclude or restrict this right.

This right of single ecclesiastical corporations to own property is an inherent right not only of the whole Church,[1] but of each society and corporation which forms part and parcel of the Church. Blackstone says[2] the third absolute right inherent in every Englishman is that of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land.

The origin of private property is probably founded in

1 Cfr. can. 1495.

2 Blackstone-Cooley, Commentaries, Chicago, 1879, I, 137; II, 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nature. By an easy transposition we may say that, since each institute, or province, or community consists of single persons — though they are not all Englishmen — endowed with that inherent right, it follows that the community as such also possesses the same. But it is also true that this right is controlled by the laws of a higher authority, which, so far as religious corporations are concerned, is that of the Apostolic See. We do not mean that the Apostolic See is the real owner of all corporative religious property. This would be incompatible with the true notion of property right.[3] The immediate and proper subject of property is the community itself, whether it be regarded as a legal fiction (viz., the single members as one juridical or artificial person) or simply as a group of physical persons acting under special rules as far as representation is concerned, and governed by special rules as regards succession.[4] For it legally matters but little which theory is adopted either before the ecclesiastical or the civil courts. But essential to any corporation, in general, are two elements: a group of members and corporate rights vested in them as a corporation, asserted and applied by lawful representatives, be they trustees, managers, or directors. To these a third essential element must be added, as far as positive laws are concerned, namely, the sanction of legitimate authority. Though it is perfectly true that corporations were originally created by the mere act and voluntary association of their members,[5] and are therefore natural products of human and ecclesiastical society, yet the Church as well as the State is entitled to interpose its authority. The Church must give its ap-

3 Exception, of course, is to be made concerning orders (mendicant) incapable of possessing property.

4 Cfr. New International Encycl., 1904, V, 438.

5 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., I, 472.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

probation. But the State is also concerned, since all temporal property is located within its territory and falls within its sphere. The U. S. does not recognize any ecclesiastical corporations as such, though it does acknowledge them as private civil corporations subject to the laws of each State. Therefore it is important that religious communities, at least those which, according to ecclesiastical law, are capable of holding property, should be chartered, because the charter grants them legal existence, fixes their right of making by-laws, and, in a word, endows them with an official character, which the courts must acknowledge.[6]

This last observation gives rise to a question, viz., Is it in accordance with the "public policy" of any of our States to grant or acknowledge a charter to religious societies?

As stated above, the U. S. does not create or acknowledge any ecclesiastical corporation as such. Hence a purely religious society, for instance, for perpetual adoration need hardly apply to the State legislature for a charter. However, if an educational or charitable purpose is involved, the State will readily grant corporate rights. Thus, e. g., a charter was issued by the New Jersey legislature, on March 5, 1868, to St. Mary's Abbey, Newark.[7] Thus also the Shakers and Oneida Communities received a charter from State legislatures. St. Mary's Abbey was acknowledged as "a society of religious men living in a community and devoted to charitable works and the education of youth."[8] 6 Cfr. K. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 81 ff., a splendid contribution to the science of laws as prevailing in our country with regard to ecclesiastical institutions.

7 Cfr. Brief in behalf of Plaintiff in Error, Supreme Court, Oct. term, 1913, n. 267.

8 Ibid., p. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Certainly such an institution cannot be said to be against public policy. By public policy is meant that principle of the law which holds that no subject can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good, and which may be termed the "policy of law" or "public policy in relation to the administration of law." Whatever is contrary, or alleged to be so, must be determined from the constitution and laws and judicial decisions of each State. No religious society approved by the Church can embody a fact or principle which an honest man has to condemn, but all contain some things which all men ought to approve. All distinctly inculcate the duty of honest industry, contentment with a competency, and charity to the poor and suffering.[9] We may safely apply to any Catholic corporation or religious body what has been said of the Shakers' Community: So long as piety is recognized by common assent, and by the legislature, as a valuable constituent in the character of our citizens, the general law must foster and encourage what tends to promote it. In legal estimation, it must be viewed as what is not only estimable in itself, but as an appurtenance to the character of individual citizens, of great value to society, for its tendency to promote the general weal of the whole community.[10]

However, it is sometimes objected that by the vow of poverty one surrenders the inherent and natural right to acquire and hold property in his own name — a surrender to which our Constitution is apparently opposed.[11] We answer: If by surrendering his right to personal property a professed member of a religious community

9 Ibid., p. 45; p. 47; p. 55.
10 Ibid., p. 55.
11 This was the plaintiff's plea in the case of St. Mary's Abbey vs. the heirs of Fr. Augustine Wirth, O.S.B.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would also surrender his right to a decent support and existence, it might be granted that there is something immoral in the vow of poverty. However, this is not and has never been the case. The very definition given by canonists should disperse any misgivings as to absolute surrender. They say that the vows are a bilateral contract between the individual member and the religious community, in virtue of which the former promises to devote his life and work and possessions to the community, in lieu of which the latter has to support him in health and sickness unto death. We might as well call marriage an immoral contract because it involves the surrender of the body.[12] A court in Maine said concerning the community of the Shakers that a contract with another to serve him for ten years, for an acceptable compensation, can not be proved to be illegal. This leads us to another aspect of the question. A religious community consists of various members, some of whom take the vows forever, while others take them only for a determined time, after which they may step out. No absolute surrender can be construed in the case of the last-mentioned class. Even those who have taken perpetual vows may be "secularized" with the cooperation of ecclesiastical authority. It is precisely for this reason that religious corporations have adopted by-laws governing cases of secession, by which they provide for the welfare of the community and its continuance and prevent seceding members from claiming compensation for services performed during their membership.

A last remark may conclude this section. How can a corporation endowed with property rights arise out of members who have given up their rights? Or, if all the members have vowed poverty, how may the community

[12] I Cor. 7, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

possess property? The apparent paradox disappears if it is remembered that those who enter the religious state, although they surrender the right of possessing personal property, do not waive that of possessing property in common, as members of such or such a community, so far as the higher authority permits. To this authority, viz., the Sovereign Pontiff, it belongs to decide whether or not property rights are attached to an ecclesiastical corporation. As to the vow, it requires no more than that personal claims be given up. Besides, let it again be emphasized, no religious can surrender the claim to decent support, for such an act would amount to suicide. Lastly, there are members, even in religious orders with solemn vows, who retain the right of holding property, for instance, the clerics with simple vows and lay brothers. Nor must it be overlooked that the Church may grant to a society property rights which are denied to the individual members. And this precisely is the distinction, alleged in our canon, between orders capable of property rights and such as are incapable of possessing — at least a certain kind of — property. However, even the so-called Mendicant Orders enjoy a certain right to property. The name Mendicant is applied to those religious orders which, by virtue of their original or primitive rule, observe poverty not only individually, but also as communities or convents, and are satisfied with alms humbly begged, or donations freely given, or things acquired by the labor and industry of the members.[13] But with the exception of the brown Franciscans and the Capuchins the Council of Trent decreed that even Mendicant Orders should possess land.[14] Concerning the two orders mentioned it is generally understood that the immovable property in their charge (convents, churches, 13 Reiffenstuel, III, 31, n. 27. 14 Sess. 25, c. 3, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

etc.) is held by the Apostolic See [15] as immediate proprietor, whilst the members and actual occupants have the usufruct of the same. Neither of these two orders is capable of receiving legacies, if the sum itself is to be delivered to them, but they may obtain and use the interest of legacies paid annually by the heirs.[16]

CAN. 532

§ 1. Bona tum religionis, tum provinciae domusque, administrentur ad normam constitutionum.

§ 2. Expensas et actus iuridicos ordinariae administrationis valide, praeter Superiores, faciunt, intra fines sui muneris, officiales quoque, qui in constitutionibus ad hoc designantur.

This canon provides that the property of a religious order or congregation, as well as that of the different provinces and houses, should be administered according to the rules laid down by the respective constitutions, which are supposed to agree with the common law, or, at least, to be approved by the Apostolic See.

§ 2 says that expenses and juridical acts of ordinary administration may be validly made or performed by the superiors within the limits of their office, and by the different officials appointed under the constitutions. Civil law requires that the names of the officials of corporate societies be registered at the State treasury. This requirement must be complied with also by ecclesiastical corporations if they are acknowledged as private civil corporations, otherwise their officials may not perform legal or juridical acts. For juridical acts are such as are harmonized with the law for the sake of legal validity.

15 Cfr. can. 582, 2°.

16 S. C. C., May 31, 1721; Oct. 3, 1731 (Richter, Trid., p. 396 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Thus acts of buying and selling are juridical acts if performed in conformity with the law. Acts of ordinary administration are such as occur frequently and are performed without special formalities, such as are required, e. g., if expenses are to be incurred that exceed the limits allowed by the Constitutions and the common law.

THE ORDINARY'S RIGHTS

CAN. 533

§ 1. Pro pecuniae quoque collocatione servetur praescriptum can. 532, § 1; sed praevium consensum Ordinarii loci obtinere tenentur:

1.° Antistita monialium et religionis iuris dioecesani pro cuiusvis pecuniae collocatione; imo, si monialium monasterium sit Superiori regulari subiectum, ipsius quoque consensus est necessarius;

2.° Antistita in Congregatione religiosa iuris pontificii, si pecunia dotem professarum constituat ad normam can. 549;

3.° Superior vel Antistita domus Congregationis religiosae, si qui fundi domui tributi legative sint ad Dei cultum beneficentiamve eo ipso loco impendendam;

4.° Religiosus quilibet, etsi Ordinis regularis alumnus, si pecunia data sit paroeciae vel missioni, aut religiosis intuitu paroeciae vel missionis.

§ 2. Haec item servanda sunt pro qualibet collocationis mutatione.

§ 1 refers, first and above all, to the investment of money, which must be made according to the constitutions with the previous consent of the Ordinary,

(1) As often as, and in whatever amount, the superioress of nuns (monialium), or of a diocesan institute, wishes to invest money. If the nuns are subject

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to a regular prelate, the superioress must also ask the consent of the prelate;

(2) The superioress of a papal congregation of religious must obtain the consent of the Ordinary in case she wishes to fix the dowry of a professed member in money, according to the rule laid down in can. 549;

(3) The superiors and superioresses of religious congregations need the consent of the Ordinary in case they wish to use for the house or school funds that were given or bequeathed for divine worship or benevolent purposes;

(4) Religious, including members of the regular orders, need the consent of the Ordinary for investing money which was given to the parish or mission, or to the religious himself for a parochial or missionary purpose.

The same rules must be observed if any change of investment is made.

This canon does not touch communities of men with solemn vows, but it embraces, in one way or the other, all other religious, even women with solemn vows, and individual regulars as far as they are connected with parish work. The reason for this difference lies in exemption. It may seem strange that the superiors of female congregations approved by the Holy See are not subject to the same regulation as superioresses of nuns of diocesan congregations regarding investment of money. Can. 510 solves the riddle, for it requires that the quinquennial report to be sent to the Holy See must first be submitted to the Ordinary in whose diocese the mother-house is, and who is therefore entitled to examine the financial state of such congregations in order to persuade himself as to the truthfulness of superiors, etc.

(1) First among the matters subject to the consent of the Ordinary we note investment of money (pro pecuniae collocatione). To invest [17] is to spend money in the purchase of property, especially for permanent use, or to put capital into other forms of property, for instance, government or other bonds, shares in stock companies, etc. But we do not call it investing when we put money into a bank, even though with the intention of obtaining interest; for money is generally put into banks in order to facilitate trading by checks and drafts, which is the common way in our country, though not yet so universal in Italy and elsewhere. Therefore the consent of the Ordinary is not required for banking money; the opposite opinion would lead to absurdities.[18] But any investment properly so-called, as defined above, needs consent. The amount is stated in the text, which simply says: for any money (cuiusvis pecuniae), little or much. The consent of the Ordinary need not be asked each time, but may be given for a certain sum, to be invested in various ways, or even for a certain time, nor is written consent prescribed, oral being sufficient.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(2) Episcopal consent is required if the superioress of any papal institute wishes to fix the dowry in money or cash. The reason for this ruling is to be sought in can. 549, which demands that the dowry be established "in safe, licit, and fruitbearing titles." Hence, if the dowry is to be demanded in cash, rather than in secure titles, the consent of the Ordinary must be asked.

(3) The superiors of religious congregations, whether of men or women, must obtain the consent of the Ordinary if they wish to use funds donated or bequeathed for purposes different from those for which they were 17 Cicero uses the expression, "collocare pecuniam in fundo," to invest money in landed property.

18 Neither is the daily buying and selling of cattle, products, implements, etc., properly called an investment.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

given. Thus, for instance, a pious lady may have given or bequeathed a certain sum for the chapel or church of a religious community, or another may have left a donation or legacy for an orphanage or home for the aged. Now although these religious may own the chapel or be in charge of the charitable work, the use of such funds for other purposes is not allowed except with the consent of the Ordinary, he being the guardian of all charitable institutes and places of worship.[19] However, if the funds are given to a religious congregation because of the charitable works it does, they may be freely administered and used by the superior without asking the bishop, who must only see to it that the money is used properly and according to the intentions of the donor.[20] Canonical visitation is the proper occasion for investigating, as also the examination of the quinquennial report.

(4) Any religious, even though a member of a regular order, must have the consent of the Ordinary if he wishes to invest church or mission money, viz., money received from pew-rent, receipts from seats, church collections, collections taken up at lectures in favor of the church, house collections and subscriptions. In this category also belongs money given to a religious for his mission or church, but not personal donations, or such donations as are given to a religious because he is a religious or a member of a certain community. Hence any investment of church money needs the consent of the Ordinary of the diocese in which the church or mission is located, not of the Ordinary in whose diocese the investment is to be made.

§ 2 prescribes that the Ordinary's consent must also be obtained — not only asked for — for a change of in-

19 Cf. can. 1493, 1513–1515; Leo XIII, "Conditae," II, 9.

20 Cf. Bastien-Lanslots, l. c., p. 146 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vestment. Thus if the money was invested in real estate and is to be re-invested in stocks or bonds, or conversely, episcopal consent must be obtained. If the money was loaned on interest, and is now to be invested in real estate, the consent is also required.

ALIENATION

CAN. 534

§ 1. Firmo praescripto can. 1531, si agatur de alienandis rebus pretiosis aliisve bonis quorum valor superet summam triginta millium francorum seu libellarum, vel de contrahendis debitis et obligationibus ultra indicatam summam, contractus vi caret, nisi beneplacitum apostolicum antecesserit; secus, requiritur et sufficit licentia, in scriptis data, Superioris ad normam constitutionum cum consensu sui Capituli seu Consilii per secreta suffragia manifestato; sed si agatur de monialibus aut sororibus iuris dioecesani, accedat necesse est consensus, in scriptis praestitus, Ordinarii loci, necnon Superioris regularis, si monialium monasterium eidem subiectum sit.

§ 2. In precibus pro obtinendo consensu ad contrahenda debita vel obligationes, exprimi debent alia debita vel obligationes, quibus ipsa persona moralis, religio vel provincia vel domus, ad eum diem gravatur; secus obtenta venia invalida est.

The first paragraph contains two main clauses, divided by the sum of alienation, and the second clause finds its demarcation line in the kind of religious. The whole paragraph treats of alienation of church or religious property. Alienation means any act by which property is either diminished or deteriorated, transferred or exchanged, as by sale, gift, renting, mortgaging of a specified

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

piece of property (hypotheca specialis), contract, lease or other transmission by mutual consent of the parties concerned.[21]

The reason for setting up laws against alienation is the conservative spirit of the Church, who naturally wishes to have property destined for religious purposes to remain in the possession of the ecclesiastical owner. A thousand years before Paul II issued the famous decretal "Ambitiosae" (1468), popes and synods enacted rules against unlawful and detrimental alienation. Leo I told the bishops that they were dispensers, not proprietors of church property, and therefore not allowed to donate, change or sell it, and that if anything was to be sold or exchanged, it must be done with the consent of the clergy.[22] The seventh general synod (II Nic., 787) forbade bishops and abbots to grant any church property to worldly princes or to persons under penalty of deposition.[23] This legislation continued until Paul II made the rather strict law against alienation,[24] which, however, was seldom carried out "beyond the mountains." Pius IX ("Apostolicae Sedis," 1869) renewed the laws against alienation and wished them to be enforced everywhere.[25] Our Code adopts these laws in a modified shape, so that they are now written and general laws, and ignorance can no longer be pretended.

In can. 534 the Code rules, first, that can. 1531 must be observed. That canon provides:

§ 1. No property may be alienated for less than it is appraised.

§ 2. Unless circumstances advise otherwise, alienation

21 Engel, III, 13, n. 13; Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, 287.

22 C. 52, C. 12, q. 2.

23 C. 19, ibid.

24 Cfr. tit. 13, X, III; tit. 9, 6°, III; tit. 4, Clem. III; c. un. Ambitiosae, Extrav. Comm., III, 4.

25 "Apostolicae Sedis," Oct. 12, 1869, IV, 3

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google must be made by public bidding, or at least by advertisement, and to the highest bidder.

§ 3. The money received by alienation must be invested cautiously, securely, and usefully for the benefit of the Church.

The quintessence of this canon is: business methods and safety. Auction or bidding are prescribed, as we learn from innumerable decisions, in order to prevent squandering of property or undue personal favoritism, or, what is worse, nepotism. But auctioning is not always advisable, especially if profane eyes and ears are to be kept away.

The Code goes on to say:

(1) An Apostolic indult is required for the alienation of precious things or other goods exceeding 30,000 francs or lire in value, as also for making debts over and above that sum. Any contract made before the Apostolic indult has been obtained is ecclesiastically invalid.

The Apostolic indult is a permission granted by the Congregation of Religious, to which application must be made.

(2) The matter alienated may be either precious things or property. By the name precious things are understood church vessels, vestments, treasures and books which have a special value, either by reason of antiquity or of artistic excellence.[26] "Other goods" (aliisve bonis) comprise especially immovable property, such as buildings and landed estates, but also[27] certain rights and revenues, e. g., a lease on coal-fields or mines, liabilities to certain burdens or duties, the right of fishing or hunting, rights of way, etc. Revenue would be State pensions, bonds, stocks, etc. If the value exceeds the 26 Engel, III, 13, n. 5; Reiffenstuel, III, 13, n. 12.

27 C. 1, Clem. III, 4; Reiffenstuel, III, 13, n. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sum of 30,000 francs or lire, the transaction requires an Apostolic indult. Selling of stocks and produce is no alienation.

(3) How much is 30,000 francs or lire in our money? In normal times, such as the Code doubtless has in view, it would be about 6,000 dollars. "And for that small sum we have to ask Rome?" This question was put to us more than once, and those who put it asserted that a lira or franc is practically equal to a dollar of our money, and hence the Code means $30,000. However, this reasoning is wrong. We know from experience that a dollar does not equal a franc, but that the average proportion would be about 1 : 2½, that is to say, one dollar would buy as much as two lire and a half in Italy or two francs and a half in France. Furthermore, it is well known that the bishops needed special faculties to alienate property exceeding $5,000.[28] Gradually, because of the decline in the value of money, the Holy See raised the sum from 10,000 francs to 30,000 francs, which it considers almost excessive. To fully convince the reader that the legislator intended the market value of Italian or French currency as the standard of valuation (i. e., about $6,000 in our money), we will state this case: A rescript arrives from Rome, which costs 8 lire, or about $1.60. Will the prelate remit $8 instead of $1.60? We believe, however, that now-a-days about $10,000 or $12,000 would correspond to the intention of the Code, because land as well as building material have risen so much in value that $6,000 are really but a small sum for religious institutes worthy of that name. On the other hand, it is a lamentable fact that religious houses often run into debt simply in order to outshine one [28] Conc. Balt., III, n. 20; Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 305.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google another. The Roman Court, as we know, could tell tales to that effect.

(4) The Code then applies the requisite of an Apostolic indult to the contracting of debts to the same amount. Here observe the difference between the new legislation as set forth in our Code and that of the S. Congregation of Religious, July 30, 1909, which required an Apostolic indult for any sum exceeding 10,000 lire, whilst our Code raises the sum to 30,000 lire or francs — the two being almost equal in market value before the war.

The next clause of can. 534, § 1, rules that if the sum does not exceed 30,000 lire or francs, the written permission of the superior, according to the respective constitutions, is required and sufficient, provided the consent or counsel (given by secret ballot) of the chapter was obtained. Cardinal Gasparri, in his notes, refers to the above-quoted instruction of the S. Congregation of Religious of 1909, which, therefore, may be said to be the will of the legislator, at least as a directive norm. No. I of the instruction referred to requires the consent of the chapter or counsel of either the religious house, or the province, or the congregation or order, according as the matter touches these entities respectively. But our Code leaves it to the constitutions, which must therefore be consulted. No. V of the instruction insists that every superior have counsellors elected by the free choice of the community; their number to be four if the community has more than twelve members, and two, if there are less than twelve. No. VI rules that the votes are to be given secretly and are decisive, and the permission granted by the superior in accordance with the decisive votes given by the counsellors, or the chapter, must always be given in writing. No. VII gravely enjoins religious superiors not to hide any income, debts, obligations, or donations of value from their counsellors. The sum below 30,000 lire, for which the consent of the counsellors or chapter is required, is not stated in the Code, except in so far as it refers to the Constitutions. But one thing is certain, namely, that under the new Code consent is required, not only advice, and therefore any transaction performed by the superior without the consent required by the Constitutions would be not only illicit, but invalid.[29]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The second part of the second clause treats of nuns and Sisters of a diocesan congregation who wish to alienate or contract debts below the sum of 30,000 francs. These, says the Code, must obtain the written consent of the Ordinary of the diocese, and if they are subject to a regular prelate, also the written consent of the latter. Hence these nuns and Sisters must first and above all obtain the consent of the chapter or counsellors, given by secret vote; secondly, the written consent of their ecclesiastical superiors, either of the Ordinary alone, if they are a diocesan institute, or of both the Ordinary and the regular prelate, if they are nuns with solemn vows. Why are the Sisters of a papal institute not obliged to obtain the consent of the Ordinary? Because their constitutions, which must necessarily contain a chapter on temporal administration, are approved by the Pope, who regulates that matter according to common law and the constitutions.

The petition submitted to obtain the papal consent for contracting debts or obligations must state all the debts and obligations of the corporation, institute, province or house up to the day of the petition. If no mention thereof is made, the rescript is invalid. What debts are

[29] Cfr. can. 105.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is evident. As to obligations, the term includes all financial or economical titles, bonds or deeds whereby the maker obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay a certain sum of money on an appointed day.[30] This may be done legally or informally, by a mortgage or note, by giving security or bail, conditionally or absolutely. Mass-obligations are not included because they are not financial obligations.

The Code requires that mention be made of all debts or obligations, no matter how large or small the sum — because no amount is specified — in the application for a papal indult, if required according to can. 534, § 1, that is to say, if the institute wishes to contract new debts or obligations exceeding the sum of 30,000 francs or lire. The statement must be truthful, because subreptitious mention might invalidate the rescript,[31] especially if a considerable sum were concealed.

To complete the law on alienation we may add that the Code has also fixed penalties[32] which increase with the sum unjustly alienated, the greatest of which is excommunication, not reserved to any one. A religious superior may be deprived of his office and rank if he alienates without the necessary consent a sum less than 30,000 francs. Furthermore any religious may appeal to the S. Congregation of Religious, or to the Ordinary, if his or her superior violates the laws laid down in canon 534, as the Decretals,[33] which are not corrected or repealed in our Code, clearly state.

It is, however, evident that papal consent is not required in cases of urgent need, as, for instance, to satisfy creditors demanding immediate payment through a court, 30 Blackstone-Cooley, II, 340; S. C. Rel., July 30, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 696).

31 Can. 42, § 1, cannot be applied here.

32 Can. 2347.

33 C. 6, X, III, 13; c. 2, 6°, III, 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google or in case of absolute necessity or charity admitting of no delay, or in case of evident utility where postponement would entail a serious loss.[34] But the law requiring the chapter's consent can never be set aside, for cases of such urgency are hardly imaginable.

RENDERING OF ACCOUNTS

CAN. 535

§ 1. In quolibet monialium monasterio etiam exempto:

1.° Administrationis ratio, gratis exigenda, reddatur semel in anno, aut etiam saepius si id in constitutionibus praescribatur, ab Antistita Ordinario loci, itemque Superiori regulari, si monasterium sit eidem subiectum;

2.° Si ratio administrationis Ordinario non probetur, ipse potest opportuna remedia adhibere, etiam removendo, si res postulet, oeconomam aliosque administratores; quod si monasterium sit Superiori regulari subiectum, eum Ordinarius, uti prospiciat, moneat; quod si ille neglexerit, ipse per se consulat.

§ 2. In aliis mulierum religionibus, ratio administrationis bonorum quae dotes constituunt, Ordinario loci reddatur occasione visitationis et etiam saepius, si Ordinarius id necessarium duxerit.

§ 3. Loci Ordinario ius insuper esto cognoscendi:

1.° De rationibus oeconomicis domus religiosae iuris dioecesani;

2.° De administratione fundorum legatorumque de quibus in can. 533, § 1, nn. 3, 4.

§ 1. For every monastery of nuns, even those who are exempt,

34 Bastien-Lanslots, l. c., p. 229.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° The superioress must furnish gratuitously once a year, or oftener if the constitutions so prescribe, an account of her administration to the Ordinary of the diocese, and to the regular superior if the monastery be subject to regulars.

2.° If the Ordinary does not approve of the account of the administration furnished him, he may apply the necessary remedies, including even the removal from office of the procuratrix and other administrators; but if the monastery is subject to a regular superior, the Ordinary shall request him to see to it; and if the regular superior fail to do so, the Ordinary himself must deal with the case.

§ 2. In other institutes of women, the account of the administration of the property constituted by the dowries must be furnished to the local Ordinary at the time of the canonical visitation, and even oftener if the Ordinary deems it necessary.

§ 3. The Ordinary of the diocese has also the right of enquiring into:

1.° The economic status of every religious house with diocesan approval;

2.° The administration of the funds and bequests made for divine worship or charitable work, as well as of all property belonging to the church or mission, although administered by regulars.

To this canon we will only add that it would be advisable for the bishop to appoint as auditor for that purpose a priest whose practical knowledge he could make use of at visitations.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

RESPONSIBILITY AND DONATIONS

CAN. 536

§ 1. Si persona moralis (sive religio, sive provincia, sive domus) debita et obligationes contraxerit etiam cum Superiorum licentia, ipsa tenetur de eisdem respondere.

§ 2. Si contraxerit regularis cum licentia Superiorum, respondere debet persona moralis, cuius Superior licentiam dedit; si religiosus votorum simplicium, ipse respondere debet, nisi de Superioris licentia negotium religionis gesserit.

§ 3. Si contraxerit religiosus sine ulla Superiorum licentia, ipsemet respondere debet, non autem religio vel provincia vel domus.

§ 4. Firmum tamen semper esto, contra eum, in cuius rem aliquid ex inito contractu versum est, semper posse actionem institui.

§ 5. Caveant Superiores religiosi ne debita contrahenda permittant, nisi certo constet ex consuetis reditibus posse debiti foenus solvi et intra tempus non nimis longum per legitimam amortizationem reddi summam capitalem.

CAN. 537

Largitiones ex bonis domus, provinciae, religionis non permittuntur, nisi ratione eleemosynae vel alia iusta de causa, de venia Superioris et ad normam constitutionum.

§ 1. If a corporation (whether an institute, a province, or a house) contracts debts and obligations, even with the permission of superiors, it is personally responsible for them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. When a regular, with the permission of his superiors, contracts debts and obligations, the corporation whose superior gave the permission, bears the responsibility; if it is a religious with simple vows, he himself is responsible, unless he acted with the permission of the superior, and on behalf of the institute.

§ 3. If a religious contracts debts and obligations without any permission of superiors, he himself is responsible, but not the institute, the province or the house.

§ 4. In every case, it is a rule that an action can always be brought against him for whom the contract has been a source of profit.

§ 5. Superiors must beware not to allow the contracting of debts unless it be certain that the interest on them may be met from current revenue, and that within a reasonable time the capital may be paid off by means of a lawful sinking-fund.

This canon is intended to protect religious institutes and to warn outsiders against unguarded dealing with religious who have not the proper authorization. It is evident that a corporation acting in its own name is responsible for its action, although the superior alone may have sanctioned it, for the quality of a juridical person is inherent in the corporation as such, not in the superior. A regular superior with solemn vows cannot form a corporation sole, unless he has obtained a special papal indult. Hence legal action must be instituted against the corporation as such.

§ 2 speaks of individual religious contracting debts. Here a distinction is made. A regular, or member of an order with solemn vows, is incapable of transacting business and therefore the corporation as such is liable for his acts. A religious with simple vows retains the right to acquire and own property, and consequently must be held personally responsible for all business transacted by him, unless he is the authorized representative of the community. This is also true of a religious with simple vows who, though belonging to an order with solemn vows (for instance, a lay brother or a cleric in temporary profession) contracts debts or obligations without being commissioned thereto by his superior.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3 is taken from the Decretals,[35] where there is a canon of the IVth Lateran Council which says that a convent should not be held responsible if a religious went security for another or borrowed money without the consent of chapter or superior, unless the transaction was favorable to the community. Lay persons may sometimes be deceived by a religious who pretends to act in the name of his community, but careful business men will always assure themselves of the official character of any religious they may have to deal with.

Notice that in this paragraph (3) no distinction is made between regulars and religious with simple vows; hence the text covers all.

Though the ancient ecclesiastical law seemingly excludes legal action against a religious institute, the Code says in § 4 that such action may be instituted for unfair dealing. Therefore a business man may sue a religious institute to recover money or goods acquired by a member who acted without authority. But the first subject to be dealt with would be the offending religious himself, and then only the community. The latter could be condemned to restitution or compensation if the enrichment was illegal. Attention must be drawn to can. 120 (privilegium fori), which requires the Ordinary's permission for citing religious before a civil court.

§ 5 warns religious against making debts which would

[35] C. 4, X, III, 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

weigh too heavily on the community. What the Code says of amortization or reduction and extinction of debts by means of a sinking-fund is certainly good advice. On the other hand, however, it is a well-founded saw that debts are a good thing for religious communities because they stimulate the members to untiring labor and prevent religious houses from becoming too rich.

Can. 537 prohibits the making of presents out of the goods of a religious house, province, or institute, unless by way of almsgiving or for other just reasons and with the consent of the superior and in conformity with the constitutions. The reason for this prohibition lies in the vow of poverty as well as in the desire of cutting off opportunities for feasts and banquets, as we read in a circular letter of the S. Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, of July 28, 1708.[36] The Code has taken as its standard the Constitution of Urban VIII, "Nuper," of Oct. 16, 1640, which mitigated the severe Constitution of Clement VIII, "Religiosae congregationes," of June 19, 1594. The latter had prohibited any gifts or donations by religious and obliged the receiver to make restitution. Urban VIII permitted presents in token of gratitude or for other religious motives, which turn to the benefit of the house, excluding, however, donations of any considerable amount by superiors as well as officials and individual religious in their own name, enjoining that all be done in the name of the monastery.[37] Urban VIII did not revoke that part of Clement VIII's Constitution which obliged to restitution the recipients of presents illegitimately made by religious.

Here it may not be amiss briefly to state the moral obligations of donors and recipients in case they have acted

[36] Bizzarri, l. c., p. 398.
[37] S. C. EE. et RR., Feb, 1791 (Bizzarri, ibid.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google against canons 536 f. Supposing the sum alienated or donated (e. g., to relations or friends) is over $10, which, according to Innocent XII ("Romanus Pontifex") was considered enough to reserve the case to the S. Penitentiary,[38] we may say:

a) A religious with solemn vows, being unable to own property, cannot make restitution in the proper sense. But he is obliged to tell the recipients that they must restore the value of the present, unless they are poor or unwilling to make restitution. If they are in good faith and it is not likely that an admonition would avail, the donor may omit this admonition and leave them in good faith. If the recipient is poor and needy, nothing is to be done.

b) A religious with simple vows, who retains the right of holding property, is obliged to make restitution out of his own means, supposing that he or she has property or may expect such in the future; and this obligation never ceases. Of course, if he can prevail upon the recipient to restore the goods given out of the religious property, this would be the simplest way out of the difficulty. It may be added that tips to waiters or porters, small gifts as tokens of gratitude, etc., do not oblige to restitution, and if made for a good reason, are not against poverty. Religious articles, such as medals, pictures, etc., may be given without fear of violating poverty. A religious when travelling is allowed to act like a gentleman towards those whose help or assistance or good will he needs. Finally, can. 537 allows donations to be made as alms or for any just reason, provided the superior consents.

[38] There is, of course, no longer any reservation, because common law makes no mention thereof. The religious (exempt) superior might reserve the case if there were an urgent reason for doing so. Besides, 10 scudi would now-a-days barely amount to $50.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This consent may be presumed in cases of urgency or necessity. Too rigid an insistence upon poverty when charity calls is against the very groundwork of religion. Religious are not to be stingy, but the saying of the Apostle was also intended for them: "It is a more blessed thing to give rather than to receive" (Acts 20, 35). Besides, every religious community has a social position to fill and a social duty to live up to. The ancient monasteries were fully aware of this great and noble task.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XI

ADMISSION TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTES

CAN. 538

In religionem admitti potest quilibet catholicus qui nullo legitimo detineatur impedimento rectaque intentione moveatur, et ad religionis onera ferenda sit idoneus.

Every Catholic who is not prevented by any legitimate impediment, and is inspired by a right intention, and fit to bear the burdens of the religious life, can be admitted to the same.

Four general conditions are here set up for entering the religious life:

(1) The aspirant must be a Catholic, for the Code does not legislate, at least not directly, for non-Catholics. Besides, since no religious institute can legally exist without the approval of the Church, and the Church in concrete terms is the Catholic Church, it is evident that the religious state is open only to such as acknowledge the legitimate authority of that Church. Finally, as a matter of experience, the religious state appears to prosper only within the pale of the Catholic Church.[39]

(2) The person who wishes to enter a religious institute must not suffer from any legitimate impediment (see [39] It is a well-known fact that some Anglicans endeavored to imitate the example of the Catholic Church, not at all to the detriment of the latter, as some communities returned corporatively to the Mother Church.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can. 542). The natural law precludes the assumption of the religious habit by a person who is mentally unsound.[40] As to bodily defects, it may be well to follow the instruction of Clement VIII (1603), which demands that the postulant be examined to ascertain whether he suffers from a considerable deformity, or shows sign of great bodily debility or stupidity (fatuitas). For such defects, though not disgraceful to the individual, may draw ridicule upon a religious community and the religious state in general.[41]

(3) A right intention is required because the end of the religious life is holy,— namely, Christian perfection, which demands full attention and a determined effort. A right intention is the glory of God and one's own salvation. Any other would be either sinful or dangerous. A wrong intention would be material interest, provision for life, honor and dignities.[42] It is not without reason, therefore, that canonists require a special vocation as a condition of admission to the religious state. On the other hand, St. Thomas is satisfied with a general call, which may also satisfy us. This general call, he says, consists in the invitation of Christ to follow the evangelical counsels.[43] An ambiguous use of terms seems, however, to have caused some divergency of opinion.[44] The invitation to the higher life is extended to all, but the actual choice of the religious state seems to proceed from either efficacious or sufficient grace, no matter how we look at the working of that mysterious divine impulse. The word of our Lord: "He that can take it, let him take it," (Matt. 19, 12) is a strong argument in favor of a special vocation, unless we choose to deny the

40 Cf. c. 15, X, III, 31.
41 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 848, 5.
42 C. 20, C. 16, q. 7.
43 S. Th., II–II, q. 189, a. 10.
44 Cf. Piatus M., I, 32 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

suave workings of divine providence. Only we must guard against a too specialized drawing to the religious state. The safest means to arrive at a practical result for each one is to pray and to consult with others.

(4) The last general requisite is fitness for bearing the burdens of the religious life. This fitness may be either general or special. General fitness must be considered from the view-point of the three religious vows, particularly that of chastity, because celibacy is not to everyone's taste. Obedience, too, may deter some from embracing a state which requires self-denial and subordination. Special fitness turns upon the nature of each religious order or congregation. Some are of a contemplative trend — of these there are but few in our country — whereas others have an active tendency; some spend much time and labor on choir service and schools, while others devote themselves to missionary and charitable work. Each requires a peculiar mental and physical [45] aptitude in the aspirant.

[45] An important defect of the body would be the lack of a limb endowed with special functions, for instance, hand, leg, nose, ear, eye (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 848); perhaps after the war a more lenient practice will be admitted.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

POSTULANCY

DURATION

CAN. 539

§ 1. In religionibus a votis perpetuis mulieres omnes et, si agatur de religione virorum, conversi, antequam ad novitiatum admittantur, postulatum ad sex saltem integros menses peragant; in religionibus vero a votis temporariis, ad necessitatem et tempus postulatus quod attinet, standum constitutionibus.

§ 2. Superior maior praescriptum postulatus tempus potest prorogare, non tamen ultra aliud semestre.

§ 1 distinguishes between various orders of men and women, such with perpetual and such with temporary vows. In religious institutes of women with perpetual vows the period of postulancy must last at least six whole months. The same rule applies to the lay brothers of male orders with perpetual vows. In institutes with temporary vows the duration of the postulancy is regulated by the respective constitutions.

§ 2. The higher superior can prolong the time prescribed for the postulancy, but not beyond another term of six months.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PLACE, DRESS, ENCLOSURE

CAN. 540

§ 1. Postulatus peragi debet vel in domo novitiatus vel in alia religionis domo in qua disciplina secundum constitutiones accurate servetur sub speciali cura probati religiosi.

§ 2. Postulantes vestem induant modestam ac diversam a veste novitiorum.

§ 3. In monasteriis monialium adspirantes, dum postulatum peragunt, lege clausurae tenentur.

The postulancy must be made either in the novitiate house or in another house of the institute, where the discipline prescribed by the constitutions is faithfully observed under the special care of an experienced religious.

The postulants should wear a humble dress, different from that of the novices.

In the monasteries of nuns (with solemn vows) the aspirants, during their postulancy, are bound by the law of enclosure.

CAN. 541

Postulantes, antequam novitiatum incipiant, exercitiis spiritualibus vacent per octo saltem integros dies; et, iuxta prudens confessarii iudicium, praemittant generalem anteactae vitae confessionem.

Before beginning their novitiate, postulants should make a spiritual retreat of at least eight full days, and according to the discretion of the confessor, a general confession of their past life.

To these three canons we will only add that they do not affect the validity of the novitiate or profession; that in clerical religious houses only the lay brothers, not the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clerics, have to make the six months' postulancy; that the institutes with perpetual vows cannot force the members to a postulancy lasting more than a year, even though the constitutions prescribe a longer term, as the latter in this point are devoid of legal force.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

THE NOVITIATE

A certain period of probation for aspirants has always been customary in religious institutes. Thus Pachomius in his rule [1] prescribes a term of probation, and Cassian in his "Institutions" speaks of it also.[2] This term of probation must have been a hard time for novices and candidates. The term of a year has been hallowed by a long-standing tradition; almost all the ancient rules prescribe it.[3] The place of the novitiate was separate from the rest of the monastery. At St. Gall in Switzerland, for example, the novices had their own enclosure, dining-room, kitchen, dormitory, infirmary, and laundry, as we see from the plan of that famous abbey built by Gotzbert in the beginning of the ninth century. Later, among the Cluniacenses, if the number of novices was small, they were allowed to mix with the professed members.[4] Probation chiefly turned upon obedience and capability of bearing the burdens of the religious life.[5]

1 Reg., c. 49 (Migne, 23, 70).

2 Inst., l. IV, cc. 3 ff. (Migne, 49, 154 ff.).

3 Migne, 66, 816.

4 Migne, 66, 812; concerning the change of dress, custom was different in different monasteries; ibid., Col. 836.

5 The devices employed sometimes bordered on the ridiculous and are not to be imitated now-a-days.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ARTICLE I

THE CONDITIONS REQUIRED FOR ADMISSION TO THE NOVITIATE

CAN. 542

Firmo praescripto can. 539–541, aliisque in propriis cuiusque religionis constitutionibus,

1.° Invalide ad novitiatum admittuntur:

Qui sectae acatholicae adhaeserunt;

Qui aetatem ad novitiatum requisitam non habent;

Qui religionem ingrediuntur vi, metu gravi aut dolo inducti, vel quos Superior eodem modo inductus recipit;

Coniux, durante matrimonio;

Qui obstringuntur vel obstricti fuerunt vinculo professionis religiosae;

Hi quibus imminet poena ob grave delictum commissum de quo accusati sunt vel accusari possunt;

Episcopus sive residentialis sive titularis, licet a Romano Pontifice sit tantum designatus;

Clerici qui ex instituto Sanctae Sedis iureiurando tenentur operam suam navare in bonum suae dioecesis vel missionum, pro eo tempore quo iurisiurandi obligatio perdurat.

2.° Illicite, sed valide admittuntur:

Clerici in sacris constituti, inconsulto loci Ordinario aut eodem contradicente ex eo quod eorum discessus in grave animarum detrimentum cedat, quod aliter vitari minime possit;

Aere alieno gravati qui solvendo pares non sint;

Reddendae rationi obnoxii aut aliis saecularibus ne-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gotiis implicati, ex quibus lites et molestias religio timere possit;

Filii qui parentibus, idest patri vel matri, avo vel aviae, in gravi necessitate constitutis, opitulari debent, et parentes quorum opera sit ad liberos alendos vel educandos necessaria;

Ad sacerdotium in religione destinati, a quo tamen removeantur irregularitate aliove canonico impedimento;

Orientales in latinis religionibus sine venia scripto data Sacrae Congregationis pro Ecclesia Orientali.

Without prejudice to the rules laid down in can. 539–541, and to others contained in the constitutions proper to each institute,

1.° The following are invalidly admitted to the novitiate:

Those who have belonged to a non-Catholic sect. The term "adhaerere" certainly means a wilful act on the part of the candidate, or, in other words, a formal heretic or schismatic, as may be seen from can. 1325, § 2, where the definitions of heretic and schismatic are given. In both a wilful, stubborn act is required. Hence a boy or girl educated by non-Catholic parents or relatives would not fall under the prohibition, as long as he or she had merely materially and unknowingly followed a non-Catholic sect, and never pertinaciously denied an article of the Catholic faith. On the other hand, a sect is an organization based on contradiction to the Catholic faith and the unity of the Church. Hence it matters nothing whether one is a formal adherent of a Protestant sect or of a schismatical body. For in neither case can he be validly admitted to the novitiate. Besides, a sect is generally understood as a body that proclaims some kind of Christian profession, as is evident from the Constitution of Pius IX, "Apostolicae Sedis," Oct. 12, 1869.[6] Hence apostates from the Catholic faith, and members of a non-Christian denomination (Buddhists, Mohammedans, Jews) are not comprised in this prohibition. However, as the Code uses the term acatholicae, non-Catholic, it would seem to include all sects opposed to the Catholic faith, but not individual apostates, as long as they are not members of an organized sect. This latter interpretation seems very probable, because the underlying reason of the prohibition is not only horror of heresy, but weakness of faith, as there is even now an impediment against receiving orders for neophytes,[7] and formerly was an irregularity from "defect of confirmed faith."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Those who have not reached the age required for the novitiate, which, according to can. 555, is fifteen years.

Those who enter religion under the influence of violence, or grave fear, or are induced thereto by fraud; also those whom the superior receives under pressure of the same influences. Compulsion (vis) destroys the voluntariness of an act; grave fear diminishes it; fraud, if deliberate and inspired by the intention of coaxing one into the religious state, affects the consent of the contracting party.

Physical compulsion is no longer as common as formerly, when parents brought their young children to the monastery. A notable case is that of Gottschalk, who was an oblate at Fulda under Rhabanus Maurus.[8] The Decretals mitigated this practice, which to us seems appalling, and ruled that a boy was free to embrace the 6 I, 1: "Omnes a christiana fide apostatas et omnes ac singulos haereticos quocumque nomine censeantur et cuiuscumque sectae existant."

7 Can. 987.

8 He wrote a work on the "Oblation of Boys," in which he defends the prevailing custom (Migne, 125, 419 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

religious state after fourteen years, and a girl could repudiate her parents' decision after she had reached the age of twelve.[9] Of grave fear that prompted one to enter religion an instance is mentioned in the Decree of Gratian.[10] Landulph of Corsica through fear of death and the remembrance of his sins left his wife and became a monk. Alexander III declared the step null and void and allowed Landulph to return to his wife. Grave fear may be inflicted by foolish parents or relatives, who sometimes use means of persuasion of a very doubtful character, such as threats, to induce their children to enter the religious state. All such measures render the step invalid.

A more knotty question is that of deceit, because it cannot be easily proved.[11] However, circumstances sometimes uncover a fraud. Thus, for instance, if parents, desirous of keeping their property together, induce their younger sons or daughters to enter religion, there is palpable fraud. Deceit may also be practiced by the religious, for instance, by holding out a good and pleasant position, honors and dignities, or, as the saying is, a good time, or by hiding the truth and the real conditions of the community. However, not every kind of deceit necessarily makes admission to the novitiate invalid, but it must be a fraudulent device either on the part of those who have influence over the candidate or on the side of the institute which he joins, and it must be decisive in causing him to enter.[12] A person who is of age and of sound mind is not easily deceived.

The Code says, furthermore, that if the superior has been induced to receive a candidate by compulsion, fear or deceit, the act would be invalid. This may happen

9 Cc. 8, 12, X, III, 31.
10 C. 2, C. 33, q. 5.
11 Reiffenstuel, III, 16, 32 ff.
12 Reiffenstuel, II, 14, n. 8 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by threats against the superior himself, or against the religious house (defamation), or financial reverses, etc. It would be deceit if the candidate pretended to be intelligent, healthy or rich, whilst in reality he is the opposite. But mere lack of riches or brain — unless the candidate were too dull for any occupation — would not be sufficient to make the admission invalid. Feigned health would be sufficient, but a physician's verdict may save an institute from deceit of this kind. The moral character is more liable to be made an object of deception. However, the testimonials required and a sincere statement of the candidate's past life would give some clue to a wise action on both sides. If the candidate should nevertheless have succeeded in deceiving the order or congregation, the latter would be justified in dismissing him even after profession. The same must be said concerning health,[13] if a serious defect was concealed, as well as of debts, which must be revealed to the religious superior.

A married person as long as the marriage bond lasts. Since divorce is not acknowledged by the Church, a divorced husband or wife cannot enter religion. But if the ecclesiastical authority (episcopal or Roman court) decides against the existence of a marriage, the parties are free. As to the sentence of the episcopal court it must be understood of the final sentence not appealed. Separation, granted either perpetually or for a time by the ecclesiastical court, does not dissolve the marriage tie, and therefore parties thus severed cannot be admitted to a religious institute. Neither can mutual consent or permission solve the marriage bond, wherefore the old practice on this head must be discarded.[14] The text is

13 Cfr. can. 637.

14 Cf. X, III, 32. With the consent of his wife a man could enter religion on condition that the wife,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

brief, but clear and pointed, and we believe our notes on it to be correct.[15]

Those who are or have been bound by the bonds of religious profession. This law excludes all who are or were members of any other religious community by profession. Of course, the profession must have been valid, otherwise he was not bound (obstrictus). Hence if a profession is for any reason declared null and void, the one who made it may be validly admitted to the novitiate. Note that any valid profession, whether temporary or perpetual, simple or solemn, has the effect of binding one to the religious institute in which it is made. For the text simply says, without distinction: religious profession.

Those who are menaced with punishment for a serious crime, of which they have been or can be accused. A crime is a public transgression in a matter that touches the public welfare, and in civil law has a penal sanction attached to it. Under this heading falls the threefold category of crimes, viz., treason, felony, and misdemeanor, although the latter might perhaps be excluded here, because the text says: gravis (serious) crime. Note that the Code does not limit the term to ecclesiastical crimes, but simply says a serious crime of which one has been or can be accused. The reason is evident, viz., to protect the decorum and reputation of the religious life, which should not be a shelter and refuge for criminals. The wording, "who are amenable to punishment" (quibus imminet poena), supposes that the penalty is probable. Hence if one should be declared if under fifty years, would also enter a religious order, or, if beyond that age, would take the vow of chastity.

15 Papi, H., Religious Profession, 1918, p. 14: "A married person, while his or her partner is alive"—does not render the text adequately.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"not guilty," although he may have committed the crime, he may be validly received, though not while the trial is pending.

Every bishop, whether residential or titular, even though only nominated by the Roman Pontiff. The reason for this prohibition lies in the mystic marriage between the bishop and his diocese, which also forbids a transfer from one diocese to another, except by special permission from the Pope.[16] "Designatus" (nominated or appointed) means promulgated by the Pope in public consistory. Consequently a bishop-elect, or one merely postulated or presented for the episcopate, but whose election is not yet ratified, postulation not admitted, or presentation not effected by investiture, may freely be admitted to the religious state. Consecration is not required to make the prohibition effective.

Clerics who, by a disposition of the Holy See, are bound by oath to consecrate themselves to the service of their diocese or mission, for the period during which their oath binds them. This is the impediment that arises from the title of the service of the Church for which one is ordained. The oath is taken before one is ordained subdeacon[17] and contains a special clause prohibiting entrance into religion.

The North American College in Rome is now under the superintendence of the S. C. Consistorialis, which watches over the taking of this oath, and grants dispensations from the same.[18] If the title of servitium Ecclesiae is changed into another, e. g., that of patrimony or pension, which may be done by the bishop with the 16 C. 2, X, I, 7; c. 18, X, III, 31, which latter text justly says that if a weighty or solid reason is advanced, the petition shall easily be granted.

17 Cfr. the Instruction of the S. C. Prop. Fidei, April 27, 1871 (Collectanea S. C. P. F., II, n. 1369).

18 S. C. Consist., Jan. 7, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 148 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

permission of said sacred Congregation, the obligation ceases. If one is ordained on any other ecclesiastical title, for instance, that of patrimony, the oath must not be taken, and the clergyman is, on that score, free to enter religion.

Can. 542 then continues as follows:

2.° The following are illicitly but validly admitted [to the novitiate]:

Clerics in sacred orders, without the consent of the local Ordinary or against his will, if his objection is based on the serious loss to souls that their withdrawal would entail, when that loss cannot by any means be otherwise avoided. This is the old practice followed by the Roman Court, as several constitutions, especially that of Benedict XIV, "Ex quo," Jan. 14, 1747, prove. The welfare of souls being the supreme law, it is but natural that private desires and aspirations must make way for it. Ordinary politeness, if nothing else, would dictate that a clergyman who wishes to join a religious order should manifest his desire to the Ordinary. In case the latter is persuaded of the necessity of retaining such a priest in the service of the diocese, he may claim him even after he has made his profession.[19] But a bishop is not entitled to keep a priest from entering the religious state on the plea that he is indebted to the diocese for his seminary expenses, because a clergyman is not bound to repay these.[20]

Those who are burdened with debts which they are unable to discharge. These were dealt with severely by Sixtus V, but more leniently by Clement VIII. Our Code makes their admission merely illicit.[21] Note that

19 Benedict XIV, "Ex quo."

20 Nilles, Disputationes Selectae, p. 55; Piatus M., l. c., I, 74.

21 Sixtus V, "Cum de omnibus," Dec. 1, 1587; Clement VIII, "In suprema," Jan. 2, 1602; "Cum ad regularem," March 19, 1603.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

no one who is heavily indebted is to be admitted to the religious state, even though the order or congregation he wishes to enter is willing to pay his debts. Such an offer would imply alienation, which is not permitted. Minor debts may be assumed by a religious community. Heavy debts is a relative term, depending on one's fortune. One is heavily indebted if compelled to declare himself insolvent, or to sell all his property to satisfy his creditors.

Those who are liable to furnish accounts or are implicated in other secular negotiations from which the institute may have reason to fear lawsuits and annoyances. Hence all public officials liable to render accounts, guardians and tutors, trustees and treasurers, administrators and procurators must first acquit themselves of their accounts before they can be received. This was the meaning of the Constitution of Sixtus V, "Cum de omnibus," Dec. 1, 1587.

Persons whose parents, that is, father or mother, grand-father or grand-mother, are in great necessity and need their assistance, and parents whose help is necessary for the support and education of their children. The Code is explicit as to the degrees of relationship within which persons are bound to succor their relatives. Parents or grand-parents would be in "great necessity" if they depended for support solely on the child or grandchild who wishes to enter the religious state. A parent's first duty is to support and educate his or her children. However, if these can be cared for equally well by others, the parent would be permitted to join a religious order, as the text speaks conditionally.

Those who in religion would be destined for the priesthood, from which, however, they are debarred by an irregularity or other canonical impediment. On these im-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pediments consult can. 984 to 991. Illegitimate children may be licitly received into a religious order or congregation with solemn vows, because the Code [22] reasserts the old law [23] that solemn profession removes irregularity and admits one to holy orders, the priesthood included, but not to higher orders or dignities. Note that these impediments affect only members of a clerical institute who are destined for the priesthood. Hence lay religious and women's congregations and orders are not touched by the prohibition at all.

Orientals may not be received into institutes of the Latin rite without the written permission of the S. Congregation for the Eastern Church. This applies to all Orientals who belong to the Oriental Rite. For those who have, with the Holy See's permission, changed to the Latin rite, there is no impediment as to being received into a Latin institute.[24] This canon is a logical corollary of can. 98, which prohibits indiscriminate mingling of the Oriental and the Latin rites.

THE RIGHT OF ADMITTING NOVICES, ETC.

CAN. 543

Ius admittendi ad novitiatum et subsequentem professionem religiosam tam temporariam quam perpetuam pertinet ad Superiores maiores cum suffragio Consilii seu Capituli, secundum peculiares cuiusque religionis constitutiones.

The right of admitting to the novitiate and to the subsequent profession, whether temporary or perpetual, be-

22 Can. 984, 1°.

23 Cfr. X, I, 17; 6°, I, 11; c. 14, X, V, 34; Reg. Iuris 87, in 6°.

24 On the Aventine Hill in Rome in the Xth century there was a monastery, S. Alessio, in which Latin and Greek monks lived under one abbot, the former following the rule of St. Benedict, the latter that of St. Basil.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

longs to the higher superiors, who, however, depend on the vote of the council or chapter, according to the requirements of the constitutions of each particular institute.

The reception of novices is a matter of great importance for the upkeep of discipline, and concerns not only the individual postulant, but the whole community, and therefore it is but proper that the whole community should have a share in it. The Code instructs superiors and convents to coöperate in the matter. In congregations with a chapter, properly so-called, like the Benedictines, the whole chapter must vote on each case, and this vote is not only consultive, but decisive. Where counsellors take the place of the chapter, they must be consulted and their vote obeyed. In each case the majority decides, and only when there is a tie, is the superior's vote decisive. For the rest, the constitutions must determine the manner of receiving novices.

We may add that the Ordinary of the diocese has no right to admit candidates to the novitiate of papal institutes, but under the Constitution "Conditae" of Leo XIII he is entitled to be informed about the candidates who wish to be received, and those who are to be admitted to vows; he may also examine them, according to the customary rules, and if no objection is found, admit them.[25] This, however, does not mean that the Ordinary may arbitrarily reject some and command others to be received.

TESTIMONIALS

CAN. 544

§ 1. In quavis religione omnes adspirantes, antequam admittantur, exhibere debent testimonium recepti baptismatis et confirmationis.

[25] I, n. 7; cf. can. 552.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Adspirantes viri debent praeterea testimoniales litteras exhibere Ordinarii originis ac cuiusque loci in quo, post expletum decimum quartum aetatis annum, morati sint ultra annum moraliter continuum, sublato quolibet contrario privilegio.

§ 3. Si agatur de admittendis illis qui in Seminario, collegio vel alius religionis postulatu aut novitiatu fuerunt, requiruntur praeterea litterae testimoniales, datae pro diversis casibus a rectore Seminarii vel collegii, audito Ordinario loci, aut a maiore religionis Superiore.

§ 4. Pro clericis admittendis, praeter testimonium ordinationis, sufficiunt litterae testimoniales Ordinariorum in quorum dioecesibus post ordinationem ultra annum moraliter continuum sint commorati, salvo praescripto § 3.

§ 5. Religioso professo, ad aliam religionem ex apostolico indulto transeunti, satis est testimonium Superioris maioris prioris religionis.

§ 6. Praeter haec testimonia a iure requisita, possunt Superiores quibus ius est adspirantes in religionem cooptandi, alia quoque exigere, quae ipsis ad hunc finem necessaria aut opportuna videantur.

§ 7. Mulieres denique ne recipiantur nisi praemissis accuratis investigationibus circa earum indolem et mores, firmo praescripto § 3.

§ 1. In every institute, all the aspirants, before being admitted, must present a certificate of their baptism and confirmation. The certificate of baptism may be issued by the pastor or his assistant, but it must be signed in the name of the pastor and sealed with the parish seal. The certificate of confirmation may be issued by the diocesan chancellor but must bear the diocesan seal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Until he has presented his certificate of baptism and confirmation an aspirant cannot receive the religious habit.[26]

§ 2. The male aspirants must, besides, furnish testimonial letters from the Ordinary of the place of birth, and from the Ordinary of whatever other place in which, after completing their fourteenth year, they have lived for more than a year, morally continuous, notwithstanding any privilege to the contrary. This rule was inculcated by the decree "Romanos Pontifices," of Jan. 25, 1848, which need no longer be read at table, the promulgation of the Code being sufficient.[27] The Code fixes fourteen years instead of fifteen, as did the decree. The Ordinary of the place of birth is the one in whose diocese the father of the candidate lived when the candidate was born. Persons of illegitimate parentage follow the domicile of the mother. Besides the testimonials of the bishop of the place of birth, the candidate must have letters from the Ordinaries of all other dioceses in which he has dwelt for more than one morally continuous year. The phrase morally continuous indicates habitual residence. A few weeks' absence from a diocese would not impair this moral continuity of residence. Much depends on the intention, but if a man comes and goes, but always returns to the same place, he is morally present in the diocese in which that place is situated.

§ 3. When there is question of admitting aspirants who have been in a seminary, a college, or in a postulancy or novitiate of another institute, testimonial letters, given,

[26] S. C. EE. et RR., May 29, 1857, n. 2 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 850). Of course, these rules are to be urged only in normal times; in times like ours it is often impossible to obtain the necessary information. In every such case the S. C. Rel. should be informed of the facts, and if no answer comes, the novitiate may be begun licitly,— its validity not being in question.

[27] Cfr. can. 509, § 2, 1, which says those decrees shall be read which the Holy See will in future prescribe (prescribet).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to the circumstances, by the rector of the seminary or college, after consulting the local Ordinary, or by the higher superior of the institute, are also necessary. This paragraph enumerates three hypotheses: (a) the aspirant may have been a student of a seminary or (b) of a college, or (c) a postulant or novice of a different religious order. But in neither case is § 2 invalidated, wherefore the Code says, praeterea, besides, viz., besides the testimonials demanded in § 2, supposing, of course, that the aspirant belongs to the male sex.

Seminary means a theological (grand) seminary, but does not exclude a preparatory (petit) seminary. The term college includes academies for young ladies, because § 7 includes female religious. Now if a candidate has been an alumnus of such a seminary or college or academy, no matter how long, he must present testimonial letters from the respective rector or president or superioress. Before they issue such testimonial letters, these officials must consult the Ordinary of the diocese and obtain his approval. Testimonial letters thus approved and signed by the Ordinary, or his vicar-general or chancellor, may serve at the same time as episcopal testimonials as to residence in the diocese, where such are required. A nine months' stay in a seminary or college or academy would in itself not make it necessary for an aspirant to obtain testimonial letters from the Ordinary of the diocese in which the seminary or college or academy is situated.[28] Sometimes it happens that students spend the whole year in such an institution. Observe that no seminary or college, even though conducted by exempt religious, is free from the obligation in question. The last clause provides that aspirants who have [28] A three months' vacation would certainly interrupt the "morally continuous" year supposed to require such a testimonial.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

been postulants or novices of some other institute must also present testimonial letters from the higher superiors (those mentioned in can. 488, n. 8). Note, first, that the Ordinary need not be consulted before issuing such testimonial letters. Secondly, that the term alius religionis may be insisted upon. For religio means an organization different from others. Consequently a change from one province to another, or from one monastic congregation to another of the same order would not require testimonial letters from the religious superior who had dismissed the postulant or novice. The decree of the S. C. Rel., Sept. 7, 1909, mentions only dismissal from "orders and religious congregations,"[29] although in another decree (April 5, 1910) the same congregation speaks of a "religious family."[30] But the latter decree is only an interpretation of the former, and therefore, until an authentic interpretation is given to the contrary, we cling to the strict wording of the Code.

§ 4. For the admission of clerics, it suffices, besides the certificate of ordination, to have testimonial letters from the Ordinaries of the dioceses in which the clerics have lived for more than one morally continuous year after ordination, without prejudice to the prescription of § 3. Ordination is the conferring of higher and minor orders, and includes the first tonsure,[31] by which one formally enters the ranks of the clergy. Clerical aspirants to the religious life, therefore, need: (a) a certificate of ordination, (b) testimonial letters from the Ordinaries, as stated in this paragraph and in § 2, if they have lived in their dioceses for one morally continuous year; (c) testimonial letters from the superior of a seminary, college or religious institute, if they had been received

29 A. Ap. S., I, 701.
30 Ibid., II, 231.
31 Can. 950.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as seminarians, students, postulants or novices.[32] The reason why they do not need testimonial letters from the bishop of their place of birth lies in the fact of their ordination, which presumes the necessary documents.

§ 5. For a professed religious passing, by virtue of an apostolic indult, to another institute, the testimony of the higher superior of the institute which he leaves suffices. One who, having made temporary or perpetual, simple or solemn profession in one order or congregation, wishes to be transferred to another, and has obtained a papal indult permitting him to make the change, needs only the testimony of the superior of the order he desires to leave. This superior is the general or provincial, or, if the order or congregation is distributed into provinces, the local superior. Should the aspirant have changed previously, only the superior of the institute to which he last belonged must give his testimonial letters. But before granting them, the superior should carefully investigate the character of the applicant.[33]

§ 6. Besides these testimonials required by law, the superiors, who have the right of admitting aspirants to the institute, can exact others also, if it seems to them necessary or opportune. This rule was no doubt made in order to provide surer guaranties for the moral and physical fitness of candidates.

§ 7. Women are not to be received until careful investigation has been made regarding their character and conduct, with due regard to § 3.

We will add a decision of the Roman Court[34] concerning the necessity of testimonial letters: for they are necessary only to make the profession licit, but not to make it 32 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 5, 1852 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 849).

33 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 5, 1852, ad 2; May 29, 1857, ad 3 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 849 f.).

34 S. C. super Statu Regul., May 1, 1851 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 841, n. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

valid. The same view is taken by our Code, which nowhere, neither in can. 555 nor in can. 572, makes testimonial letters a condition for the validity of the novitiate or profession. But superiors are gravely obliged in conscience to see that such letters are furnished when required by law.[35]

TESTIMONIALS — CONTINUED

CAN. 545

§ 1. Qui litteras testimoniales ex praescripto iuris dare debent, eas non ipsis adspirantibus, sed Superioribus religiosis dent gratuito intra trimestre spatium ab arum requisitione, sigillo clausas et, si agatur de illis qui in Seminario, collegio vel alius religionis postulatu aut novitiatu fuerint, a Superiore iuramento firmatas.

§ 2. Si ob graves rationes iudicaverint se eis respondere non posse, causas Apostolicae Sedi intra idem tempus exponant.

§ 3. Si reposuerint adspirantem satis non esse sibi cognitum, per aliam accuratam investigationem ac fide dignam relationem Superior religiosus suppleat; si vero nil reposuerint, Superior requirens de non recepta responsione Sanctam Sedem certiorem reddat.

§ 4. In suis litteris testimonialibus, postquam diligentem investigationem, etiam per secretas notitias, instituerint, referre debent, graviter eorum conscientia onerata super veritate expositorum, de adspirantis natalibus, moribus, ingenio, vita, fama, conditione, scientia; sitne inquisitus, aliqua censura, irregularitate aut alio canonico impedimento irretitus, num propria

35 "Gravissime onerata conscientia eorum"; cfr. can. 2411, which states that careless superiors may be deprived of their office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

familia eius auxilio indigeat, et tandem, si agatur de illis qui in Seminario, collegio, aut alius religionis postulatu aut novitiatu fuerint, quanam de causa dimissi sint vel sponte discesserint.

§ 1. Those who must, according to the law, give testimonial letters, should not consign them to the aspirants, but to the religious superiors, and this gratuitously within three months from the date of request, closed and sealed, and if the aspirants are persons who have been in a seminary, a college, postulancy or novitiate of another institute, the testimonial letters must be signed under oath by the superior.

As to the testimonial letters, they may be private, without official character, but they must be sealed. Concerning the superior's oath, it must be given in writing, for instance: "In witness whereof I invoke the name of Almighty God and hereto set my hand" (and seal, if the writer has an official seal).

According to § 2 and § 3, if they who are to give testimonial letters feel that they cannot comply with the request for them, they must make known the reasons to the Holy See (S. C. Rel.) within the time stated, i. e., three months. If they reply that the aspirant is not sufficiently known to them, the religious superior shall supply the deficiency by making careful inquiries of sources worthy of credence; but if they give no reply, the superior who made the request must inform the Holy See that he has received no response. Of course, this legislation is intended for normal times, when mail travels safely. Other reports may be made by those who knew the aspirants,— parents, relatives, pastors, teachers, friends, schoolmates, etc. The decree from which our text is chiefly taken admonishes the superior to keep the candidate in the convent for at least three months and test him carefully.[36]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. In their testimonial letters, the Ordinaries and superiors, after having made careful investigation, even by secret enquiries, must give information, the accuracy of which they are under grave obligation in conscience to control, on the birth, conduct, character, life, reputation, condition (social status), and learning of the aspirant; whether he be suspect, or under any censure, irregularity, or any other canonical impediment; whether his family needs his help; and, finally, when there is question of persons who have been in a seminary, a college, or in a postulancy or novitiate of another institute, the reasons for their dismissal or spontaneous departure. This moral passport needs no further explanation. The term "inquisitus" may mean, "demanded in court," either civil or ecclesiastical. This seems to be confirmed by can. 542, § 1, but the official English translation renders it by "suspect," as given above.

CAN. 546

Omnes qui praedictas informationes receperint, stricta obligatione tenentur secreti servandi circa notitias habitas et personas quae illas tradiderunt.

All those who have received the aforesaid information are strictly obliged to keep secret not only the information itself, but also the names of the persons who supplied it.

[36] S. C. super Statu Regul., May 1, 1851 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 840).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DOWRY

CAN. 547

§ 1. In monasteriis monialium postulans afferat dotem in constitutionibus statutam aut legitima consuetudine determinatam.

§ 2. Haec dos ante susceptionem habitus monasterio tradatur aut saltem eius traditio tuta reddatur forma iure civili valida.

§ 3. In religionibus votorum simplicium, quod ad religiosarum dotem pertinet, standum constitutionibus.

§ 4. Dos praescripta condonari ex toto vel ex parte nequit sine indulto Sanctae Sedis, si agatur de religione iuris pontificii; sine venia Ordinarii loci, si de religione iuris dioecesani.

In monasteries of nuns, the postulant shall provide the dowry fixed by the constitutions or determined by lawful custom. This dowry must be given to the monastery before the reception of the habit, or at least its payment guaranteed in a manner recognized by the civil law.

In institutes with simple vows, the constitutions must be obeyed with regard to the dowries of religious women. The prescribed dowry cannot be condoned either totally or partially, without a papal indult in the case of institutes approved by the Holy See, in pontifical, or without the consent of the local Ordinary in the case of diocesan institutes.

Dowry means a security in money or its equivalent for the purpose of maintaining a religious institute. Hence it is not a donation, nor an offering to gain entrance,[37] which would be simony, but a permissible and irreprehensible mode of guaranteeing the necessary support.

[37] This was the opinion of the Febronian canonist Van Eybel; cfr. Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 109.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Neither must it be confounded with legacies, bequests, hereditary acquisition, patrimony, or pension. If a monastery of Sisters has no special law or rule concerning dowries — which should not be less than $100 — the following canons do not concern it. The amount of the dowry should be established in the constitutions, and any condonation, either total or partial, requires the consent of the legitimate authority (§ 4). The amount fixed by the constitutions may not be raised without the permission of the Holy See.[38] The dowry must be secured in a form that is valid according to the laws of the State. A notary public and witnesses are therefore required. Any secure source of income, either money or title-deeds, government or State bonds, bank deposits, shares in sound stock companies, are admissible. But the dowry itself or guarantee thereof must be delivered before the candidate receives the habit.

CAN. 548

Dos monasterio seu religioni irrevocabiliter acquiritur per obitum religiosae, licet haec nonnisi vota temporaria nuncupaverit.

The dowry is irrevocably acquired by the monastery or the institute on the death of the religious, even though she had made profession of only temporary vows. For as long as a Sister lives, the monastery is the sole trustee or administrator of her dowry.

CAN. 549

Post primam religiosae professionem dos in tutis, licitis ac fructiferis nominibus collocetur ab Antistita

[38] The reason is that it would be alienation, which is prohibited, and derogate from the authority of the Holy See, which had approved the constitutions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cum suo Consilio, de consensu Ordinarii loci et Superioris regularis, si domus ab hoc dependeat; omnino autem prohibetur eam quoquo modo ante religiosae obitum impendi, ne ad aedificandam quidem domum aut ad aes alienum exstinguendum.

After the first profession of the religious, the superioress with her council, and with the consent of the local Ordinary and the regular superior, if the house be dependent on regulars, must place the dowry in a safe, lawful and productive investment; but it is strictly forbidden that, before the death of the religious, the dowry be expended for any purpose, even for the building of a religious house or the payment of debts.

For any alienation of the dowry an apostolic indult is required. However, the interest accruing from the dowry may be used for any purpose.

CAN. 550

§ 1. Dotes caute et integre administrentur apud monasterium vel domum habitualis residentiae supremae Moderatricis aut Antistitae provincialis.

§ 2. Ordinarii locorum conservandis religiosarum dotibus sedulo invigilent; et praesertim in sacra visitatione de eisdem rationem exigant.

The dowries must be carefully and integrally administered at the monastery or house of habitual residence of the Mother General or Mother Provincial.

The local Ordinaries must diligently see that the dowries of the religious are conserved; and they must demand an exact account thereof, especially at the canonical visitation.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 551

§ 1. Dos religiosae professae sive votorum sollemnium sive votorum simplicium quavis de causa discedenti integra restituenda est sine fructibus iam maturis.

§ 2. Si vero religiosa professa ad aliam religionem ex apostolico indulto transeat, durante novitiatu, fructus, salvo praescripto can. 570, § 1; emissa vero nova professione, dos ipsa huic religioni debentur; si ad aliud eiusdem Ordinis monasterium, huic debetur ipsa dos a die transitus.

If, from whatever cause, a professed religious with either solemn or simple vows leaves the institute, her dowry must be returned to her intact, but not the interest already derived therefrom.

But if, by virtue of an apostolic indult, the professed religious joins another institute, the interest on the dowry, during her new novitiate, without prejudice to the prescription of can. 570, § 1, and, after the new profession, the dowry itself must be given to the latter institute; if the religious passes to another monastery of the same order, the dowry belongs to it from the day the change takes place.

This canon refers to can. 570, § 1, concerning a Sister changing from one religious institute to another, which allows a certain alimony for the postulancy and novitiate.

EXPLORATIO VOLUNTATIS, OR EXAMINATION

CAN. 552

§ 1. Religiosarum etiam exemptarum Antistita debet Ordinarium loci, duobus saltem mensibus ante, certiorem facere de proxima admissione ad novitiatum et ad professionem tum temporariam tum perpetuam sive sollemnem sive simplicem.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Ordinarius loci vel, eo absente aut impedito, sacerdos ab eodem deputatus, adspirantis voluntatem, saltem triginta diebus ante novitiatum et ante professionem, ut supra, diligenter et gratuito exploret, non tamen clausuram ingrediens, num ea coacta seductave sit, an sciat quid agat; et, si de pia eius ac libera voluntate plane constiterit, tunc adspirans poterit ad novitiatum vel novitia ad professionem admitti.

The superioress even of exempt religious must inform the local Ordinary, at least two months in advance, of the approaching admission to the novitiate and to the profession both of temporary and perpetual or of solemn or simple vows. Hence the bishop must be informed three times, viz., before the novitiate, before temporary profession, and before perpetual profession.

The local Ordinary, or, if he is absent or otherwise impeded, a priest delegated by him, must, at least thirty days before the admission to the novitiate and to profession, carefully examine the disposition of the aspirant, and this gratuitously, without, however, entering the enclosure. He must inform himself as to whether she has been forced or beguiled, and if she understands the import of what she is doing, the step she is about to take; and if he is fully satisfied regarding her pious intention and freedom of action, then the aspirant may be admitted to the novitiate, or if already a novice, to profession. The examination must be made free of charge, and outside the enclosure, at least if the convent has papal enclosure. This is the safeguard against physical or moral compulsion erected by the Council of Trent [39] and the Roman Congregations.

39 Sess. 25, c. 17, de reg.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ARTICLE II

THE TRAINING OF NOVICES

CAN. 553

Novitiatus incipit susceptione habitus, vel alio modo in constitutionibus praescripto.

The novitiate begins with the reception of the habit, or in any other manner prescribed by the constitutions. It was not always customary to doff the secular dress and don a special religious habit when one became "converted." At least St. Benedict's Rule (c. 58) would seem to teach us differently. A synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (816–817) enjoined that the secular dress should not be changed until one had promised obedience. However, Benedict of Aniane (482) assumed the monastic habit as a novice and the Clunians tonsured their novices and clothed them with the monk's habit, except the cowl (cuculla); and ever since the IXth and Xth centuries the custom of investing novices with a religious habit became almost universal.[40] Yet exceptions were and are made, and hence the Code refers to the constitutions of each institute. What is necessary is that the novice as well as the community know the exact date of the beginning of the novitiate.

ERECTION OF THE NOVITIATE

CAN. 554

§ 1. Erigatur domus novitiatus ad normam constitutionum; si vero agatur de religione iuris pontificii, ad

40 Cfr. Migne, 66, 837.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eam erigendam necessaria est licentia Sedis Apostolicae.

§ 2. Plures in eadem provincia novitiatus domus, si religio in provincias divisa sit, designari nequeunt, nisi gravi de causa et cum speciali apostolico indulto.

§ 3. Superiores in novitiatus ac studiorum domo ne collocent, nisi religiosos qui sint ad exemplum regularis observantiae studio.

The novitiate house shall be erected in accordance with the prescriptions of the constitutions; but in case of institutes approved by the Apostolic See the permission of the latter is necessary for the erection. If the institute is divided into provinces, more than one novitiate must not be erected in the same province without a grave reason and a special apostolic indult. Superiors shall have in the novitiate houses and houses of study only religious who are exemplary in their zeal for regular observance. A novitiate may be erected by diocesan institutes with the permission of the bishop, according to their own constitutions. But any order or congregation which has received the decree of recognition (decretum laudis), or has been formally approved by Rome, must have permission from the S. C. of Religious. Note that permission for founding a religious house does not include permission to erect a novitiate, unless express mention was made of it in the petition.

§ 2 emphasizes a law which was first given and observed in Italy, but is now general, at least in a certain measure. Clement VIII had ruled that only one novitiate, designated for each province by the Apostolic See, could receive novices validly.[41] The Code is not so strict.

41 "Regularis disciplinae," March 12, 1596; "Sanctissimus," June 20, 1599, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It merely enjoins that each province should have but one novitiate. This rule binds only those religious institutes which are divided into provinces. The term province must be interpreted strictly. It does not mean a congregation, but a local or national organization. One novitiate for each province will, as a rule, accommodate and be adequate to the training of all novices (cfr. can. 501, § 3). If, however, the number is too large, or linguistic or other difficulties render it advisable to have more than one novitiate, a special indult is required — special, because not implied in the one given according to § 1 of this canon by the Apostolic See.

REQUISITES FOR THE VALIDITY OF THE NOVITIATE

CAN. 555

§ 1. Praeter alia quae in can. 542 ad novitiatus validitatem enumerantur, novitiatus ut valeat, peragi debet:

1.° Post completum decimum quintum saltem aetatis annum;

2.° Per annum integrum et continuum;

3.° In domo novitiatus.

§ 2. Si longius tempus in constitutionibus pro novitiatu praescribatur, illud ad validitatem professionis non requiritur, nisi in eisdem constitutionibus aliud expresse dicatur.

§ 1. Besides the other conditions enumerated in can. 542 for the validity of the novitiate it is further required that the novitiate be made:

1.° After the aspirant has completed at least the fifteenth year;

2.° For an entire and uninterrupted year;

3.° In the novitiate house.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If the constitutions prescribe more than one year for the novitiate, the extra time is not required for the validity of the profession, unless the constitutions expressly declare otherwise.

The conditions enumerated under can. 542, § 1, have been dealt with. The other three conditions are plain enough. We need only add that the age is the same for both sexes, viz., the fifteenth year, fully completed. A full year comprises 365 days, even though the novitiate be begun or finished in a leap-year. But the severity of some older canonists, who insisted upon moments, is out of place under the new Code. Thus if one commences his novitiate on the morning of June 21st, 1919, he may make his profession on June 21st, 1920, at any time of the day. But if he commenced the novitiate at noon or in the evening of June 21st, he could not validly make his profession until June 22, 1920 (cfr. can. 34). The term continuum here means physically and morally uninterrupted, of which more shall be said in the following canon. The novitiate house is the special building or space reserved for novices. Where only a certain space or room or department is set aside for the novitiate, the whole house is a quasi-novitiate. Novitiate here simply means the house or place approved by the Apostolic See for the training of novices, though it is evident that the Holy See wishes to see a special novitiate house erected for every province and congregation. Thus the English Benedictine Congregation has a novitiate house, and Leo XIII fully approved its rule.[42] Proper training and uniformity of discipline can be achieved only where there is one novitiate.

§ 2 allows religious institutes to insert in their constitutions a clause decreeing a longer novitiate, but they 42 "Diu quidem," June 29, 1899.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google must explicitly state whether this clause touches the validity of the novitiate. If they merely say, " the novitiate lasts two years " without making it a condition of validity, one year is sufficient.

INTERRUPTION OF THE NOVITIATE

CAN. 556

§ 1. Novitiatus interrumpitur, ita ut denuo incipiendus ac perficiendus sit, si novitius, a Superiore dimissus, e domo exierit, aut domum sine illius licentia non reversurus deseruerit, aut extra domum, etsi reversurus, ultra triginta dies sive continuos sive non continuos permanserit quacunque ex causa, etiam de Superiorum licentia.

§ 2. Si novitius ultra quindecim, sed non ultra triginta dies etiam non continuos, de Superiorum licentia vel vi coactus extra domus septa permanserit sub Superioris obedientia, ad validitatem novitiatus necesse et satis est dies hoc modo transactos supplere; si non ultra quindecim dies, supplementum potest a Superioribus praescribi, sed non est ad validitatem necessarium.

§ 3. Superiores licentiam manendi extra septa novitiatus, nisi iusta et gravi de causa, ne impertiant.

§ 4. Si novitius a Superioribus in aliam novitiatus domum eiusdem religionis transferatur, novitiatus non interrumpitur.

The novitiate is interrupted, and must be recommenced and completed: (a) if the novice is sent away by the superior and leaves the house, or (b) if, without the permission of the superior, he leaves the house with the intention of not returning, or (c) if, even with the superior's permission from whatever motive, he has remained for more than thirty days, whether continuously or not, outside the house, although he may return to it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here are three distinct cases. The first is dismissal by the superior, followed by the departure of the novice. If the dismissal would be revoked before the novice had left the house or premises, there would be no interruption.[43] But there is interruption as soon as the dismissed novice has left the house, even though the dismissal is made upon false accusations, and the novice be reinstated. For our text cannot be otherwise construed, although some authors [44] deny interruption in that case. A somewhat different aspect is offered by this case: A novice is dismissed and leaves the house after having spent a full and continuous year in the novitiate, and later is readmitted; what then? We believe with solid writers that there is no interruption of the novitiate in this case, because the novitiate had already ended.

The case mentioned under (b) supposes two conditions: leave without permission and the intention of not returning. Whenever these two conditions are present, there is an interruption, no matter whether the novice leaves with or without the habit, or for a long or a short time. Neither is the nature of the action to be considered, as Suarez says; [45] for such a novice is looked upon as a deserter (deseruerit), and desertion requires no specified length of time, if the will is there.

The last (c) case supposes only one condition, viz.: absence protracted for more than thirty days, even though with the permission of the superior and for a just reason. Hence if a novice would live on a farm or in a summer resort ten days in one month, ten days in another month, 43 Piatus M., l. c., I, 99.

44 Ferrari, De Statu Religioso, 1906, p. 78.

45 De Rel., tract. VII, l. V, c. 15, n. 6 (ed. Paris, Vol. 15, p. 368 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and ten days, say, with a specialist (physician), the novitiate would be interrupted and would have to be recommenced. The same holds true if a novice would spend three days each month in a physician's office, away from the novitiate. But if he would spend fifty-nine half-days away from the novitiate house, he would not interrupt his novitiate, because the law by day understands a space of twenty-four hours.[46]

Note the phrase: in the novitiate house. If a person would spend, say, thirty-one days in a religious house which is not designated as the novitiate house, his novitiate would be interrupted. Living on a farm away from the house where the novitiate is established, for more than thirty days, would also involve an interruption.

§ 2. If a novice, with the permission of superiors or constrained by force, has passed more than fifteen but not more than thirty days, even interruptedly, outside the precincts (septa) of the house, under obedience of the superior, it is necessary and sufficient for the validity of the novitiate that he supply the number of days so passed outside; if for a period not exceeding fifteen days, the supplementing for this period can be prescribed by the superiors[46] but it is not necessary for validity. This text is a repetition of two decrees of the S. C. Relig., May 3, 1914, the latter of which (Paris.) also explains what is meant by "vi coactus." It is military service which one had to render.[47] The decision is remarkable as it concerns a novice who was forced to serve as a soldier in the barracks of a city, we suppose Paris, where the religious have a novitiate. The soldier spent all the time he could spare from military service in the novitiate house and obeyed the orders of the religious superior. But the S. Congregation justly held that the time thus 46 Can. 32, § 1. 47 A. Ap. S., VI, 229 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google divided between military service and the duties of the novitiate should not be reckoned as fulfilling the requirements for the novitiate. Compelled by force may also refer to a contagious disease, for instance, smallpox, cholera, etc., which require a quarantine in a house especially destined for such purposes.[48] Therefore if this separation would not last more than thirty days, the novitiate would not be interrupted.

§ 3. Superiors must not grant novices permission to remain outside the precincts of the novitiate except for a just and grave reason. No superior can grant such a permission for more than thirty days without involving an interruption of the novitiate.

§ 4. If the novice be transferred by the superiors to another novitiate of the same institute, the novitiate is not interrupted.

CAN. 557

Integer novitiatus peragatur in habitu quem constitutiones pro novitiis praescribunt, nisi speciales locorum circumstantiae aliud exigant.

The full year of the novitiate must be spent in the habit prescribed for novices by the constitution, unless special local circumstances determine otherwise. Non-observance of this law does not invalidate the novitiate. Local custom, especially in missionary countries, may justify not wearing the habit, at least in public. In the U. S. novices do not usually appear in public in their religious habit. This custom, the Code says, may be respected.

[48] The same would have to be said of mental aberration lasting more than thirty days, although occasional lucid intervals might be in evidence. Yellow fever, they say, is not really contagious, but carried chiefly by mosquitos, against which a bar might be needed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 558

In religionibus in quibus duae sunt sodalium classes, novitiatus pro altera classe peractus, pro altera non valet.

In institutes whose members are divided into two classes, the novitiate made in one class does not avail for the other. Thus the novitiate made by lay Brothers or Sisters is not valid for clerical members or choir nuns if the latter constitute a class for themselves.

THE MASTER OF NOVICES AND HIS ASSISTANT

CAN. 559

§ 1. Novitiorum institutioni praeficiendus est Magister, qui sit annos natus quinque saltem ac triginta, decem saltem ab annis a prima professione professus, prudentia, caritate, pietate, religionis observantia conspicuus et, si de clericali religione agatur, in sacerdotio constitutus.

§ 2. Si ob novitiorum numerum vel aliam iustam causam expedire visum fuerit, Magistro novitiorum adiungatur socius, eidem immediate subiectus in iis quae ad novitiatus regimen spectant, annos natus saltem triginta, quinque saltem ab annis a prima professione professus, cum ceteris dotibus necesariis et opportunis.

§ 3. Uterque ab omnibus officiis oneribusque vacare debet, quae novitiorum curam et regimen impedire valeant.

§ 1. The training of the novices must be entrusted to a master who shall be at least thirty-five years of age, and professed for at least ten years from the date of his first profession, and be distinguished for prudence, char-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ity, piety, and fidelity to regular observance, and if the institute be clerical, he must be a priest.

§ 2. A companion or assistant should be given to him, if the number of novices or other reasons require it. This assistant shall be immediately subject to the master in all matters pertaining to the government of the novitiate, and must be at least thirty years of age, and professed five years from the date of his first profession and have the other necessary and suitable qualities.

§ 3. Both (master and assistant) should be free from all other occupations which could hinder them in the care and government of the novices.

Can. 560

Magister novitiorum eiusque socius eligantur ad normam constitutionum, et si quod in his tempus ad durationem muneris praescriptum sit, eo durante, ne removeantur sine iusta gravique causa; sed iidem rursus eligi possunt.

The master of novices and his assistant shall be selected according to the direction of the constitutions, and, if these prescribe a fixed term of office, they must not within that time be removed from their charge without a just and grave cause; besides, they may be reappointed.

Can. 561

§ 1. Uni Magistro ius est et officium consulendi novitiorum institutioni, ad ipsumque unum novitiatus regimen spectat, ita ut nemini liceat hisce se, quovis colore, immiscere, exceptis Superioribus quibus id a constitutionibus permittitur ac Visitatoribus; ad disciplinam vero universae domus quod attinet, Magister, perinde ac novitii, Superiori est obnoxius.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Novitius potestati Magistri ac Superiorum religionis subest eisque obedire tenetur.

The master of novices alone has the right and the duty of providing for the proper training of the novices, he alone is charged with the direction of the novitiate, so that none, under whatever pretext, may interfere in these matters, except the superiors, who are permitted to do so by the constitutions, and the visitators; as to the general discipline of the house, the master, together with the novices, is subject to the superior.

CAN. 562

Gravi obligatione tenetur Magister novitiorum omnem adhibendi diligentiam ut sui alumni in religiosa disciplina, secundum constitutiones, sedulo exerceantur, ad normam can. 565.

The master is under grave obligation to employ all diligence in assiduously forming his novices in the discipline of the religious life, conformably to the constitutions and to the terms of can. 565.

CAN. 563

Intra annum novitiatus Magister, ad normam constitutionum, de agendi ratione singulorum alumnorum relationem Capitulo vel Superiori maiori exhibeat.

During the course of the year of novitiate, the master of novices, conformably to the constitutions, must present to the chapter or the higher superior a report concerning the conduct of each of the novices.

CAN. 564

§ 1. Novitiatus ab ea parte domus, in qua degunt professi, sit, quantum fieri potest, segregatus ita ut,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sine speciali causa ac Superioris vel Magistri licentia, novitii nullam habeant communicationem cum professis, neque hi cum novitiis.

§ 2. Conversis autem novitiis locus separatus adsignetur.

The novitiate shall be, as far as possible, separated from that part of the house inhabited by the professed religious, so that, without a special cause and the permission of the superior or of the master, the novices may not have communication with the professed religious, nor these latter with the novices. For the lay-brother novices a special place must be set apart. Futile reasons are sometimes advanced to abolish this pedagogically sound law.

CAN. 565

§ 1. Annus novitiatus debet sub disciplina Magistri hoc habere propositum, ut informetur alumni animus studio regulae et constitutionum, piis meditationibus assiduaque prece, iis perdiscendis quae ad vota et ad virtutes pertinent, exercitationibus opportunis ad vitiorum semina radicitus exstirpanda, ad compescendos animi motus, ad virtutes acquirendas.

§ 2. Conversi praeterea diligenter in christiana doctrina instituantur, speciali collatione ad eos habita semel saltem in hebdomada.

§ 3. Anno novitiatus ne destinentur novitii concionibus habendis aut audiendis confessionibus aut exterioribus religionis muniis, neve dedita opera studiis vacent litterarum, scientiarum aut artium; conversi autem in ipsa religiosa domo eatenus tantum fungi possunt officiis fratrum conversorum (non tamen uti primarii officiales), quatenus ab exercitiis novitiatus pro ipsis constitutis non praepediantur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. The year of novitiate under the direction of the master must have for its object the forming of the mind of the novice by means of the study of the rule and constitutions, by pious meditation and assiduous prayer, by instruction on those matters which pertain to the vows and virtues, by suitable exercises in rooting out the germs of vice, in regulating the motions of the soul, in acquiring virtues.

§ 2. The lay-brother novices should be carefully instructed in Christian doctrine, for which purpose a special conference should be given to them at least once a week.

§ 3. During the year of novitiate, the novices must not be employed in preaching or hearing confessions, or in the external charges of the institute, or even in the study of letters, the sciences or arts; the lay-brother novices, however, may perform within the religious house itself all the duties of lay brothers (but in a subordinate capacity), in so far only as such duties do not prevent them from taking part in the exercises prescribed for them in the novitiate. Work may be prayer, indeed; but manual labor, if it takes the place of the prayer and religious exercises prescribed for novices, is not a substitute for holy practices, nor an incentive to religious fervor.

CAN. 566

§ 1. Circa sacerdotem a confessionibus in mulierum novitiatibus serventur praescripta can. 520–527.

§ 2. In religionibus virorum, salvo praescripto can. 519:

1.° Pro novitiorum numero unus vel plures habeantur ordinarii confessarii, salvo praescripto can. 891;

2.° Confessarii ordinarii, si agatur de religione clericali, in ipsa novitiatus domo commorentur; si de laicali,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

saltem frequenter ad domum novitiatus accedant, novitiorum confessiones audituri;

3.° Praeter confessarios ordinarios, designentur aliqui confessarii, quos novitii in casibus particularibus adire libere possint, nec Magister aegre id se ferre demonstret;

4.° Quater saltem in anno detur novitiis confessarius extraordinarius, ad quem omnes accedant saltem benedictionem recepturi.

§ 1. As regards the confessor for the novitiates of women, the prescriptions of can. 520–527 must be observed.

§ 2. For the institutes of men, without prejudice to can. 519:

1.° There shall be, according to the number of novices, one or more ordinary confessors; but the religious superior and the master of novices are allowed to hear the confessions of the novices for a grave reason in special cases, if the novices ask them to do so of their own accord (can. 891).

2.° In clerical institutes the ordinary confessors for the novitiate shall live in the novitiate house itself; while in lay institutes they shall at least frequently visit the novitiate house to hear the confessions of the novices.

3.° Besides the ordinary confessors other confessors must be designated, to whom in particular cases the novices may freely go; nor may the master of novices manifest any displeasure at this.

4.° At least four times a year the novices are to be given an extraordinary confessor, to whom all are to present themselves at least to receive his blessing.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 567

§ 1. Novitii privilegiis omnibus ac spiritualibus gratiis religioni concessis gaudent; et si morte praeveniantur, ad eadem suffragia ius habent, quae pro professis praescripta sunt.

§ 2. Ad ordines, durante novitiatu, ne promoveantur.

§ 1. The novices enjoy all the privileges and spiritual favors granted to the institute; and if they die during the novitiate, they have a right to the same suffrages as are prescribed for the professed members.

§ 2. They must not be promoted to orders during the novitiate.

Concerning the privileges of novices, it has always been maintained that they share all of them, as far as they are capable, because they go by the name of religious as to favors. Therefore theirs are the privileges of the forum and canonis, and immunities, the privilege of exemption if their institute is exempt, the privileges of dispensation, commutation of vows, and absolution. As to spiritual favors they can gain all the indulgences granted to their institute, as far as they are capable, and no restriction is made in favor of professed members. Another spiritual right they enjoy is that to have offered for them, if they die, the prayers for the repose of the soul which, the Code says, must be offered for novices as well as professed members. We confess that this clause appeared new to us, and no quotation is given in support of it in Cardinal Gasparri's notes. But it is a logical interpretation of the general rule that novices partake of the favors of religious proper. However, the distinction between persons in sacred orders and in minor orders, between lay-brothers and clerical members, is certainly to be retained. Hence if a definite number of masses

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and communions are prescribed for each class, the novices are entitled to the same according to the class to which they belong.

A privilege not especially mentioned here, but certainly still in force, which therefore may safely be made use of, is that granted to the Dominicans by Pius V, and six years ago extended to all novices. This privilege permits novices to make profession in case of sickness which according to the judgment of the physician may be considered danger of death. Now this privilege may be made use of, provided (1) the novitiate was duly commenced and the novice admitted by the actual superior of the novitiate; (2) that the vows be pronounced according to the usual formula and without addition as to the length of time or character of the vows, whether temporary or perpetual.

The effects of that profession are merely to gain the plenary indulgence in the form of a jubilee indulgence, but no other juridical effects follow. Hence the religious institute obtains no material right as to said novice's property or other rights; and the novice may afterwards freely leave the institute or be dismissed therefrom, and must renew the profession after the time of the novitiate has expired.[49a]

RENUNCIATION OF PROPERTY

CAN. 568

In novitiatus decursu, si suis beneficiis vel bonis quovis modo novitius renuntiaverit eademve obligaverit, renuntiatio vel obligatio non solum illicita, sed ipso iure irrita est.

49 Clem. VIII "Cum ad regularem" March 19, 1603.

49a S. C. Rel., Sept. 10, 1912 (A. Ap., S., V., 589 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Council of Trent[50] strictly forbade the giving away of property by novices under pain of nullity. The reason for this enactment is to guarantee the freedom of the novice, so that no obstacle may detain him if he wishes to return to the world. Our Code formulates this rule as follows: If, during the novitiate, the novice in any way whatever renounces his benefices or his property, or encumbers them, such a renunciation or encumbrance is not only illicit but null and void.

Hence (1) no ecclesiastical benefice, as defined under can. 1409, may be renounced by the novice, no matter what its value or importance may be. Hence no parish, no chaplaincy, no canonicate, no prebend, if they are canonical benefices, may be given up. But what about our parishes?[51] Although they perhaps lack an essential feature of benefices, viz., objective perpetuity, we believe that the mind of the legislator regards them as benefices.[52] For, as we have said, the end of the law is to safeguard liberty, which may be just as seriously impaired by the resignation of a parish as of a strict benefice. (2) The novice may not renounce his property — bona. To this category belong all donations of considerable amount, title-deeds or other claims to property, shares, bonds, interest, contracts which are more favorable than injurious to the novice,[53] legacies and bequests already received or to be received during the novitiate; but not small donations or alms given to the poor or to the monastery, nor legacies or inheritances to be expected after the death of relatives or friends.[54] (3) Renunciation may be made in favor of friends, relatives or other persons, also in favor of the institute one wishes to enter, or of another

50 Trid., sess. 25, c. 16 de reg.

51 Can. 584.

52 This law, although seemingly restrictive, yet is favorable to the novice, and therefore open to a broad interpretation.

53 Cfr. Piatus M., I, 124.

54 Reiffenstuel, III, 31, n. 136.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

institute. It means to disclaim any right to such goods. Obligation is here understood not only in the legal sense of bond or bail, but in a wider sense, comprising vows, oaths, promises, and the moral duty which binds one to do or omit something. For any such act is a restriction of liberty. Now all such acts are declared null and void, and therefore would not bind the novice nor convey a legal title to the recipient. Hence even though the civil court would uphold the legality of such an act, in conscience those benefited by it could not accept the property.

CAN. 569

§ 1. Ante professionem votorum simplicium sive temporariorum sive perpetuorum novitius debet, ad totum tempus quo simplicibus votis adstringetur, bonorum suorum administrationem cedere cui maluerit et, nisi constitutiones aliud ferant, de eorundem usu et usufructu libere disponere.

§ 2. Ea cessio ac dispositio, si praetermissa fuerit ob defectum bonorum et haec postea supervenerint, aut si facta fuerit et postea alia bona quovis titulo obvenerint, fiat aut iteretur secundum normas § 1 statutas, non obstante simplici professione emissa.

§ 3. Novitius in Congregatione religiosa ante professionem votorum temporariorum testamentum de bonis praesentibus vel forte obventuris libere condat.

§ 1. Before the profession of simple vows, whether temporary or perpetual, the novice must cede, for the whole period during which he will be bound by simple vows, the administration of his property to whomsoever he chooses and dispose freely of its use and usufruct except the constitutions determine otherwise.

§ 2. If the novice, because he possessed no property,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

omitted to make this cession, and if subsequently property should come into his possession, or if, after making provision, he becomes under whatever title the possessor of other property, he must make provision, according to § 1, for the newly acquired property, even if he has already made simple profession.

§ 3. In every religious congregation the novice, before making profession of temporary vows, shall freely dispose by will of all the property he actually possesses or may subsequently possess.

The enactment of this canon would at first sight appear contrary to can. 568, which forbids any renunciation or encumbrance of property. Here certain acts are permitted which seemingly violate that prohibition. However, the contradiction is but apparent. For can. 568 speaks of the time during the novitiate (in novitiatus decursu), whereas can. 569 refers to the period immediately preceding profession. The Tridentine Council [55] permitted a disposal of property to be made within two months before profession. Besides, in can. 569 the question turns on ceding the administration and disposal of the use and usufruct, whilst can. 568 speaks of the property itself. Administration means the management of affairs pertaining to property or estates of any kind, also incorporeal rights, such as copyrights and patent rights. Now this function must be given to another, who may be a layman, or the religious order or congregation itself.[56] Of course, this must be done in a legal form, in other words, in court, unless the religious community is acknowledged by law as a civil corporation, in which latter case the by-laws should provide for such eventualities.

The next act which a novice should freely perform is 55 Trid., sess. 25, c. 16, de reg.

56 S. C. super statu Reg., June 12, 1858, n. 9 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 856: "ac etiam suo ordini.")

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to dispose of the use and usufruct of his property. There is a little difficulty as to the term use. If it involved the consumption of the whole property it would impair the freedom of the owner and run counter to can. 581, which says that professed religious of simple vows cannot validly renounce their property, except within the sixty days immediately preceding the taking of solemn vows. Hence use must here be taken as an application to a good and useful purpose of the income from the capital or property. This is more clearly expressed in a declaration of June 12, 1858, where we read of "expending and using the income or revenues (redditus)."[57] Usufruct is the temporary use of a thing, or profit and advantage derived therefrom without destroying or wasting its substance, for instance, of a house or farm.

The cession of the administration and disposal of such property must be made before simple profession and remains in force for the whole period during which the subject is bound by simple vows.

§ 2 applies this ruling to two cases: (a) when a novice had no property, the administration of which he would have to cede, or of which he could freely dispose, but comes into the possession of property subsequently; (b) when he foresees an increase of his property after simple profession. In both cases, says the Code, the simple profession does not prevent the novice from ceding the administration and disposing of the property newly acquired.

§ 3 mentions the testament or last will, by which a novice, before making profession of temporary vows, shall dispose of the property he actually possesses or may subsequently possess. This, of course, only for the case of death. The Code restricts the making of a last will to novices of religious congregations, excluding the orders, which, however, may be benefited by an act of the novice inter vivos, or a donation, properly so-called.

[57] Ibid., cfr. Normae, n. 115.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 570

§ 1. Nisi pro alimentis et habitu religioso in constitutionibus vel expressa conventione aliquid in postulatu vel novitiatu ineundo solvendum caveatur, nihil pro impensis postulatus vel novitiatus exigi potest.

§ 2. Quae adspirans attulerit et usu consumpta non fuerint, si e religione, non emissa professione, egrediatur, ei restituantur.

Except the constitutions or a formal agreement require the payment of a certain sum for food and clothing during the postulancy or novitiate, nothing may be exacted to defray the expenses of the postulancy or novitiate.

All that the aspirant brought with him and has not consumed, shall be returned to him if he leaves without making profession.

The ancient monastic rules were not in favor of demanding anything, in whatever shape or form, from those who knocked at the door of the monastery.[58] Councils forbade the exaction of fees for admission to the religious state, justly comparing such money to simoniacal extortion.[59] The same rule, although in a somewhat mitigated form, was followed by the S. Congregation of Bishops and Regulars.

The mitigation consisted in permitting a moderate tuition fee to be charged for the time of probation, an oblation for the sacred functions and for a banquet, but not 58 Cfr. Migne, 66, 831 ff.

59 Cfr. cc. 2, 3, C. 1, q. 2; c. 5, C. 20, q. 3; c. 2, X, 35; cc. 19, 25, 30, 40, X, V, 3; Trid., sess. 25, c. 16, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

too sumptuous. But no stipulation as to these latter offerings was allowed, and the custom of receiving or demanding any admission fee reprimanded.[60] Our Code confirms this practice, but adds that the expenses must be either mentioned in the Constitutions or determined by special agreement.

ENDING THE NOVITIATE

CAN. 571

§ 1. Novitius potest religionem libere deserere, aut a Superioribus vel a Capitulo, secundum constitutiones, quavis iusta de causa dimitti, quin Superior vel Capitulum teneantur dimissionis causam dimisso patefacere.

§ 2. Exacto novitiatu, si iudicetur idoneus, novitius ad professionem admittatur, secus dimittatur; si dubium supersit sitne idoneus, potest a Superioribus maioribus probationis tempus, non tamen ultra sex menses, prorogari.

§ 3. Votis nuncupandis spiritualia exercitia novitius praemittat per octo saltem solidos dies.

The first paragraph of this canon provides

(1) That a novice may freely leave the institute.

(2) That he may be for any just cause dismissed by the superiors or chapter, who are not bound to make known to him the reasons for his dismissal.

(3) That the dismissal must be according to the terms of the constitutions.

As to the last point note that the Code insists upon the constitutions of the institute. If these prescribe that the chapter has the right to dismiss novices, the chapter must decide each case by secret ballot. If the constitutions [60] S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 11, 1789 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 396).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are silent on this point, the superior may dismiss the novice. But neither superior nor chapter are obliged to make known to the novice the reason for his dismissal; for, as the novice is free to leave, so the institute is free to dismiss one whom it deems unfit. However, justice requires that no one be dismissed without a just cause, because arbitrary proceeding might destroy or injure the good name of the novice. Therefore a Decretal of Gregory IX ruled that if the novice absolutely insisted on remaining to serve God, he should be allowed to do so.[61] Of course this meant that he must be willing to observe the rule and fit himself for membership, for no religious institute or society can be compelled to retain an unfit member.

§ 2. After the completion of the novitiate, the novice, if deemed fit, shall be admitted to profession; otherwise he shall be dismissed; but if there arises a doubt regarding his fitness, the higher superiors can prolong the novitiate, but not beyond six months. Some misgivings might arise as to religious institutes which prescribe a two years' novitiate; have their superiors, too, the right to prolong the novitiate for six months? Our answer is, yes, because, on the one hand, the Code (can 555, § 2) admits a two years' novitiate, and, on the other, it only says, exacto novitiatu, after the novitiate is completed. If the text would say, after the year's novitiate (exacto novitiatus anno) the answer would be negative; this, however, is not the wording of the text.

The last paragraph of can. 571 prescribes a spiritual retreat of at least eight whole days before profession. "Eight whole days" means that the retreat must commence in the morning and end in the evening of the eighth day, so that profession takes place on the morning of the ninth, or on the evening of the eighth day.

61 C. 23, X, III, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION

The term profession, from profiteri, denotes an external act of conviction. Thus we speak of the profession of faith, and St. Paul says: "With the heart we believe unto justice; but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." [1]

Religious profession, therefore, is an external act of the mind by which one embraces the religious state, or the external testimony of one who aspires to be a servant of God. It is well known that the ancient ascetics had a predilection for the word profession and defined it as a "covenant with God." [2] This flows from the very essence of the religious state, which involves service or worship of God.

As the Sacraments have their visible signs, so, too, religious profession is clothed in outward ceremonies. As the "second baptism" [3] (thus it was styled), profession was ever surrounded by more or less elaborate rites. We know from St. Benedict's Rule (c. 58) that the act of profession was performed in the oratory in the presence of the abbot and the community; that the novice made a promise the contents of which were formulated according to the rule and written in the document, which is signed by the novice and placed upon the altar. This was followed by the investiture. Thenceforth the

1 Rom. X, 9.

2 St. Basil, Reg. fusior, tr. 14 (Migne, P. G., 31, 950); Herwegen, Beiträge zur Gesch. des alten Mönchtums, 1912, III, I, p. 6.

3 Migne, P. L., 66, 827.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

novice was a member of the community, with all the obligations and rights of membership. A document was drawn up containing his petition to be received, as well as the promise to live perpetually in the community under the obedience of the abbot, for the purpose of striving after perfection. Note, however, that after the act was performed, the newly professed was considered to be a member of the congregation endowed with rights. According to the ideas of the olden time, the obedience promised was looked upon as a sort of personal vassalage to the abbot. It would hardly be possible now-a-days to conceive of such absolute subjection, and the spirit of our time is opposed to any such relation. Yet the spirit of obedience, being essential to the religious state, can never be sacrificed to the idol of a falsely so-called democracy.

Concerning the sacred virgins, we know from St. Ambrose that the bishops "consecrated" them, usually on the feast of the Resurrection, on which, as he says, Baptism is conferred in the whole world.[4] The bishop blessed the veil and put it on the head of the virgin.[5] This veil seems to have covered the head and upper part of the body like a helmet or breast-plate. Its color was sombre, in opposition to the yellow bridal veil,[6] because it signified holy sorrow.[7] The ceremony was accompanied by appropriate prayers and the people answered: "Amen."[8] It is evident that the sacred veil signified the mystic espousal with Christ, to whom these virgins dedicated themselves.

Having said this much concerning the rite and significance of profession, which is nothing else but public en-

4 Migne, P. L., 16, 331, 348.
5 Opp. Nicetae, Migne, P. L., 52, 1099 f.
6 Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 478.
7 Migne, P. L., 52, 1000.
8 Migne, P. L., 16, 372.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

trance upon the exclusive service of God, according to a determined rule or constitution, we may now hear what the Code says concerning profession. The classification of profession into temporary, perpetual, simple, and solemn is to some extent new. For, as said before, to the middle of the XVIth century only one profession, the solemn, was acknowledged, which was supposed to take place after the novitiate. With the exception of the Jesuits this practice was followed by all religious institutes until 1858, when the S. C. super Statu Regularium issued the decree, "Neminem latet." This decree enacted that after the novitiate the members of male religious institutes should take simple vows, which were to be continued for three years from the date of the simple profession, or longer, according to the prudent judgment of the superiors, but not beyond twenty-five years. Leo XIII ("Perpensis," May 3, 1902) extended this decree to nuns with solemn vows. Yet it has always been the opinion of authors and the practice of the Roman congregations up to a few years ago to consider these simple vows as perpetual on the part of the religious. But lately the Roman Court commenced to regard them as temporary or triennial, and this view has been embodied in the Code.

REQUISITES OF VALIDITY

CAN. 572

§ 1. Ad validitatem cuiusvis religiosae professionis requiritur ut:

1.° Qui eam emissurus est, legitimam aetatem habeat ad normam can. 573;

2.° Eum ad professionem admittat legitimus Superior secundum constitutiones;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Novitiatus validus ad normam can. 555 praecesserit;

4.° Professio sine vi aut metu gravi aut dolo emittatur;

5.° Sit expressa;

6.° A legitimo Superiore secundum constitutiones per se vel per alium recipiatur.

§ 2. Ad validitatem vero professionis perpetuae sive sollemnis sive simplicis, requiritur insuper ut praecesserit professio simplex temporaria ad normam can. 574.

1. For the validity of any religious profession whatever it is required that he who makes it be of the legitimate age, viz., for the first temporary profession he must have completed his sixteenth year; for perpetual profession, whether simple or solemn, the twenty-first, according to

CAN. 573

Quilibet professionem religiosam emissurus oportet ut decimum sextum aetatis annum expleverit, si de temporaria professione agatur; vicesimum primum, si de perpetua sive sollemni, sive simplici.

The Code determines the minimum age, but leaves the question as to a more advanced age undetermined. The Normae[9] rule that in institutes with simple vows the candidate should not be more than thirty years, and although these are not law, yet if the constitutions contain a prescription to that effect, it would not be against the law. But they may not go below the minimum as fixed by can. 573.

2. The novice must be admitted by the lawful superior

[9] N. 61. Those who had passed the 30th year, in female congregations, needed a papal indult.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to the constitutions. Who that superior is, must be determined by the rule and the constitutions (cfr. can. 543).

3. The profession must be preceded by a valid novitiate according to the terms of can. 555, which have been explained supra.

4. The profession must be free from compulsion, fear, and fraud. These three conditions may be reduced to one: freedom of profession. For further explanations see under can. 542, 1.° Deceit (dolus) would be present if the one professing subscribed the formula of profession either in a faulty way or with the wrong name.

5. The profession must be expressed in formal terms. This means that it must be made either in writing, or if orally, in such a way that no reasonable doubt is left as to the consent of the one who makes it. A deaf and dumb person would, therefore, have to express his consent in writing to eliminate all doubt. Tacit profession is no longer [10] admitted. It used to be assumed [11] if the novice was admitted to capitular acts (voting) permitted only to professed members, or allowed to wear the religious habit after a year's novitiate. Now profession, to be valid, must be made in words or signs which formally express the intention.

6. The profession must be received by the lawful superior or his representative (as mentioned in can. 543). Note the distinction between No. 2 and No. 6. There admission to profession was the subject of the enactment, here the question turns about the superior, in whose presence the profession must be made. The constitutions determine who is the legitimate superior authorized 10 S. C. EE. et RR., June 12, 1858; Leo XIII, "Perpensis" May 3, 1902.

11 Cf. cc. 22, 23, X, III, 31; cc. 1, 3, 4, 6°, III, 14.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to receive professions. In diocesan congregations the bishop of the diocese is entitled to this privilege, whilst in papal institutes it depends entirely on the constitutions.

The delegate of the lawful superior [12] should be a priest if the ceremony takes place during Mass and the delegate personally receives the profession. Wherefore in the formula of profession both the superior's name and that of the delegate must be mentioned. However, if profession is made into the hands of the superioress, or her delegate (who may be any professed sister) the formula of profession must contain the name of the diocesan Ordinary, in whose hands the profession is made, and also the name of the delegate of the Ordinary, if the latter is not personally present at the ceremony. For the rest we refer to can. 576.

For the validity of perpetual profession, whether solemn or simple, the following requirements are laid down:

TEMPORARY PROFESSION

CAN. 574

§ 1. In quolibet Ordine tam virorum quam mulierum et in qualibet Congregatione quae vota perpetua habeat, novitius post expletum novitiatum, in ipsa novitiatus domo debet votis perpetuis, sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus, praemittere, salvo praescripto can. 634, votorum simplicium professionem ad triennium valituram, vel ad longius tempus, si aetas ad perpetuam professionem requisita longius distet, nisi constitutiones exigant annuales professiones.

§ 2. Hoc tempus legitimus Superior potest, renovata a religioso temporaria professione, prorogare, non tamen ultra aliud triennium.

12 Regula Iuris, 68, in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. In every order, both of men and of women, and in every congregation with perpetual vows (except the case of transfer according to can. 634) the novice must, after completing the novitiate, and in the novitiate house itself, make profession of simple vows; this profession, which must precede perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, is valid for three years, or for a longer period if the age required for perpetual profession has not been reached, unless the constitutions prescribe annual professions.

§ 2. The legitimate superior can prolong this period, but not beyond three years, the religious meanwhile renewing the temporary profession.

Here we have the new legislation, no longer a wavering practice. In every religious institute, therefore, whether of men or of women, exempt or not exempt, papal or diocesan, a temporary profession, lasting as a rule, for three years, must precede perpetual profession.

Profession in general, we said, is the public entrance upon the religious state according to a determined rule or constitution. In this are included the three essential elements of the religious state: poverty, chastity, and obedience. Only the last element might be more elaborate; for obedience supposes acceptance. Hence, more fully defined, profession is a bilateral contract by which one consecrates himself to God through the three vows, and to the service of a community approved by ecclesiastical authority, the religious superior accepting the vows in the name of the Church and admitting the person to share in the rights and privileges of the community.[13]

13 Thus Schmier, Iurisprudentia Canonico-Civilis, l. III, li, 1, c. 3, n. 168; Schmalzgrueber, III, 31, 187 f.; Wernz, Jus Decret., III, n. 640.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It would be useless, and we might say dangerous, to attempt [14] to deny that religious profession partakes of the nature of a contract: useless, because the essential elements of a contract are present, viz.: two parties, mutual consent, and obligation. It would be dangerous, because who would enter the religious state if his spiritual welfare were not safeguarded and his support guaranteed? We may look at the consecration of oneself to God from the highest view-point of mysticism and absolutism, a man endowed with reason and free will cannot, from the viewpoint of natural law, abstract from the idea of receiving rights for assuming duties, nor from the right to an honest living. The Rule of St. Benedict is not opposed to this view.[15] For promise and petition must be rewarded, and they are recompensed, because henceforth the professus is to be considered a member of the congregation,[16] and membership without rights would be a mere phantasm.

Applying the definition set forth above, it is evident that a distinction must be made between temporary and perpetual, simple and solemn profession. Temporary profession does not involve such an absolute and lasting contract as perpetual profession. In regard to the latter the difference between simple and solemn vows is most important. Simple perpetual profession implies no absolute and irrevocable covenant, whilst solemn perpetual profession, by its very nature, spells irrevocable consecration to God and acceptance of the same on the part of the religious superior in the name of the Church. The difference will become more palpable when the conse-

14 Molitor, Religiosi Iuris Capita Selecta, 1909, p. 69 ff., who "selected" for his aim the aggrandizement of abbatial power.

15 Reg., c. 58.

16 A pactum or covenant was contained in the formula of profession prescribed by S. Fructuosus of Braga (VIIth century).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quences and obligations are considered (can. 579 and title XIII, ch. I).

Temporary profession may be made after the age of sixteen has been completed; perpetual profession after the 21st year. Hence if one makes profession at the age of sixteen, he has to remain in simple profession for five full years. The term may even be protracted for three years more, if the superior finds it necessary. A difficulty may arise concerning the date from which the superior may prolong the temporary profession: is it from the lapse of the third year of profession or from the age of twenty-one years, completed? If the end of the third year of temporary profession coincides with the twenty-first year completed there is no difficulty. For instance, a Sister would have to make profession on Nov. 21, 1918, having completed her twenty-first year of age as well as the third year of temporary profession. She wavers in her decision; — may the superioress prolong her time for one, two, or three years? Yes. And in the meanwhile she may renew the profession every year on Nov. 21. But what, if the Sister should be twenty-four years of age when she would have to make perpetual vows? Is the superioress in that case allowed to prolong her profession — to the limit of three years? Yes, because (as we believe) the dividing line is not so much the twenty-first year completed, this being only the minimum, than the date of temporary profession. This is especially convenient for institutes which prescribe five years' annual profession — a custom that may certainly be followed, since the text itself admits annual profession. But at the same time the triennial term must be kept and the prorogation should only be applied in really doubtful cases, and until the Code can be fully applied. Note that the Code makes the temporary profession imperative only for institutes in which perpetual vows are taken. But it includes all these institutes. Hence also lay brothers of religious orders, who would take solemn or simple perpetual vows, must now make, first the temporary profession, and after three (respectively five years, if the candidate was only 16 at the time of the first profession) perpetual vows.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code excepts cases of transfer (see can. 634).

The legitimate superior who may prolong the period of temporary profession is the one who admits to profession, not the one who assists at the act; therefore the higher superior.

CAN. 575

§ 1. Exacto professionis temporariae tempore, religiosus, ad normam can. 637, vel emittat perpetuam professionem, sollemnem vel simplicem secundum constitutiones, vel ad saeculum redeat; sed etiam, durante tempore professionis temporariae, potest, si dignus non habeatur qui vota perpetua nuncupet, dimitti a legitimo Superiore ad normam can. 647.

§ 2. Suffragium Consilii seu Capituli pro prima professione temporaria est deliberativum; pro subsequente professione perpetua, sollemni vel simplici, est consultivum tantum.

When the period of temporary profession has expired, the religious, according to can. 637, must either make perpetual profession, whether solemn or simple, according to the constitutions, or return to secular life; but even during the period of temporary profession he can, if not judged worthy to pronounce perpetual vows, be dismissed by the legitimate superior in accordance with can. 647.

The vote of the council or chapter for the first tem-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

porary profession is deliberative; for the subsequent perpetual profession, solemn or simple, it is advisory only.

This canon clearly shows that the temporary profession is a sort of protracted novitiate. At the age of twenty-one, if the temporary profession or three years' term expires at the same time, or after the three years' profession, but not before the twenty-first year of age, the religious may freely return to the world, if he does not wish to assume the responsibility of perpetual vows, or have the temporary profession prolonged according to can. 574, § 2. Besides, he may be dismissed if he lacks the necessary qualities. In the latter case it must be observed: (a) That sickness contracted after the first profession during the temporary profession is no cause for dismissal; only if it had been deceitfully concealed or simulated at the time of the first profession would it be a sufficient reason for dismissing one (can. 637); (b) that the terms of can. 647 must be observed, as shall be explained later.

What is prescribed in § 2 concerning the nature of the vote or ballot is now law, and has been since 1862, when the S. C. Regularium decreed that the chapter, i. e., the whole electoral college, or the counsellors, i. e., a chosen number of religious, must decide by secret ballot whether or not one is to be admitted. But at that time the simple profession was considered perpetual in religious orders. Hence, logically, the admission to solemn profession had not necessarily to be submitted to the decisive vote again, the advisory vote being sufficient. However, since the new legislation changes the nature of the first profession into a merely temporary affair, it would have been but logical to change the advisory vote for perpetual profession into a decisive vote.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 576

§ 1. In emittenda professione religiosa servetur praescriptus in constitutionibus ritus.

§ 2. Documentum emissae professionis, ab ipso professo et saltem ab eo coram quo professio emissa est, subscriptum, servetur in tabulario religionis; et insuper, si agatur de professione sollemni, Superior eam excipiens debet profitentis parochum baptismi de eadem certiorem reddere, ad normam can. 470, § 2.

§ 1. In making the religious profession, the rite prescribed by the constitutions must be observed. Rite means the sum total of the formalities or ceremonies which surround the religious act. Hence, it is essentially distinct from the consent of the religious, by which he dedicates himself to the service of God, and which the lawful superior accepts in the name of the Church, and the rite does not affect the validity of the act, unless the constitutions rule otherwise. Rite, therefore, indicates the place, time, and ceremonies prescribed by the constitutions and the decree of the Congregation of Rites, Aug. 27, 1894.

(a) As to the place, can. 574 says that the temporary profession should be made in the novitiate house itself. For other professions, whether annual or perpetual, simple or solemn, the Code prescribes no definite house, but leaves the matter to custom and the constitutions. But it may be safely assumed that the oratory or chapter room is the proper place for making profession.

(b) Concerning the time, as far as the period or term is not considered, nothing special is required or prescribed that would affect validity. Any day, therefore, and any time of the day may be called suitable for profession.

(c) The ceremonies, if the constitutions do not pre-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

scribe otherwise, are those contained in the above-mentioned decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites.[17] They are briefly as follows: If profession takes place during Mass, the celebrant, who is to receive the profession, after having taken the Precious Blood, and after the recital of the Confiteor, Misereatur, and Indulgentiam, turns towards the candidates, holding in his hand the Sacred Host. Each candidate reads with a loud voice the formula of profession and thereupon receives the Blessed Sacrament.

At the renewal of vows, the celebrant turns towards the altar and waits until all have read the formula of renewal. This is read aloud by one and repeated by the others. After this recital all receive Holy Communion in the order of precedence established by the date of profession. However, adds the decree, this method of making profession must not be appended in the respective constitutions. Besides, it is chiefly intended for Sisters' and lay institutes. We may also cite a decision — not a general decree — of the same Congregation, given in reply to a query of a former arch-abbot of the Beuronese Congregation. He had asked whether at the solemn profession made during Mass other prayers may be added from authentic sources of the Roman Rite. The S. Congregation answered: "It is not expedient."[18]

The nuns with solemn vows receive the veil, ring and crown (wreath) at the simple profession; but the formula of solemn profession, which may, at the request of the superioress or community, be made publicly, must expressly contain the words: solemn profession.[19]

§ 2. A written declaration of the profession, signed by 17 Decreta Authentica, n. 3836, which is not a particular decision, but a general decree, specially approved by Leo XIII.

18 Decreta Authentica, n. 3736.

19 S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 15, 1903 (Annal. Eccl., XI, p. 415).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the person professed and at least by him in whose presence the profession was made, must be kept in the archives of the institute. Besides, the superior who has received solemn profession must notify the pastor in whose parish the professed religious was baptized, according to can. 470, § 2.

This paragraph contains two different clauses; the first concerns a written declaration of the profession, the second registration in the baptismal record.

The "Normae" (n. 99) prescribed — and this rule still holds good — that the formula of profession must be substantially inserted in the constitutions. It must be clear and simple, expressing that the religious consecrates himself to God by the three vows, according to the constitution of the institute, either temporarily or perpetually. The formula actually used in the ceremony of profession may be more elaborate, but should not contain any essential additions.

As St. Benedict (c. 58) had already provided, this formula must be written or signed by the person who makes the profession. If he is unable to write, he may make the sign of the cross on the paper and then place it on the altar. St. Benedict says nothing, however, of the superior signing the formula. Perhaps the abbot signed the document, because it was considered a sort of legal contract; promise and petition and the whole apparatus of ancient documents seem to point to that,[20] and hence it is not surprising that the legislator demands that the one in whose presence the profession was made should also subscribe to the formula. Notice the wording coram quo, "in whose presence,"— an evident allusion to St. Benedict's Rule (c. 58), which says, "in the presence of all" (coram omnibus). There might be a 20 Herwegen, l. c., p. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

doubt whom the legislator means. Is it the superior into whose hands the profession is supposed to be made, or the superior who acts as his representative? In diocesan congregations there is little difficulty. For the one in whose presence the profession is made is the Ordinary or his delegate, who therefore has to sign the document or formula of profession. In papal institutes, especially of women, there is the superioress and the priest who assists at the rite of the profession. Which of them must sign the formula? We believe we are justified in saying (according to can. 572, § 1, 6) that the superioress or her delegate assisting at the profession has to sign the formula of profession together with the religious.

The document thus signed — if other bystanders wish to sign the Code does not forbid it — must be preserved in the archives of the institute. By institute (religio) the law implies that every order, or congregation, or convent, or monastery has its archives. It matters little in which of these archives the document is preserved.[21]

The second clause provides that the fact of solemn profession be registered in the baptismal record of the parish where the solemnly professed religious was baptized. Therefore the baptismal records ought to have a special column for such entries.

The reason for this ruling is not far to seek. For can. 1073 makes solemn profession, and simple profession by special apostolic indult,[22] an impediment to marriage.

21 This is also in accordance with St. Benedict's Rule (c. 58): "in monasterio reservetur."

22 This is the case of the Society of Jesus.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RENEWAL OF VOWS

CAN. 577

§ 1. Elapso tempore ad quod vota sunt nuncupata, renovationi votorum nulla est interponenda mora.

§ 2. Superioribus tamen facultas est ex iusta causa permittendi ut renovatio votorum temporariorum per aliquod tempus, non tamen ultra mensem, anticipetur.

When the period for which the vows have been taken has expired, they must be immediately renewed. Superiors, however, are empowered, for a just cause, to anticipate the renewal of vows, but not beyond one month.

It is evident that the renewal of vows here is meant not as an act of mere devotion, but as producing juridical obligations. Therefore at the moment when the period, say one year, has elapsed, the renewal must take place after the 365th day, or on the first day after the year is completed. A sufficient reason for anticipating the renewal of vows would be sickness, departure for a study house, or a certain task. Of course, it is supposed that the religious freely consents to the anticipation. A month, canonically, is a period of thirty days.[23]

RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF PROFESSED PERSONS

CAN. 578

Professi a votis temporariis, ed quibus ni can. 574:

1.° Fruuntur iisdem indulgentiis, privilegiis et spiritualibus gratiis, quibus gaudent professi a votis sollemnibus aut professi a votis simplicibus perpetuis; et si morte praeveniantur, ad eadem suffragia ius habent;

23 Cfr. can. 32, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Eadem obligatione tenentur observandi regulas et constitutiones, sed, ubi viget chori obligatio, divini officii privatim recitandi lege non obstringuntur, nisi sint in sacris constituti aut aliud constitutiones expresse praescribant;

3.° Voce activa et passiva carent, nisi aliud in constitutionibus expresse caveatur; tempus autem praescriptum ad fruendum voce activa et passiva, silentibus constitutionibus, computetur a prima professione.

Those who have made profession of temporary vows treated of in can. 574:

1.° Enjoy the same indulgences, privileges, and spiritual favors as the professed of solemn vows or of simple perpetual vows; and in case of death they are entitled to the same suffrages.

2.° They are equally obliged to the observance of the rule and constitutions, but where choir service is obligatory, they are not bound by law to the private recitation of the divine office, except they are in holy orders or the constitutions expressly impose it.

3.° They have neither active nor passive vote, except the constitutions expressly declare otherwise; but the time requisite for the enjoyment of an active and passive voice, when the constitutions are silent on the matter, is to be reckoned from the date of the first profession.

The first number puts all members of a religious community, order or congregation on an equal footing concerning spiritual rights and privileges. The Code mentions indulgences, spiritual favors, and privileges. What the last-mentioned term means has been sufficiently explained in the first book, title V.

Of indulgences the Code speaks in the third book, can. 911 ff. A spiritual favor is of a somewhat mixed nature.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It may be called a privilege, since every privilege is a favor,[24] yet it is restricted to the court of conscience. Such a favor is absolution from censures or reserved cases, change of private vows, dispensation from fast and abstinence, etc. Privileges one enjoys as far as he is capable of making use of them. Privileges granted to clerical orders as such are not intended for orders or congregations of women; privileges given to priests cannot be used by clerics who have only minor orders, etc. Among spiritual favors are also the prayers for the dead. These, the Code says, are enjoyed by those who have made profession of temporary vows in the same measure as by those who have taken perpetual vows; but we suppose, with the distinction noted under can. 567.

The second number of our canon enjoins the same obligations on all, with one exception. All professed religious are bound by the vow of obedience to observe the rule and constitutions of the community to which they belong. The exception noted concerns the recitation of the Breviary. Most of the religious orders prescribe the public recitation of the divine office in choir, at which all have to attend who are not legitimately excused. The divine office, according to common agreement, forms part and parcel of the religious state, and therefore all the members of every religious community are bound in conscience to take part in it in the spirit of the Church and according to their respective constitutions. Now the Church says that in religious communities which demand attendance in choir, also those members who have made profession of temporary vows, should be present at the divine office.[26] On the other 24 Suarez, De Legibus, VII, 2, 7.

25 Piatus M., l. c., I, 96 f.

26 Cf. can. 589, § 2, where allowance is made for those engaged in studies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hand, the Church does not oblige these to private recitation, unless, in accordance with can. 135, they are in higher orders, i. e., at least subdeacons, or unless the constitutions prescribe private recitation. The Code does not mention custom. Therefore mere custom would not oblige them to private recitation, and this should be taught in the novitiate in order not to create an erroneous conscience.

No. 3 determines the right to vote. This is either active, i. e., the right of partaking in capitular acts by casting one's vote; or passive, i. e., the right to being appointed or elected to an office or prelacy. Both these rights are given radically by temporary profession, but are suspended — until when? Here the Code stops short, whilst Cardinal Gasparri refers the reader to certain decisions. We know them, but they do not settle the controverted point. The quintessence of all these declarations is that the date from which the right of active and passive voice is to be reckoned is that of the first profession. Thus, for instance, to be elected superior, ten years of profession, according to can. 504, are required; the date from which this period must be reckoned is the first or temporary profession. However, the constitutions may fix another date. But when does the right of active voice start? A declaration of the S. C. super Statu Regularium, June 12, 1858, would seem to insinuate that this right commences on the date of solemn profession.[27] Where only simple perpetual profession is made, it would naturally follow that this right starts from the date of the perpetual profession. No law text, however, prescribes the requisite of minor orders for enjoying the active voice, although particular constitutions may make higher or sacred orders a condi-

27 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 858 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion for the exercise of the ballot.[28] In female congregations the active, not passive, voice is now granted only to such who have made perpetual vows. Yet, if the constitutions say that those with temporary vows may partake in the election of a delegate for the chapter, this right must be respected, as it was formerly granted according to the "Normae" (n. 217), and the Code upholds these constitutions. Therefore a superioress would not be entitled to exclude a Sister with temporary vows from exercising that right on the strength of can. 578. Only if the constitutions are not explicit on this point, the Sisters with temporary vows may be excluded. But in that case all must be treated equally, because no superior has a right to limit the number of votes except for reasons expressed in common law [29] or the constitutions. The same holds good of all religious orders and congregations, the reason being evident. Arbitrary proceedings and injustice would result from the contrary practice.

EFFECTS OF RELIGIOUS PROFESSION

CAN. 579

Simplex professio, temporaria sit vel perpetua, actus votis contrarios reddit illicitos, sed non invalidos, nisi aliud expresse cautum fuerit; professio autem sollemnis, si sint irritabiles, etiam invalidos.

This and the following canons determine what are called the effects or consequences of religious profession. Can. 579 establishes these in general. Note that there is but one distinction made, viz.: between simple 28 The decretals and the Council of Trent demanded higher orders only for cathedral and collegiate churches, in order to stimulate the members to receive these orders.

29 Cfr. c. 14, X, I, 6; c. 32, 6°, I, 6; this is called the limitation of votes (coarctatio votorum).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and solemn profession. Simple profession, whether temporary or perpetual, renders acts contrary to the vows illicit but not invalid, unless it be otherwise formally expressed; while solemn profession renders such acts also invalid, if they can be nullified.

1. Simple profession, being a species of bilateral contract between the religious institute or community and the professed member, necessarily produces certain effects. Some of these have been mentioned in can. 578, viz.: the rights and obligations in general. The present canon speaks of certain "acts contrary to the vows." Contrary means opposed to another person or thing, so as to destroy it, or at least incompatibility. Thus we say truth is contrary to falsehood, coldness to warmth, in the same subject, at the same time, and under the same conditions. The vows referred to are the three religious vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, not excluding special vows. The acts contrary to these vows are declared to be either illicit or invalid. They are illicit, in as far as they are simply forbidden by the vows themselves, or, let us rather say, they are prohibited because contrary to the vows, without any penal sanction or nullifying consequence being attached to the prohibition. Invalid are acts which are contrary to the vows and have an ecclesiastical sanction attached to them by which they are rendered destitute of any juridical value. Acts are illicit, therefore, because they are immoral, invalid because, besides being immoral, they are juridically or legally null and void. It is evident that the Church alone has the right to make the distinction between simple and solemn profession. In matter of fact the State pays little attention to the effects of religious profession. Hence it is, especially in matters of property rights, all-important that religious communities should make by-laws determining the position of their members as to business transactions and compensation due them in case they choose to leave.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Acts contrary to the vow of poverty, induced by simple profession, are the free and independent disposal and administration of property after this has been ceded to the community. Hence a religious with simple vows may not dispose of his own property or that of the community. If he would dispose of his personal property, freely and without permission of the superior, he would commit a sin against the vow of poverty. But if he would dispose of community property, he would also commit a sin against justice, and be obliged to restitution, as far as he is capable, and as far as a serious damage would have been done to the community, unless the latter would be in a condition and ready to condone the damage. Restitution, however, is required only if the amount of property disposed of illegitimately would involve a grievous sin. This depends not only on the customs of the respective institute, but also on the size and welfare of the community, the value of money, and the extent of the damage done, as well as on personal persuasion and ability. We cannot name fixed sums,—five, ten or more dollars. It looks ridiculous to us to weigh a grievous sin by dollars and cents, as if to set an admission fee to purgatory or hell. We leave that to the moralists. Such acts contrary to the vow of poverty are illicit, but valid, i. e., an illicit disposal of property would be legally valid and the contracting parties would be held responsible. However, the terms of can. 536 must be taken into consideration here, especially § 3 and § 4, as explained above.

The vow of chastity imposed by simple profession covers the whole matter of the virtue of chastity, but no more. The distinction between simple and solemn profession becomes very palpable in reference to marriage. For simple profession renders a marriage of a religious with a lay person or another religious of simple profession merely illicit, but not invalid, provided, of course, the ecclesiastical formalities have been duly observed. A pastor, or rather the Ordinary, would certainly have to stay such a marriage until the religious would have been dispensed or dismissed. An exception to this rule is the simple vow of chastity taken by the scholastics of the Society of Jesus, which renders a subsequent marriage not merely illicit but also invalid.[30] This so-called privilege is nothing but an application of the old theory[31] that every vow taken in a religious order is a solemn vow and therefore entails this invalidating impediment.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The vow of obedience excludes all contrary acts in as far as the rule and the constitutions are concerned. Authors generally enumerate under this heading private vows and paternal authority. Private vows are vows made by a religious before entering the religious state, for instance, a pledge in the form of a vow or promise to recite the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin. Simple profession extinguishes all previous vows as long as one remains in simple profession. But a vow made forever revives if the subject leaves the religious state.[32] A vow made in favor of a third person, for instance, to recite certain prayers or keep a fast for another's benefit, supposing that the promise was accepted by the other, would not be extinguished by simple profession, because made to a third person and not contrary to the religious state, as we presume. A pilgrimage promised in favor 30 Gregory XIII, "Quanto fructuosius," Feb. 1, 1583; "Ascendente Domino," May 25, 1584; Papi, l. c., p. 39.

31 Cfr. c. 10, X, III, 32; cc. 3, 7, X, IV, 6; c. m. 6°, III, 15.

32 Cfr. can. 1312 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of a third person, however, could be changed into some other good work, either by the religious superior or by a confessor empowered by the proper authority.[33]

Paternal authority is excluded, because obedience and piety are transferred to the religious superiors, i. e., ultimately, God. Therefore parents who claim their sons and daughters after profession sin against the will of God and should be properly instructed, either in the confessional or outside the sacred tribunal.[34]

2. Solemn profession is one taken in an order with solemn vows, acknowledged as such by the Church. It has the following effects:

The vow of poverty excludes the right of owning property and disposing of anything without the permission of the lawful superior. The Code does not insert the clause, "unless special provision has been made." Hence a last will, or a gift inter vivos made by a solemnly professed religious, in favor of a convent or other pious cause would be invalid.[35] But the Holy See (S. C. Rel.) may grant the faculty of disposing or possessing, as was done in favor of nuns in France and Belgium,[36] where extraordinary conditions seemed to demand an exception. If these same nuns would establish a foundation in this country, they could not claim the privilege here, and would make only simple profession, according to 33 Cfr. c. 4, X, III, 34: "He does not violate the vow who changes a temporary service into the perpetual observance of religion." S. Th., II–II, q. 88, art. 12, ad 1; q. 189, art. 3, ad 3; confessors taken from orders have that power.

34 Bouix, De Iur. Reg., I, 617.

35 S. C. EE. et RR., March 11, 1853 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 620 f.). A religious had been forced by the government to remain outside the convent and obtained an indult from the S. Poenitentiaria to use money for himself and for pious purposes; he made a will in favor of a pious cause before a notary public, which was declared invalid, because the indult was only for the court of conscience, and besides he was ordered to return to his convent.

36 Bouix, l. c., I, 493 ff.; Piatus M., I, 10 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the decree of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars, Sept. 30, 1864,[37] unless the S. C. of Religious would make special rules for them.

With regard to the vow of chastity, solemn profession, according to our Code (can. 1073), entails an invalidating impediment to matrimony, and hence an attempted marriage between a solemnly professed and a lay person, or another religious, would be null and void before the Church. Only if there were danger of death could the Ordinary or pastor rectify such an unlawful marriage, provided, however, neither of the contracting parties were a priest.[38]

As to the vow of obedience, we must repeat what we have said concerning simple profession, viz., that solemn profession extinguishes all private vows and paternal authority.

As to vows note that, though one may be secularized or dispensed afterwards, these vows do not revive, because solemn profession is supposed to produce this effect irrevocably.

Such, then, is the relation of certain acts which are contrary to the vows. The Code proceeds to the further determination of acts which specifically touch the vow of poverty.

PROPERTY AND RIGHT OF ADMINISTRATION

CAN. 580

§ 1. Quilibet professus a votis simplicibus, sive perpetuis sive temporariis, nisi aliud in constitutionibus cautum sit, conservat proprietatem bonorum suorum et capacitatem alia bona acquirendi, salvis quae in can. 569 praescripta sunt.

37 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 723 f.

38 Cfr. can. 1043 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
